"The volume before us is, indeed, a model of cheapness combined with elegance and convenient arrangement. It contains, in 518 neatly printed pages, everything Mendelssohn has written for the pianoforte, from the Capriccio in F sharp minor, Op. 5, composed in 1825, at the age of 16, to his latest works, including several published after his death. . . . A student will find no end of interesting points in the works here collected, but to the more advanced amateur also they will be a source of purest enjoyment. We need not add that the stately volume before us is eminently adapted to serve as an elegant and valuable gift-book at this, or, indeed, at any season of the year."
—The Times.

"This is a new edition, just issued by the eminent firm in Berners Street, of the complete works of Mendelssohn for pianoforte solo, including the two concertos, and the other pieces with orchestral accompaniments. These are comprised in one handsome volume, full music size, far less bulky than might be expected from the comprehensiveness of its contents. These comprise all the hitherto published pianoforte works of the composer of the class just specified, including the eight books of 'Lieder ohne Worte.' Some of these and several other pieces are the copyrights of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., hence this is the only complete edition procurable in this country. The advantages of having all these productions of the great master in a single volume are great, especially for the purposes of ready reference, as in the case of the beautiful one-volume edition of Beethoven's Sonatas issued by the same publishers. Like it, the Mendelssohn collection now under notice is beautifully engraved and printed, and is altogether brought out in a style worthy of the contents and of the high reputation of the firm by which it is issued."—Illustrated London News

PARIS EXHIBITION, 1878,

the highest distinction was conferred upon Messrs. HOPKINSON by the Musical Jurors—viz., the only Gold Medal awarded to any British Manufacturer.

MESSRS. HOPKINSON, therefore, feel fairly entitled to repeat the opinions expressed in the year 1845, by the most celebrated Pianists and Musicians then living—viz., THALBERG, Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, Madame DULCKEN, Sir HENRY BISHOP, and others, as still being correct—that their Pianofortes are "unsurpassed in tone and touch by those of any other maker."

Since these opinions were expressed, the leading musical judges in all parts of the world have confirmed them.

Messrs. H. having also, after carefully conducted experiments, introduced improvements of great value, with confidence invite the Trade, Professors, and the Musical Public, specially to inspect and judge of their Metal-framed Grand and Cottage Pianofortes, which they believe to deserve the eulogium passed upon them by the President of the Musical Jurors at Paris, 1878, that—

"THEY ARE FAULTLESS."

CLEMENT MAROT AND THE HUGUENOT PSALTER.*

AMONG the minor departments of musical study, the history of the psalm-tune is one of some importance as well as considerable interest, but which in England has not yet received the attention it merits. A product of the Reformation, the metrical psalm or hymn became to a considerable extent the religious voice of the people; the hymn more especially reflecting the various shades of sentiment and opinion which from time to time prevailed in the Protestant churches, while the tunes to which these hymns were set, often by the ablest musicians of the day, soon passed from one land to another, and the best of them became the common heritage of all the countries in which the reformed doctrine took root. In Germany, where the Reformation was, to a large extent, a popular movement, and the taste for music widely spread, Luther, himself a good musician, assigned to the hymn a prominent place in his scheme of ritual, and the number of small states into which Germany was then divided encouraged the multiplication of local collections. The hymn for the most part remained associated with the chorale to which it was first united, and both became interwoven with the life of the country, religious and social, from the time when "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" sounded the note of resistance to ultramontane domination, to that day not long past when "Nun danket alle Gott" hailed the election of an emperor of a united Fatherland.

In England the course of events was somewhat different. Although the seeds of the Reformation had been sown long before by Wickliffe, the movement against Rome was at first largely political, and its progress to the end of the sixteenth century controlled by the Crown. According to the usual English custom, the object sought to be attained was reform, not revolution, and any break in the historical continuity of the Church of England was avoided as much as possible, either in its liturgy or ritual. For a time, indeed, music was in danger of being banished from the service of the Church. The debased condition into which it had fallen, nearly led to its abolition by the Council of Trent, and it was only saved by the genius of Palestrina. In England many complaints were made of the "curious," that is intricate, singing which then prevailed, but a royal commission, appointed in the reign of Edward VI. to inquire into ecclesiastical ordinances, contented itself with condemning music of a complicated and undevotional character. The Tudor sovereigns were themselves all more or less musicians, and the choral service of the Church was retained, freed from the corruptions by which it had been long disfigured. Beyond the music set to the liturgy, however, the Church of England has never directly recognised any excepting the anthem, to which a place is assigned in the Morning Service. The metrical translations of the psalms by Sternhold, Hopkins, and others were intended for private use, but, becoming popular, soon found their way into the churches, especially into such as did not possess the materials for a full choral service, and these psalms, though never sanctioned as a part of the liturgy, were bound up with the prayer-book, and allowed to be sung before and after morning and evening prayer, and before and after sermons.

In Germany, many industrious writers have carefully investigated the history of their native hymns and chorales. In England, the psalter published in 1592 by Este has been reprinted by the Musical Antiquarian Society, and that compiled in 1621 by Ravenscroft has been re-edited by Mr. Havergal, but no exhaustive collation or bibliography of our early Psalters has yet been made.*

But the Reformation gave birth to yet another church, which differed in many respects from those of Germany and England, while exerting a considerable influence on both. The stern and iconoclastic spirit of the French and Swiss protestants led them at first into various excesses. In their zeal to extirpate all that seemed to appertain to Rome, organs were destroyed and choral music interdicted. But apparently song in some shape is necessary for the expression of religious feeling, and the psalms of the Old Testament were peculiarly consonant to the Hebraic spirit of the early Huguenots, who derived from them support in persecution, encouragement to resistance, and steadfastness in torture or death. Calvin, though not a musician like Luther, was by no means so averse to the use of music as many have supposed him to have been. He knew well the importance of the people's song, and, when pastor of the French congregation at Strasburg in 1539, prepared a collection of metrical psalms with tunes for the use of the Reformed Church. The work commenced at Strasburg was continued on his return to Geneva, and resulted in the completion, in 1562, of the psalter, which, from that time to the present century has been exclusively used by every assembly of French Protestants.

The early history of this, the single tune-book recognised for more than two centuries and a half by the Reformed Church, has been, until lately, involved in much obscurity. By whom it was edited was uncertain, its bibliography was confused, and the accounts given of it in ordinary histories of music were conflicting and manifestly untrustworthy. In 1872 M. Félix Bovet threw much new light on the subject by the publication of his "Histoire du Psautier des églises réformées," to which is appended a copious bibliography, but valuable as this work is, it by no means exhausted the subject, and, while discussing the question of the editorship of the tunes, contained no special notice of the tunes themselves. The work thus commenced by M. Bovet, has now been worthily completed by M. O. Douen, who has lately given the world the results of six years' research in the two admirably edited volumes now before us.

The name of Marot is so closely connected with the Huguenot Psalter, that M. Douen has devoted a considerable portion of his first volume to the life and works of that remarkable man, who exerted as marked an influence on the development of French lyric poetry as on that of the French Protestant Church.

Clément Marot, the only son of Jehan Marot (a Norman, who had married and settled at Cahors-en-Quercy†), was born at Cahors about 1497. His father, who became attached to the court of Anne of Brittany, consort of Louis XII., in the capacity of poet and valet de chambre, brought the young Marot to Paris when ten years of age, and destined him for the study of the law, but its dry technicalities had no attraction for the lively boy, who preferred joining with his young companions in the performance of the mysteries or farces then in vogue, and in which the vices and follies of the age were made the subjects of ridicule.‡

* The Scotch Psalter has had every justice done to it in the excellent reprint edited in 1864 by the Rev. Neil Livingston.

† A sub-province of Guienne.

‡ The law-clerks "of the Basoche" had a prescriptive monopoly of representations of this kind on festivals and holidays.

* Clément Marot et le Psautier Huguenot, étude historique, littéraire, musicale et bibliographique. Par O. Douen. Paris, 2 Vols., 1878-9. London: Asher and Co.

His education, though apparently somewhat irregularly conducted, included an acquaintance with the Greek, Latin, and Italian languages, and where it was deficient in thoroughness, it was supplemented by his great natural quickness and intelligence, aided by association with many of the learned men of the time. He had a good voice, sang well, and seems to have played the spinet, though his musical knowledge was doubtless slight. He even appears, like the troubadours of earlier days, to have composed melodies to many of the songs he wrote. From his father he inherited the gift of poetry, and, at the age of fifteen, produced a translation of the first eclogue of Virgil, and a "Ballade des Enfants sans soucy."*

Seeing the disinclination of the young poet to a lawyer's life, his father attached him as a page to Nicolas de Neufville, Seigneur de Villeroy, under whose auspices he might adopt the profession of arms. While in the service of this nobleman, Marot wrote some pieces dedicated to Francis I.,† and in due time appeared at court.

The king, however, instead of taking him into his own service, recommended him to his sister Marguerite, the brilliant and fascinating Duchess of Alençon, afterwards Queen of Navarre, who gave him an appointment in her suite as valet de chambre, or gentleman in waiting. A mutual regard sprang up between the poet and the princess, but the scandalous stories to which, long afterwards, this friendship gave rise, were certainly wholly due to the imagination of the Abbé Lenglet du Fresnoy,‡ and have been justly rejected by later writers.

Marot was a true successor of the troubadours, Marguerite was the mistress to whom his services were due, and to whom he addressed his verse; and if in one or two instances his language assumes too warm a tone, it must be remembered that such has been always the privilege of poets, and that reticence of expression was not the characteristic of the court of which Brantome has left us so many curious reminiscences.

Few women were more fit than Marguerite to inspire a poet's muse. Beautiful, accomplished, witty, amiable, she undoubtedly exercised a considerable influence on Marot, and turned his mind towards the reformed doctrines, to which her own inclinations were already directed. A change in his tone is observable from about the year 1521, and soon afterwards he entered on that long crusade of satire against the monks and their vices, which earned for him the undying hatred of the cloistered brotherhood. Marot accompanied the French army to Italy, where he was wounded, and with his king, taken prisoner at the disastrous battle of Pavia.

Marot's first satirical attacks on the Church of Rome were, like some other writings of the time, made under the veil of allegory. A short piece in this vein, which he wrote on his return from Italy, excited the suspicions of the Sorbonne, and Marot was thrown into prison at a time when a charge of heresy was a question of life or death. From this danger he was extricated by the Bishop of Chartres, who, employing a friendly stratagem to withdraw him into his own hands from those of the Inquisition, kept him in nominal custody till a formal order for his release was obtained by Marguerite from her brother on his return from captivity in Spain. Not long afterwards Marot married, and, in 1526, petitioned the king to appoint him to the post of valet de chambre, which his father, then lately dead, had held. To this request Francis gave a favourable reply, but through the intervention of his enemies at the Court, two years elapsed before Marot was formally inscribed as a member of the royal household. During this time he continued to produce poetical pieces of various kinds, in several of which marks of the influence of the reformed doctrines may be distinctly traced, until, in 1528, an outrage in Paris offered to an image of the Virgin, and, justly or not, imputed to the Protestants, lighted afresh the fires of persecution, and forced Marot to retire for a time to his native town. He returned to Paris in 1529, and in the following year published a collection of his early poems, under the title of "Ladolence Clementine." On the death of the king's mother, Louise of Savoy, in the autumn of 1531, the violence of persecution subsided for a time; but, a few months afterwards, Marot, whose pen never remained unemployed, was, with several other persons, again made the object of attack; this time on a charge of violating the rules of abstinence during Lent and other forbidden days. Again he succeeded in escaping from the tender mercies of the Church.

We now reach the year 1533, an important date in the history of the French psalter, as it was that in which the first of Marot's translations of the psalms appeared. In that year was published "Le Miroir de tres chretienne Princesse Marguerite de France, Royné de Navarre, Duchesse de d'Alençon et de Berry, auquel elle voit et son neant et son tout." Paris, 1533. At the end of the first part is "Le VI^e Pseavme de David,* translaté en francoys selon l'hebreu par Clément Marot, valet de chambre du Roy." After the second part comes, "L' Instrvction et foy d'vng Chrestien, mise en francoys par Clément Marot," and comprising the Pater Noster, the Ave Maria, the Credo, the "Benediction deuant mengier," the "Graces pour vng enfant, le tout versifié, avec le Dixain d'vng chretien malade à son amy."

Had the course of events proceeded smoothly at this time, the translation of the sixth psalm would probably have been soon succeeded by that of others, and the whole French psalter at last completed by the same hand. This, however, was not to be. With one brief interval, 1533 and 1534 were years of comparative rest to the Protestants of France. At the close of the former year, indeed, repressive measures were ordered by the king to be taken against the heretics, but that fickle prince, irritated by an attack on himself, soon afterwards turned his wrath against the enemies of reform, concluded a treaty with the Lutherans of Germany, and even invited Melancthon to his court, in the vain hope of effecting a compromise between the contending parties. The influence of Marguerite might at this time have induced Francis to favour the Reformation, had not the lamentable extravagance of some fanatics caused a reaction in his sentiments, and thrown him into the arms of the party of persecution. The Huguenot preachers having been imprisoned in December, 1533, some hot-headed Protestants of Paris took counsel with their brethren in Switzerland as to the best means of disseminating their opinions. The mode adopted was as productive of disaster as it was deserving of censure. A most indecent and abusive attack on the Mass was printed at Neuchâtel in the form of a placard,† and on the night of October 18, 1534, these placards were posted up in every direction in Paris and other large towns, one being even affixed to the door of the king's apartment at Amboise, where he was then residing. The anger which this act naturally excited in the breast of Francis, gave an advantage to the enemies of the Reformation which they were not slow to use. They persuaded the king that the Huguenots were a branch of the Anabaptists, whose excesses were then disturbing Germany. Arrests immediately followed, not merely of those who were suspected of having distributed the obnoxious placards, but of those also in whose possession it might be found, and more than twenty persons were brought to the stake. Among these we find Augereau, the printer of the "Miroir" of Queen Marguerite, of which we have spoken above. On his return to Paris in the following January, the king took part in an expiatory procession of the most imposing character, which traversed the streets of Paris to the Cathedral of Nôtre-Dame; and the more effectually to atone for the insult offered to the Holy Sacrament, six Protestants were executed with special refinements of cruelty. A few days afterwards sentence of death was published against all heretics, as well as those who should harbour them, and this decree continued in force until, five months afterwards, the Pope himself interposed to obtain a mitigation of its rigour. Fortunately for himself, Marot was absent from Paris when the placard was published, but his house was searched, and his name appears as the seventh in a list of persons ordered to return to the capital within three days, on pain of banishment or death. His first impulse was to seek the king at Amboise, but Francis was not in a mood to afford him any protection. On second thoughts Marot resolved to leave France, and fled, in the first instance, to the court of his friend Queen Marguerite, equally the resort of artists and men of letters, and a refuge for the Huguenots in time of persecution. But Marguerite's influence was then weak, and she had to act cautiously herself, and Marot, feeling that his safety would be better insured by placing a greater distance between himself and France, withdrew to the Court of Renée, Duchess of Ferrara, leaving his young son with Marguerite, who took him into the number of her pages.

* These were young people of every class, who composed and played farces and moralities. Their chief was called the "prince," or, "roi des sots." They were the rivals of the "clercs de la bazoché," or, "bazochiens."—D'Ortigue, "Dictionnaire de Plain Chant," p. 553.

† Anne of Brittany died in 1514, and on the accession of Francis to the throne in the following year, he appointed Jehan Marot to the post of valet of the wardrobe.

‡ He edited a collection of Marot's works in 1731.

Renée was the daughter of Louis XII. and Anne of Brittany, to whose service Jehan Marot had once been attached. Eighteen years younger than her cousin, she, like Marot, had felt the influence of Marguerite, and resembled her in her taste for letters and inclination to the reformed doctrines, whose professors frequently found at Ferrara a refuge from persecution. On his arrival in that city Marot was received with favour, and soon afterwards appointed poet and secretary to the Duchess. It was while residing at her court that he first met the man with whom he was destined to be associated at Geneva six years later.

In 1534 Calvin, then twenty-five years of age, had abandoned the church of Rome. Leaving France soon afterwards he went first to Strasburg, then to Basle, and, in the month of March, 1536, paid a short visit to Italy. There he remained about a month or five weeks, of which time he spent the greater part at Ferrara. But there is no evidence that any intimacy was then formed between Calvin and Marot. The characters of the austere and stern theologian and of the witty poet of the court were too discordant to admit of friendship, and no trace appears of any subsequent correspondence between them until 1542, when Marot was again obliged to seek safety in flight from his native country. Calvin returned to Basle about the month of May, and shortly afterwards the French colony at Ferrara was broken up. The Duke had sided with the Pope and the Emperor in the war in which the latter was then engaged with France, and, fearing that the influence of the French by whom his wife was surrounded might be prejudicial to the public interests, banished them in a body from his dominions. Marot retired to Venice.

Of all the States of Italy, Venice was then the one that afforded the greatest facilities for the propagation of the new opinions, and the safest asylum to those who suffered for their adherence to them. Well aware of the ambition of the Roman Court, and jealous of any encroachment on its own authority, the Senate had uniformly resisted all attempts to introduce the Inquisition, and was cautious in allowing the edicts of the Vatican to be promulgated or carried into effect within the limits of the Republic. Venice had long been distinguished for the number of her printers and publishers; the works of the Protestants of Germany and Switzerland were consigned to merchants in the town, and by them circulated through every part of Italy; and it was chiefly at Venice that versions of the Bible and other religious works were printed in the vernacular tongue.*

Here, besides security, Marot found congenial society, but he still felt himself an exile, and longed to revisit his family and native land. Neither a poetical epistle which he addressed to the king from Ferrara, nor the intercession of Marguerite proved of any avail. He now besought the good offices of the Dauphin, but received no reply, and that young prince died shortly afterwards. At last the efforts of his friends proved successful, and in the latter part of 1536 Marot was permitted to return to France. After a short stay at Lyons he resumed his residence in Paris, and in the following year was reinstated in his former position at the court.

In the preceding lines we have endeavoured to draw a brief outline of Marot's life up to the time when he produced those versions of the psalms, in connection with which his name is best known at the present day. M. Douen has given numerous extracts from his miscellaneous writings, many passages of which throw considerable light on his personal history,† but it is foreign to our purpose to notice these in detail, and we now proceed to lay before our readers the results of recent investigations into the literary history of Marot's psalms and the psalters for which they furnish the text.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. X.—BERLIOZ (continued from page 234).

SOON after the events narrated in the chapter immediately preceding, a professorship of harmony became vacant at the Conservatoire, and Berlioz applied for it. This brought about another interview with the "grim Florentine," who, we are told, began the conversation in the sweetest voice at his command:—

"C. You offer yourself for the harmony class?"

"B. Yes, sir.

"C. Ah!—but, you see—you will have that class!—your reputation, however—your connections—

"B. So much the better, sir, I have asked for it in order to have it.

"C. Yes, but—that is what troubles me—I have wished to give the place to another.

"B. In that case, sir, I withdraw my application.

* See Maccrie, "History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy in the 16th century," p. 89, cited by Douen.

† Those who desire to pursue the subject further may consult the excellent sketch by Mr. Henry Morley, entitled "Clément Marot and other studies," 1871. A few of Mr. Morley's details, however, must be corrected by the work of M. Douen.

"C. No, no, I don't desire that, because, you see, it will be declared that I was the cause of your action.

"B. Well, then, I remain in the ranks.

"C. I tell you that you will have the place if you persist, and—I never intended it for you.

"B. What is to be done?

"C. You know that it is necessary—it is necessary—it is necessary to be a pianist to teach harmony at the Conservatoire; you know it, my dear—

"B. It is necessary to be a pianist? Ah! I never suspected that. That is an excellent reason. I will write to you and say that, not being a pianist, I cannot aspire to profess harmony at the Conservatoire, and that I withdraw my candidature.

"C. Yes, my dear—but—but—but I do not wish to be the cause of your—

"B. No, far from that. Of course I ought to withdraw, having been stupid enough to forget that one must be a pianist to teach harmony.

"C. Yes, my dear—come, let us embrace. You know how I love you.

"B. Oh! yes, sir, I know."

The exquisite humour of this scene would be spoilt by comment, but we should add that Berlioz, who enjoyed it immensely, went away priding himself on the consideration which kept him from saying to Cherubini, "Since you cannot play the piano, how do you yourself contrive to teach harmony?" He did better to wait, and, as he waited, the opportunity came, after its manner in such cases.

"I had a seat in the parterre of the Opéra when his (Cherubini's) 'Ali Baba' was produced. This work, everybody agrees, is one of the palest and most empty from his pen. Towards the end of the first act, tired of listening to nothing in particular, I could not help saying, loud enough to be heard by my neighbours, 'I'll give twenty francs for an idea.' In the middle of the second act, irritated by the same musical mirage, I went on bidding, 'Forty francs for an idea.' The finale began: 'Eighty francs for an idea.' The finale ended, I rose, threw out these words, 'Ah! ma foi, I am not rich enough; I withdraw,' and went away. Two or three young men, seated near me on the same bench, looked indignant. They were pupils of the Conservatoire who had been placed there to usefully admire their director's work. They did not forget, as I learned afterwards, to go the next day and tell him of my insolent offer, and my more insolent discouragement."

At this time Berlioz accepted an engagement to write on musical subjects for the Journal des Débats, with which his name will ever be connected. It is singular that the man who used his pen with so much vivacity and distinctiveness, hated the employment beyond measure, and professed that the announcement of a first performance requiring his attendance and notice made him ill. On this matter, let us give his own words:—

"This task, always renewing itself, poisoned my life. However, apart from the pecuniary means it brought me—means I could not afford to sacrifice—it was almost impossible for me to give it up, under pain of being helpless in presence of the furious and nearly countless hatreds it had raised against me. For the press, in a certain connection, is more precious than the lance of Achilles; not only does it cure, at times, the wounds which it has made, but again, it acts as a defence to those who serve it. However, to what miserable shifts am I not driven!—what circumlocution in order to avoid telling the truth!—what concessions made to social relations, and even to public opinion!—what rage repressed!—what shame swallowed! And they find me passionate, wicked, contemptible! Ah! cads who treat me thus, if I were to speak my full mind, you would see that the bed of nettles upon which you say I stretch you, is a bed of roses compared with the grill whereon you would frizzle."

To this last adjuration every man prominent among critics, as was Berlioz, adds, we doubt not, his fervent "Amen." On the same subject, our master continues:—

"I must do myself the justice to say that, on no account whatever, have I withheld the fullest expression of esteem, admiration, or enthusiasm for works and for men who have inspired me with those feelings. I have [warmly] praised men who had done me injury and with whom I had ceased to have personal relations. Indeed, the only compensation that the press has afforded me for much suffering has been the way opened for my sympathy with the grand, the true, and the beautiful wherever I have found them. It appears to me sweet to praise a talented enemy, and, besides, it is a duty which an honest man should be proud to discharge; just the same as a misleading word, written in favour of a friend without ability, should cause pain. In both cases, however, as all critics know, the man who hates you, furious at the merit that you seem to acquire by publicly and warmly praising him, execrates you more; and the man who loves you, always discontented with the credit you have painfully given him, loves you less."

The connection of Berlioz with the Journal des Débats brought him, however, a prospect of more than shame and suffering. One day, the editor, M. Bertin, said to his musical critic, "My dear friend, your position is now made. I have spoken about you to the Minister of the Interior, and he has decided to give you, notwithstanding Cherubini's opposition, a composition class at the Conservatoire, with a salary of 1,500 francs, and, more, a pension of 4,500 francs from the funds of his department destined for the encouragement of fine arts. With 6,000 francs a year you will be free from all disquietude, and able to give yourself up freely to composition." M. Bertin's words were repeated to Berlioz by the chief of the division of fine arts, and naturally called forth the warmest gratitude. But "put not your trust in princes" or in their ministers. Berlioz tells us (using large capitals): "This promise, made spontaneously to a man who asked nothing, was no better kept than so many others, and from that time to the present moment I have heard no more about it."

Belonging to this period of the master's career are several letters not unworthy of attention here. One, addressed to Hofmeister, the Leipzig publisher, contains a strong remonstrance against the injustice done to the overture "Les Francs Juges," in an arrangement issued by him for four hands, and actually attributed to the composer. About the particulars we need not trouble ourselves, but the following passages are of interest:—

"Your arranger has cut my score, pared it, trimmed it, and stitched it in such a fashion that I see in many parts only something to laugh at, the honour of which I beg him to keep to himself. If a Beethoven or a Weber had taken a similar liberty in my case, I should have submitted without murmuring to that which, nevertheless, I could only regard as a cruel humiliation; but neither Weber nor Beethoven would ever have made me suffer thus. If the work is bad, they would not trouble to touch it; if it had seemed to them good, they would have respected the form, the thought, the details, and even the faults. Besides, men of that stamp not being more common in Germany than elsewhere, I have reason to believe that my overture has not fallen into the hands of a very extraordinary musician."

After pointing out the particular faults of the arrangement, and indicating the only adaptation of which he approved, Berlioz thus concludes: "As for every other publication of the same kind dealing with this work, whether attributed to me or not, I disown it formally, and upon this I pray God to pardon the arrangers as I pardon them." The petition is perhaps scarcely definite enough for those whom it concerns, but others can sympathise with the righteous indignation of a composer who sees his music maltreated, and the guilt of the maltreatment laid at his own door.

Another letter, addressed to Robert Schumann, expresses the gratitude of Berlioz for the production at Leipzig by that master of the overture just named. Schumann, having carefully studied and rehearsed the work, introduced it with success to the German audience, and the result, by comparison with failure elsewhere, gave our composer a text upon which he did not fail to preach. At least one part of the sermon has an interest for English readers:—

"Will you convey my thanks to the artists? Their patience in studying this difficult piece has the greater value in my eyes because I have not had much occasion to praise that of several musical societies who have made the same attempt. Save those of Douai and Dijon, they have become discouraged after a first rehearsal, and the work, after being lacerated in a thousand ways, has perforce returned to the bookshelves as worthy, at most, to figure in a collection of monstrosities. It even appears that a trial of this kind diverted the London Philharmonic Society. . . . Picture to yourself, in effect, movements forced at the double in the adagio; dragged back proportionately in the allegro, so as to produce that flattened out (aplatissant) mezzo termine insupportable to all who possess the smallest musical sentiment; imagine violins deciphering at first eight passages difficult enough despite the tempo confortabile at which the allegro is taken; the trombones starting ten or twelve bars too soon; the drummer losing his head in the rhythm à trois temps, and you will have an idea of the delectable charivari resulting. I do not dispute the ability of 'M.M. les Philharmoniques de l'Argyle Room' (sic). Heaven preserve me from doing so! I point out only the strange way in which they conduct their rehearsals. No doubt, we here often make bad music at the first trial of a new piece; but as, in our judgment, nobody, not even English artists, possesses inborn science, and there is no shame in studying with attention and courage that which cannot be understood all at once, we begin again three times, four times, ten times, if necessary, and that for several days in succession. In that way we secure a performance nearly always correct; sometimes surprising."

Berlioz then goes on to tell Schumann that he regretted the publication of his overture, that he had declined offers to print his symphonies, and that he held it better for a composer to keep his works for a long while under fatherly care:—

"I love them, these poor children, with a paternal love which has nothing Spartan about it, and I a thousand times prefer keeping them in obscurity, but intact, to sending them abroad in search of glory or of frightful wounds and death. At the risk of appearing ridiculous, I must say that I have never understood how rich painters are able, without internal gripings, to separate themselves from their finest works for a certain number of crowns, and to spread them over the four quarters of the world, as is their constant practice. . . . The writers of poetry and prose are alone able to sell their works without running too much risk of seeing them disfigured, like musicians, and without the pain of never seeing them again, like painters. . . . It is an intense joy for the composer to brood over his work, so to speak; to shield it as long as possible from the storms which bad orchestras, bad singers, bad directors, and the traders in contre-danses call up around it; there is for him an unspeakable happiness in letting it see daylight only at long intervals, when assiduous care has given to its beauty all its distinction, when the air is pure, the weather soft and serene, and the society select. The number of compositions that one is able, without condemning them to absolute obscurity, thus to tear for long out of the teeth of the press, that lion querens quem devorat, is unhappily but few; let us not further limit them."

A third letter is one in which Berlioz gossips to Liszt in his best style, as a mere retailer of Parisian news, "without passion, without blame or praise; in a word, with the calm insipidity of an adept of that famous philosophic school which we founded in Rome in the year of grace 1830, and had for title 'School of Absolute Indifference to Universal Matter.'" Some of his gossip is worth hearing at this distance of time. He meets, on the Boulevard, the violinist Batta, just arrived from London:—

"Berlioz. What are they doing in London?

"B. Absolutely nothing; they despise music, poetry, drama, everything there, except the Italian Opera, where the Queen's presence attracts a crowd; all the other musical enterprises are abandoned. . . . I arrived too late, and it is the same with Artot, who, despite his success at the Philharmonic, despite the incontestable beauty of his talent, has a tedious time of it.

"Berlioz. And Doehler?

"B. Doehler is dull also.

"Berlioz. And Thalberg?

"B. Thalberg cultivates the provinces.

"Berlioz. And Benedict?

"B. Encouraged by the vogue of his first work, he is writing an English opera."

Then Batta invites Berlioz to meet him at Charles Hallé's, where they mean to drink beer and make music:—

"M. Hallé is a young German pianist, who has long hair, who is tall and thin, who plays the piano magnificently, who understands music before he has read it—that is to say, he is inclined to resemble thee. I found his countryman, Heller, at his house. Serious talent, vast musical intelligence, rapid conception, great executive power—such are the qualities as composer and pianist with which all those credit him who know him well, and I am of the number. Hallé and Batta made us hear a Sonata in B flat of Felix Mendelssohn. The learned texture and firm style of this piece was much admired. 'He is a great master,' said Heller. We chorused the remark as we drank our beer. Then came the Sonata in A major of Beethoven, the first movement drawing from the auditory exclamations, asseverations, cries of enthusiasm. The menuet and finale only redoubled our intense musical exaltation, the more because champagne was then going round."

Berlioz was now engaged in writing his opera "Benvenuto Cellini," which work the Director of the Opéra had accepted "in order to please the Journal des Débats." The task was accomplished with difficulty, and would not, the master tells us, have been got through at all but for the kindness of Ernest Legouvé:—

"A man who writes an opera should be free from all other work, that is to say, his means of living should be assured him for the necessary time. But this was far from being my case; I lived from day to day only on the articles I wrote for the papers, and these took up my time almost exclusively. I did my best to give two months to my score in the first flush of the fever with which it inspired me; the imperative need, however, soon came to drop the pen of the composer, in order to use with all my might that of the critic. This gave me an indescribable heartache. But I could not hesitate. I had a wife and son; could I allow them to want the necessities of life?"

In the midst of this trouble came Legouvé:—

"L. Where is your opera?"

"B. I have not yet finished the first act. I cannot find time to work at it.

"L. But if you had the time?"

"B. Parbleu! Then I should write from morning till night.

"L. What do you want in order to be free?"

"B. The two thousand francs which I have not got.

"L. And if some one. . . . If some one were to—come, why don't you help me?"

"B. What! What do you say?"

"L. Well, if one of your friends were to lend you the money? . . .

"B. What friend could I ask for such a sum?"

"L. There is no need to ask for it. I offer it."

Berlioz adds: "I leave others to imagine my delight. Legouvé lent me the money the next day, thanks to which I was able to finish 'Benvenuto.' Excellent heart! Worthy and charming man! Distinguished writer, artist himself, he had divined my suffering, and, in his exquisite delicacy, he feared to give me pain when offering the means to end it!"

The rehearsals of "Benvenuto" were the reverse of pleasant to Berlioz. Duponchel, the Director of the Opéra, looked upon the composer as a "sort of fool," whose music was a tissue of extravagances, and he avowedly determined to produce the work "not because of its music, which he well knew to be absurd, but because of the drama, which he found charming." The Director's hostility to Berlioz was soon reflected in the attitude of the company, from Habeneck downwards. However, the opera was played (September 3, 1838), and Berlioz himself tells us with what result. "They awarded the overture an exaggerated success, and hissed all the rest with admirable unanimity and energy." This judgment, however, the composer did not accept. Fourteen years later, he went through the score in the light of enlarged experience and more cultured taste, and saw in it a "variety of ideas, an impetuous verve, and a flood of musical colour" which deserved a better fate. Among the minority of the audience was Paganini, who went away and said, "If I were director of the Opéra, I would engage that young man this very day to write three other works; I would give him his price in advance, and reap a harvest of gold." It may have been that a sense of injustice done prompted the great violinist to the liberal action which now awaits notice.

In the December following, Berlioz gave two concerts at the Conservatoire, of which the first no more than covered its expenses. To do better with the second, the master announced his two symphonies, the "Fantastique" and "Harold," which had the result of attracting Paganini, who, though its suggester, had never heard the last-named composition. At the close of the performance, Paganini went to Berlioz, accompanied by his son, Achille, and the following scene took place:—

"In consequence of an affection of the larynx, which ultimately killed him, he (Paganini) had entirely lost his voice, and only his son, when in a place perfectly silent, could hear or, perhaps, guess at his words. He made a sign to the boy, who, mounting on a chair, placed his ear to his father's mouth and listened attentively. Presently Achille got down and turned towards me. 'My father,' he said, 'desires me to assure you, sir, that in all his life he has never received an impression from any concert as from this; that your music has quite upset him, and that he cannot resist throwing himself at your knees to thank you.' At these strange words I made a gesture of incredulity and confusion, but Paganini took me by the arm, and mustering all his voice said, 'Yes! yes!' drew me into the room where many of my musicians still were, went down on his knee and kissed my hand."

Stopping in the street to tell this story to M. Bertin, his editor, Berlioz caught cold, and was on a sick bed when Achille Paganini came saying, "My father will be very sorry to learn that you are still unwell, and, if he were not himself suffering, he would call upon you. Here is a letter he desired me to bring." As Berlioz was about to unseal it, the boy stopped him: "There is no answer needed; my father told me that you should read it when you were alone." He then hurried away. The letter ran thus:—

"My dear Friend,—Beethoven dead, only Berlioz is able to make him live again, and I, who have tasted your divine compositions, worthy of a genius such as you—I believe it my duty to beg your kind acceptance, as homage on my part, of twenty thousand francs, which will be paid on presentation of the inclosed. Believe me always, your affectionate NICOLÒ PAGANINI."

Pale and overwhelmed, Berlioz held the letter in his hand as his wife entered the room.

"She cried, 'Allons! what is it now? Some new misfortune? But let us take heart. We have endured the others.' 'No, no! on the contrary!' 'What then?' 'Paganini!' 'Well?' 'He has sent me—twenty thousand francs!' 'Louis! Louis!' cried Henriette, distractedly, running to my son, who was playing in the next room, 'come, come here to your father! come and thank the good God for what He has done for your father!' Then my wife and child, running together, fell prostrate by the side of my bed, the mother praying, the astonished boy by her side joining his little hands. O Paganini! what a scene! If you had only been able to witness it!"

As soon as possible Berlioz wrote to his benefactor in the following terms:—

"O worthy and great artist! How can I express my thankfulness? I am not rich, but, believe me, the approbation of a man of genius such as you touches me a thousand times more than the royal generosity of your present. Words fail me; I will run to embrace you the moment I am able to quit my bed, where I am still detained."

Paganini's generous behaviour led to much "envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness" among those who thought Berlioz undeserving, either absolutely or by comparison with themselves. On the other hand, Jules Janin wrote a glowing article in the Journal des Débats, and sent a private letter to the master, which is of interest, as showing the enthusiasm Berlioz was able to excite in a man like Janin:—

"Dear Berlioz,—I am absolutely bound to tell you of all my happiness on reading this morning the good and beautiful lettre de change et de gloire you have received from the illustrious Paganini. I do not speak of you; I do not speak only of the fortune which he has given you—three years of leisure, the time to produce masterpieces—I speak of that great name of Beethoven by which he has saluted you. And what more noble contradiction to give to the small people who have chosen not to recognise your 'Cellini' as the brother of 'Fidelio'? Then let Paganini be praised as his good actions deserve, and let him be henceforth inviolable. He has been great and generous towards you; more generous than a king, than a minister, than any European artists—the veritable kings of men. He has sustained you with his approbation and his fortune; it is therefore more than ever an obligation to praise this great musician, who has taken you by the hand. Dear Berlioz, I embrace you very tenderly, in all the joy of my heart."

As soon as Berlioz was able to leave his room, he hastened to Paganini's house:—

"They tell me that he is walking up and down his billiard-room alone. I enter; we embrace each other without power to say a word. After some minutes, as I faltered out I know not what expressions of gratitude, Paganini, whose words the silence of the room permitted me to hear, stopped me saying: 'Don't speak any more about that. No. Add nothing. It has given me the most profound satisfaction I ever experienced in my life. You will never know what emotions your music excited; for years past I have not felt anything like it.'"

Berlioz then went home; paid his debts, found a good sum left to live upon yet awhile, and set about writing "Roméo et Juliette." In seven months that great work was completed, and introduced to the public by three successive performances under its composer's direction. But the man who had made its creation possible was not present:—

"To my great regret Paganini never heard or read it. I hoped always for his return to Paris. I waited, moreover, for the work to be revised and printed to send him a copy, but meanwhile he died at Nice, leaving me, amid so many other poignant sorrows, in ignorance as to whether he would have deemed worthy a work written to please him before all, and with the intention to justify in his own eyes that which he had done for the author. He himself seemed to regret much not knowing 'Roméo et Juliette,' and said so in a letter from Nice dated January 7, 1840, where also occurs this phrase, 'Now all is done, envy can only keep silent.'"

But if envy closed her mouth, criticism did not.

"Poor dear, great friend! he had never read, happily, the horrible stupidities written in several Parisian journals about the plan of the work, the Introduction, the Adagio, the Queen Mab, the recitative of Friar Laurence. One reproached me for the extravagance of attempting this new form of symphony; another found in the scherzo of Queen Mab only a petty grotesque noise, like that of syringes badly greased. A third, in speaking of the love-scene of the Adagio, of the piece which three-fourths of the musicians of Europe, who know it, put at the head of all I have written, declared that I had not comprehended Shakespeare. Frog puffed up with silliness, when thou canst prove that to me. . . . Never did criticisms more unexpected, more cruelly wound me; and, as usual, none of the Aristarchs who wrote for or against the work pointed out one of its defects, which I successively corrected later, as I was able to discern them."

MR. PEPYS THE MUSICIAN

By FRANCIS HUEFFER.

VI.

THE name of Lawes occurs altogether six times in the Diary, and in one instance Mr. Pepys has further specified the person he means by adding the Christian name, "Will." The editor accordingly immediately comes to the conclusion that the other five entries refer to the same person—another instance of how carelessly the subject of music has been treated in the notes. A very moderate acquaintance with the history of English art would have sufficed to distinguish William

Lawes, the psalm composer, from his greater and more famous brother, Henry, the friend of Milton. To begin with the lesser light, we find that on November 7, 1660, Lord Sandwich, after a long and confidential talk with his humble kinsman and retainer, "called for the fiddles and books, and we two and W. Howe and Mr. Childe did sing some psalmes of Will. Lawes's and some songs, and so I went away." The same William Lawes, no doubt, is meant when Pepys describes another musical gathering at Lord Sandwich's house, December 14, 1662, "where Mr. Howe and Pagett the counsellor; we sang some psalms of Mr. Lawes and played some symphonys between till night"; and again a year and some months later, where the Diarist after a "very merry dinner" repairs with Mr. Blagrove "to his chamber and there we sang a Psalm or two of Lawes's." This William Lawes, it is perhaps desirable to add, was Henry's elder brother and a pupil of the John Cooper who Italianised his good English name into Coperario, and acquired a certain reputation as a composer and performer on the lute. William Lawes being, like most musicians of the time, a staunch Royalist, fought for his king, and was killed at the siege of Chester, fifteen years before the beginning of the Diary. But his music was evidently still popular when Pepys wrote.

Henry Lawes, who survived his brother by many years, is of course of infinitely greater importance, and we find this fact reflected in the references made to him in the Diary. Not that these are more numerous than those referring to his brother, but their nature sufficiently shows the deep interest taken in his work by Pepys, who in this, as in other instances, displays his critical acumen. Whether he was personally acquainted with the composer does not appear; there is every possibility that he was, for Henry Lawes survived the evil days of the Commonwealth, regained all his honours at Court, and lived to set for the coronation of Charles II. the anthem "Zadok the priest," so famous in English church history. He died in 1662.

The first notice of him in the Diary occurs as early as May 31, 1660, and is to this effect: "All the morning making orders. After dinner a great while below in the great cabin trying with W. Howe some of Mr. Law's songs, particularly that of 'What is a kiss?' with which we had a great deal of pleasure; after that to making of orders again."

I confess that I have not been able to trace a song with the beginning above quoted amongst the works of any of the Lawes's; and Mr. R. Lane Poole, of the musical department of the British Museum, to whose courteous assistance I am much indebted, informs me that he has in vain searched for it amongst the MS. and printed collections of the Museum. From internal evidence, however, it seems to me most probable that Henry Lawes is the composer, for the reason, amongst others, that a few months afterwards Mr. Pepys refers again to some songs by Mr. Lawes—this time undoubtedly Henry. The passage is this:—

"So home, and there had a fire in my closet, and fell to entering these two good songs of Mr. Lawes, 'Helpe, helpe, O helpe,' and 'O God of Heaven and Hell,' in my song book, to which I have got Mr. Childe to set the base to the Theorbo, and that done, to bed."

Here we are on safe ground. Both songs occur in that interesting collection, "The second book of Ayres and Dialogues for one, two, and three voyces, by Henry Lawes, servant to his late Ma^{tie} in his publick and private musick. (London: Playford, 1655)."

The song first mentioned by Pepys is entitled "A Storme," and bears the character of a monologue.

Chloris at sea, near the land, is surprised by a storm. Amintor on the shore, expecting her arrival, thus complains:—

Help, help, O help, Divinity of Love,
Or Neptune will commit a rape upon my Cloris,
She's on his bosom, &c.

The music is of a declamatory character, and depicts the situation of the unfortunate Amintor with considerable force.

More dramatic, however, and infinitely more interesting is the second song referred to in the Diary, which occurs at page 47 of the same volume. It is entitled "Orpheus' Hymn to God," and bears the Greek motto, Αἰθέρος ἦδ' αἰδῶν. The first stanza may be quoted here:—

King of Heav'n and Hell, of Sea and Earth,
Who shak'st the world when thou shout'st thunder forth,
Whom Devils dread, and Hosts of Heaven praise;
Eternal cause who on the winds doth ride:
Whom Fate (which master's all things else) obeys;
And Nature's face with thick dark clouds dost hide.

The musical treatment is highly characteristic of Lawes, and of the school to which he belongs. Again, the declamatory element prevails over the melodious, and very quaint, amongst other things, is the long roll of semiquavers to the word thunder, which Purcell seems to have imitated in a famous passage. Altogether the two songs are very interesting, and few modern critics will differ from Mr. Pepys' statement that they are good.

There is yet another reference to Lawes, occurring in a passage which is amusingly characteristic of the Diarist and his surroundings. As the end of our converse with Mr. Pepys is drawing nigh, the reader will probably not object to spending another Sunday in that worthy's company.

"Nov. 19, 1665. (Lord's Day.) Up, and after being trimmed, alone by water to Erith, all the way with my song-book, singing of Mr. Lawes's long recitative song in the beginning of his book. Being come there, on board my Lord Brouncker, I find Captain Cocke and other company, the lady not well, and mighty merry we were; Sir Edmond Pooley being very merry and a right English gentleman, and one of the discontented cavaliers, that think their loyalty is not considered. After dinner, all on shore to my Lady Williams and there drank and talked; but Lord! the most impertinent bold woman with my Lord that ever I did see. I did give her an account again of my business with my lord touching W. Howe, and she did give me some more information about it and examination taken about it, and so we parted and took boat, and to Woolwich, where we found my wife not well, and I out of humour begun to dislike her paynting, the last things not pleasing me so well as the former, but I blame myself for my being so little complaisant. So without eating or drinking, there being no wine (which vexed me too), we walked with a lanthorne to Greenwich and eat something at his house, and so home to bed."

The "long recitative song" which cheered Mr. Pepys's long row to Erith, although not named by him, may be easily identified. It is evidently the one given to "Ariadne sitting upon a rock in the Island of Naxos, deserted by Theseus," opening the first book of the "Ayres and Dialogues" before quoted. And here again Pepys shows his keen perception of the characteristics belonging, not only to a single piece, but to a whole school of music. Lawes's songs, even those of the most lyrical type, partake of the nature of the recitative in the sense that the declamatory element is never lost sight of. His treatment of the words is always most careful and refined, as careful as in Liszt, or Wagner, or Robert Franz. As in these modern composers, his poetry and his music are always wedded together inseparably; the one growing out of the other with almost organic consistency. How this can be done without any loss of lyrical impulse or melodic beauty, is shown most eminently by such a song as "When I listen to thy voice" to beautiful words by Waller. For in those days English composers loved to draw their inspiration from the leading English poets, justly avoiding the inane sentimentalities which nowadays pass as the most appropriate "words for music." It was to this quality that Lawes owed the tribute of his great friend Milton, embodied in the lines frequently, but not too frequently, quoted:—

Harry, whose tuneful and well-measured song,
First taught our English music how to span
Words with just note and accent, not to scan
With Mida's ears, committing short and long.

Milton in his just admiration of his friend is, however, led into slightly overstating his case. English composers before Lawes knew that in vocal music the just and harmonious emphasis of the words is of paramount importance; and the greatest English poet had already insisted upon the fact that

... music and sweet poetry agree
As they must needs, the sister and the brother
* * * * *
One God is God of both, as poets feign.

In brief the English school of music, when there was an English school, was essentially of a declamatory, and would have been had it lived of an essentially dramatic kind. The fact cannot be stated too emphatically in these days, when it has become the custom to call that hideous excrescence of modern times, the drawing-room ballad—with its mechanical repetition of one tune through all the stanzas in spite of divergences of text, its commonplace harmonies, its religious avoidance of anything like decent poetry—the "English song" or ballad par excellence. The name is a misnomer in every sense, excepting perhaps the one that in every country but England composers and singers of repute would refuse to descend to this style of composition. Apart from this, the modern ballad of the kind alluded to has nothing English about it; neither with English folk-song nor with English art-song has it anything in common. Its model, on the contrary, must be discovered in fifth- and sixth-rate German composers, Abt, and Kücken, and Gumbert, et hoc genus omne.

It is perhaps hardly necessary to add that these remarks are not intended to condemn at one fell swoop the entire song literature of modern England. Such a masterpiece as Mr. Hatton's "To Anthea," and all his settings of Herrick, would be alone sufficient to show that the spirit of Lawes and Purcell is still alive amongst us, and he is fortunately not alone in his endeavours to revive the purer spirit of English lyrical music.

But to return to Pepys. His remarks on the subject of English musicians should be supplemented by a few references to foreign schools of art, or rather to that one foreign school which in those days had real and international importance—the Italian. And here again we observe the same justness of view, the same catholicity of taste. The name which is foremost in one's mind if one speaks of Italian music in the second half of the seventeenth century is Carissimi, the last great representative of the Roman School, and himself the precursor and model of a number of great musicians in his own country, of Lulli in France, and through him of Humphreys and Purcell in England. One accordingly finds that a leading place in the Diary is granted to Carissimi. "Baptista," writes Pepys (February 12, 1667), "tells me that Giacomo Charissimi is still alive at Rome, who was master to Vinncotio, who is one of the Italians that the King hath here, and the chief composer of them," and we have already witnessed his modest admiration of the "best piece of musique counted of all hands in the world made by Signor Charissimi."

To conclude, let us say a few words of the Italian musicians in London with whom Mr. Pepys came into contact. The Baptista just referred to, who supplied Mr. Pepys with foreign information, is Giovanni Battista Draghi, a fertile composer frequently and admiringly referred to in the Diary, e.g.: "Feb. 12, 1667. With my Lord Brounker by coach to his house, there to hear some Italian musique; and there we met Tom Killigrew, Sir Robert Murray, and the Italian, Signor Baptista, who hath composed a play in Italian for the Opera, which T. Killigrew do intend to have up; and here he did sing one of the acts. He himself is the poet as well as the musician, which is very much; and did sing the whole from the words without any musique prickt, and played all along upon a harpsicon most admirably, and the composition most excellent. The words I did not understand, and so knew not how they are fitted, but believe very well, and all in the recitativo very fine. But I perceive there is a proper accent in every country's discourse, and that do reach in their setting of notes to words, which therefore cannot be natural to any body else but them; so that I am not so much smitten with it as I should be if I were acquainted with their accent. But the whole composition is certainly most excellent; and the poetry T. Killigrew and Sir R. Murray, who understood the words, did say was excellent. I confess I was mightily pleased with the musique. He pretends not to voice, though it be good, but not excellent."

Draghi subsequently learnt to write to English words, and composed, amongst other things, part of the music to D'Urfey's comic opera, "Wonders in the Sun."

Another Italian musician, Cesare Morelli, stood to Mr. Pepys in the relation of teacher and humble friend. A letter from him, written in curious French, shows what Mr. Pepys's kindness and helpfulness were believed to be by his acquaintances. It may fitly conclude the present instalment:—

"STELLA": LYRICAL DRAMA BY AUTERI-MANZOCCHI.

AMONG the many losses, social, artistic, and pecuniary, which Florence has sustained since she ceased to be the capital of Italy, none is perhaps more keenly felt than the loss of good opera. Italians are so fond of theatres and outward show, that they will at any time build ornamental opera-houses rather than schools or other public edifices of more immediate and practical utility; and to that rule Florence is no exception. During the few years that she enjoyed the privilege of being the capital of Italy, two or three new opera-houses were opened, in addition to those already existing; and hence, when the short reign of glory came to an end, the Florentines found to their surprise and dismay, that they had on their hands no less than five of these temples of art, viz., the Pagliano, the Pergola, the Nuovo, the Politeama, and the Niccolini, offering accomodation to at least nine or ten thousand persons in the aggregate. Florence paid dearly for her characteristic improvidence and love of show, for the opera rapidly declined, and all those spacious and handsome houses are now open for hardly three months in the year, and that only at intervals. It is only within the last six months that the fair Tuscan capital has begun to show some signs of recovery from the state of bankruptcy and despondency into which she had fallen, and that in instrumental and dramatic music too there has been perceptible a certain revival. The only new opera produced at the Pagliano theatre during the short winter season was Signor Auteri's "Stella," which, for Florence, was put on the stage in a remarkably complete manner: and certainly, its lyrical and dramatic merits entitle it to a more than passing notice.

As yet, Signor Auteri's name is probably little known beyond the borders of Italy, although in his native country the young composer, a Sicilian by birth, has already achieved considerable success. His first compositions: six songs, or "melodie per camera," were published not many years ago, and not only gave great promise for the future, but offered a pleasing contrast to the namby-pamby songs which Signori Tosti, Rotoli, and other maestri di canto in Italy dedicate to their admiring lady pupils. In 1875 Auteri's first opera, "Dolores," was brought out in Florence at the Pagliano. The Florentines, it is true, pronounced it heavy and monotonous—which means that it was not written after the pattern of Bellini and Donizetti—for, be it observed, even to this day Florence has hardly got beyond that obsolete standard. The criticism, therefore, was worth little or nothing: indeed since then the opera has made its way in spite of the defects of a first work of this kind, and was revived in Rome as recently as last winter. The composer's new opera, "Stella," produced for the first time in Florence in January last, is in every respect a more mature, a more finished, and a more advanced work than "Dolores"; and the three special performances at the Pagliano sufficed to establish it firmly in the public favour. No doubt the unexceptionable way in which it was put on the stage goes far to account for the success it achieved; but the work is in itself so interesting and replete with beauty, both from a lyrical and a dramatic point of view, that its salient features may be briefly noticed here.

Stella, a true child of the lagoon, is the daughter of an honest Venetian fisherman. She is affianced to Lamberto, a young minstrel in her own station of life, who worships her; but she is madly in love with Venerio, a wealthy Venetian noble. Lamberto is far away with his lute, and, whilst her father is out fishing, Stella thinks of Venerio, not without certain doubts as to his professions of love being true and honest. A passing troop of gipsies attract her attention, and she calls them in to know her fate. They tell her that she will live amid surroundings of gold and splendour; and she therefore readily yields to Venerio, who carries her off in his gondola, and makes her, of course, not his wife, but his mistress. While she thus lives in splendour, but is conscious of her disgrace, her poor old father dies with grief and sorrow, in Lamberto's arms; not, however, without enjoining the deceived lover to find out Stella, and tell her that her dying father forgave her. Lamberto discovers that the unfortunate girl is in Venerio's palace; but, tormented with remorse, she can stay no longer under her seducer's roof, and disappears. Reduced to abject poverty, she is begging in front of a church, just as the remains of her father, accompanied by Lamberto and his friends, emerge from it on the way to the last resting-place, whilst close by, on the Grand Canal, passes a gay carnival procession, headed by the richly adorned gondola of Venerio, who is singing a merry barcarole. Stella and Lamberto recognise each other. Lamberto forgives her, and she dies between Venerio, who has hastened to the scene, and Lamberto, who, fulfilling her last wish, pardons even her seducer.

The author of the libretto, it will be seen, has not taken his subject from ancient or modern history, but from one of those domestic dramas which are enacted, alas! but too frequently, and are not peculiar only to the city of the "one more unfortunate." But the surroundings of Venice, the picturesque costumes of the sixteenth century, the contrast between the humble fisherman's cottage on the lagoon and the sumptuous palace of the proud patrician, the grief of the deceived lover and the light-hearted indifference of the licentious noble, and the simple, yet poetical and pathetic language in which the libretto is clothed, make the subject peculiarly attractive. It is a treat for once to miss the classical priests and savage warriors without which a "grand opera" of our day is hardly thought complete.

Signor Auteri's music is marked by great wealth of melody, combined with effective and, in many parts, excellent instrumental writing. As regards the latter, the stringed instruments predominate decidedly throughout the opera, and it is only in the great ensembles and finales that he has recourse to the entire orchestra, which, be it added, he manages with admirable effect. The opera opens with a short prelude, which foreshadows the leading subjects. In the first act may be mentioned Stella's Barcarola, "Sei pur bella o nativa laguna," with the accompaniment of the gondoliers' chorus in the distance; the charming ensemble scene between Stella and the gipsies, "Tutto il passato deggio obliar," with brilliant harp accompaniment; the duet between Venerio and Stella, as also between Landro (Stella's father) and Lamberto. The climax of the opera is in the second act, the scene of which is laid in Venerio's palace. It is during one of the orgies, at which Stella, dressed as an oriental beauty, is the principal figure, that Lamberto's plaintive song is heard on the canal. This song, pathetic and original in the highest sense, he has to repeat before Venerio and his guests; and the climax is reached when Stella, unable to contain herself, makes herself known to Lamberto, and throws herself at his feet. The finale of this act, in which the soprano of the heroine is pitted against the combined forces of the other artists, the full chorus, and the orchestra, is a most powerful and effective piece of writing, though the part assigned to Stella is undoubtedly too fatiguing. The third act—which is, perhaps the least brilliant, but the best of the opera—begins with an air, "O la mia Stella è fuggita," written expressly for Victor Maurel (Venerio), and it is particularly the adagio of this beautiful air which never fails to elicit calls for an encore. It is followed by a graceful orchestral intermezzo for muted strings, descriptive of Stella's sad fate; and the remaining salient features of this act are Venerio's Barcarola, "Nella tua bruna gondola," Stella's pathetic appeal to the bystanders, "Fate la carità," the duet between Stella and Lamberto, "Mira il mio volto pallido," and the scene of Stella's death, which brings the opera to a close. It should be added that the part of the heroine is written for soprano, that of Venerio for baritone, Lamberto being tenor, and Landro bass.

Not the least of Signor Auteri's merits in writing "Stella" is that he has condensed it into three short but effective acts. Throughout he has been very happy in his local colouring, and, although the opera fulfils all the requisites of a modern lyrical drama, it is nowhere burdened with that heavy and noisy instrumentation to which many composers of the day sacrifice every other consideration. The execution of the work redounded greatly to the credit of the composer, who superintended it in person, and no less to Signor Marino Mancinelli, who conducted it in his own masterly manner. It need not be added that Victor Maurel was a magnificent Venerio, though perhaps too grave and dignified for the part of the Venetian noble, who is essentially a Don Giovanni. The part of Lamberto was assigned to Signor Mozzi, a young Italian tenor who sings and acts with great taste, and phrases beautifully, although the timbre of his voice is somewhat dry, and in the upper register has not the ring of a genuine tenor. Signora Derivis, though not a very powerful soprano, acted and sang the part of Stella in excellent style. It need not be added that Signor Auteri met with a very warm reception; and his "Stella" may be classed with the most interesting and valuable lyrical dramas Italy has recently produced.

MUSIC IN ST. PAUL'S.

A MUSICAL contemporary has given the publicity of its columns to a letter on the above subject, and we here propose briefly to deal with such passages in the communication as seem likely to convey a false or, at any rate, an inexact impression. The correspondent—who writes from Reading, signs himself "Old School," and has been an attendant at the Metropolitan Cathedral for thirty years past—brings against the musical authorities of St. Paul's the charge that they have shown a "reckless spirit of innovation." This he supports by assertions, some of which may here be quoted:—

"By the rev. gentleman's (Canon Simpson's) own admission, the music for the services at St. Paul's is selected because it is new—" "Having very accurate recollections of the musical service in former years, I cannot but notice how much is lost by the prohibition of music by the good old Cathedral writers," "—there can be no doubt that he (Canon Simpson) has carried his innovating system much too far. It is overdone altogether—"

In point of fact "Old School" contends that the ancient lights of English church music are put out in favour of the glimmer shed around by their feeble modern successors. It will be observed, however, that although he has Canon Simpson's Report before him, he does not, as our friends north of the Tweed say, "condescend to particulars." We had better supply this omission. On referring to the list of anthems sung in St. Paul's during the year ending last Easter, we find that the three composers most largely drawn upon are Bach, Handel, and Mendelssohn. "Old School," we assume, does not object to these, seeing that two out of the three flourished in the earlier half of the last century, and that the third died more than a generation ago. They, however, were not "good old Cathedral writers" of the description our contemporary's correspondent had in his mind. Let us turn to others more nearly in point, and, allowing ourselves a reasonable latitude of choice, we find that selections from Aldrich have been given twice, from Attwood, nine times; from Battishill, twice; from Blow, once from Boyce, nine times; from Croft, five times; from Crotch, six times; from Farrant, twice; from Gibbons, twice; from Goss, twenty-three times; from Greene, three times; from Humphreys, once; from Nares, once; from Purcell, five times; from Rogers, twice; from Tallis, twice; from Walmisley, four times; and from Wesley, twelve times. These composers, and a few others not specified, are all associated with orthodox Church music, such as is, for good reasons, dear to the heart of many beside "Old School"; and from the cases cited alone we find that during the year ninety-one anthems by "good old Cathedral writers" were heard in St. Paul's. Whether this is a fair proportion must be decided by individual taste, concerning which there is proverbially no disputing. Some amateurs, like "Old School," would open a door of utterance very sparingly to contemporary composers; on the other hand many more, with just as much right to be heard, would be chary of favour to the old masters. What we contend, from the particulars above given, is that the Cathedral composers are not banished from St. Paul's, and that the service lists are not, as "Old School" avers, "little better than an advertising medium for the works of living composers." Adding to the ninety-one anthems by English cathedral writers two hundred and fifty-seven selections from Bach, Handel, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Beethoven, Schubert, and other dead masters, who wrote for the whole world and for all time, we have a total—by no means complete—of three hundred and forty-eight works which do not advertise living men. The reader now sees why it was not convenient for "Old School" to enter into details.

Turning to the use made of composers still living, we find sixteen selections from Barnby, four from Benedict, two from Bridge, nine from Calkin, seven from Elvey, five from Gadsby, four from Garrett, twenty-four from Gounod, eight from Hiller, three from Hopkins, six from Martin, three from Ouseley, twenty-five from Stainer, twenty-five from Sullivan, and numbers less than three from several other composers. Where is the suggestion of an "advertising list" here? Does Benedict need advertising, or Hopkins, or Gounod, or Hiller, or Sullivan? or is there any deficiency in the claim of Barnby, Bridge, Gadsby, Stainer, and the rest—all of whom have been on trial for years past—to the recognition awarded them in the metropolitan church? Let the unbiassed reader decide. "Old School" tells us that "the vast majority (sic) of the new music composed for the church nowadays is so forced and laboured, and there is so little in it that is spontaneous, natural, and fresh, that it inevitably loses by comparison with that of the old English masters." Here, however, we have but an individual opinion, the worth of which cannot be tested because "Old School" keeps back his name. Let us assume that the average value of so many modern anthems is less than the average value of an equal number more than fifty years old, and what then? Is there not all the greater need to encourage rising talent in hope of better results? and does not this justify what, under other circumstances, might be too liberal patronage? The tree of the parable was spared that the servant might dig about it and dung it. "Old School" would cut it down forthwith.

We should feel more respect for "Old School" and his letter had he refrained from a personal attack upon Dr. Stainer. We are not concerned to defend the organist of St. Paul's. Probably he, failing to apprehend the necessity, would not thank us for doing so; besides, he is perfectly able to take care of himself when any real danger arises. We cannot, however, pass over these words: "... There can be no manner of doubt that if Dr. Stainer's opinions were accepted as law in every English cathedral, not a note would be heard of Purcell, Croft, Boyce, or Greene; but there would be a very good deal heard of Dr. Stainer." Into the right or wrong of this offensive imputation it is not worth while to enter; but we would remind "Old School" that when one gentleman makes such an attack upon another he comes forward to do it in his own name. Only cowards lie in wait for their victim, and spring upon him out of the darkness with masks on their faces. Our contemporary's editor seems to have had a notion that in giving facilities for such an assault he was not doing quite right. We assure him that his perception, however faint, was valuable as a perception of fact, and desire for him the courage to act upon it another time.

If England is really a "nation of shopkeepers," there can be little doubt that we are gradually beginning to close our shops a little earlier than we used to do, in order to go out and enjoy ourselves. But, although we may shut up our shops, it will take many years before we can shut up our shop feelings; and this is probably the reason why art—which, in its purest sense, is thoroughly antagonistic with commerce—is still regarded in this country, at least by the majority, as a relaxation from work. Adelaide Sartoris, in her book of sketches called "Past Hours," noticed in our last number, makes her once famous prima donna, Madame de Monferrato, say that when she was singing "to that silent London public, so inanimate, so respectable, and so oppressive," it made her think of the Italians, who, after a great success, would take the horses out of her carriage and draw it home themselves. Now, although we by no means affirm that men should take the place of horses in order to prove their admiration of an artist, one might wish for a little more enthusiasm in the cause than is generally shown by a fashionable audience. Even supposing, however, that the applause and bouquets liberally showered upon favourite vocalists may be considered ample encouragement for operatic artists, when do we ever find more than that a mere passing mark of satisfaction is accorded to those organisers and conductors of exceptionally fine concerts who have done so much to make the general public acquainted with the greatest works of musical art? Strangely indeed, then, would the following paragraph, from a Barcelona paper, read were the incident related as having occurred in the metropolis: "The series of concerts conducted by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller at the Philharmonic Society of Barcelona has proved in every respect most successful. After the performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, with which the last concert concluded, a crowd of enthusiasts accompanied the veteran German musician to his hotel, where it remained for some time outside, until the object of their ovation had repeatedly bowed his acknowledgments from the balcony." Can one, even of our "veteran" musicians, record a similar incident on a similar occasion within his London experiences?

With reference to a long letter from Messrs. Hime and Addison, recently inserted in the Manchester Courier, in which the law relating to the copyright of songs is clearly laid down, a correspondent writes to us soliciting an opinion upon the matter in THE MUSICAL TIMES, and says that he considers the demanding a fee for the performance of works without due notice "an injustice both to the singer and the concert-giver." Now it is clear to us that a man has as much right to be paid for the work of his brain as for the work of his hands; and the fact of this right in musical compositions having only lately been enforced by no means proves it to be an "injustice." For many years, even when copyright was tacitly acknowledged, country theatrical managers acted pieces without making the slightest remuneration to their authors. Applications were made for payment, but precedent was pleaded as an excuse for disregarding these claims, and at length the "Dramatic Authors' Society" was established, which did for authors precisely what the "Copyright and Performing Right Protection Society" does for composers. But then it conducted its affairs in a different manner, for every manager was furnished with a list of the pieces, with the amount to be paid for performance duly stated, whilst the last-named association demands an annual subscription of £10 10s. for the privilege of "representing" any copyright piece, and issues no printed catalogue by which singers or concert-givers can be prevented from incurring a fine. Herein lies, indeed, the "injustice," and against this system every right-minded person must most emphatically protest. Mr. Harry Wall's name has become unenviably notorious, for although he may have the law on his side, it is evident that his method is designedly to keep his victims unconscious of their danger, and then to pounce upon them, backed by the authority of a Society of the very existence of which they were previously unacquainted. So gross a violation of the tacit rules which regulate commercial transactions is so unusual that unsuspecting persons should be warned of the risk they incur whenever an opportunity offers; and we therefore print the following list of "protected" compositions, which has been forwarded to us, with a promise that we will add to it from time to time the titles of any others which may be sent to our journal:—

"By the sad sea waves" (Benedict); "She wore a wreath of roses" (Knight); "Sweet and low" "The winds that waft my sighs to thee," Polka, "La Cracovienne" (Wallace); "The Muleteer" (Balfie); Trio, "This magic-wove scarf" (Barnett); "Will o' the wisp" (Cherry).
FROM "THE LILY OF KILLARNEY."—Songs, "Eily Mavourneen," "I'm alone, I'm alone," "The Colleen Bawn"; Duet, "The moon has raised her lamp above."
FROM "MARITANA."—Songs, "Alas! those chimes," "Hear me, gentle Maritana," "In happy moments," "Scenes that are brightest," "There is a flower that bloometh," "Tis the harp in the air," "Yes! let me like a soldier fall"; Duets, "I am the king of Spain," "Oh! Maritana," "Sainted Mother"; Trio, "Turn on, old Time."
FROM "THE BOHEMIAN GIRL."—Songs, "I dreamt I dwelt in marble halls," "The heart bow'd down," "When other lips."

EVEN in roaming through the literature of an age when music was considered merely as a pleasing accomplishment, only cultivated by the female members of a family, and to be displayed in the drawing-room when all thought was over for the day, we cannot but feel surprise, not only that the utmost ignorance should be shown upon the principles of the art, but that this ignorance, even with the representative authors of the time, should be ostentatiously paraded, as if in defiance of the opinion of those who were better informed. In the works of Fielding, Smollett, Swift, and many others, we meet with constant instances of this tendency to treat both music and musicians with contempt; but, considering the rapid spread of a knowledge of the art, it does appear strange that in the present day many authors should still be found who either do not know, or do not care, in speaking of music, whether their facts are right or wrong. We have on a former occasion drawn attention to a passage by a modern writer in which the horn is mistaken for a trumpet—and this appears the more remarkable, as the former is a grave and the latter an acute instrument—but as both are made of brass, there is more excuse for the error than can possibly be allowed for the one we are about to mention. A well known authoress, who writes under the name of "Ouida" and professes to have both a love for and a knowledge of music, in her novel "Moths," makes one of her characters say, "You might as well want Rubinstein to make the violin he played on." Considering the popularity of Rubinstein as a pianist, in England as well as on the Continent, this appears extraordinary. We certainly thought that education had got beyond this, even with those who do not profess a more intimate acquaintance with music than can be gleaned by occasional attendance at concerts during the London season. What would "Ouida" think, for example, if she were to read of the "exquisite three-volume novels of Wordsworth," or the "severely classical poems of Charles Dickens"?

WE have heard much of the irritating effect of street music upon the nerves of those who are compelled to be unwilling listeners; and latterly many complaints have been made by railway passengers of the intrusion of itinerant instrumentalists into carriages where, to the misery of the other occupants, they continue to perform at short intervals during the journey. But music, being an indefinite language, however much it may annoy, cannot insult; so that to effect this result it is necessary to ally it with words, and with what success a recent case will prove. It appears that a correspondent of the Globe unfortunately found himself in a railway carriage surrounded by a detachment of the "Salvation Army." Of course this pious body, having a mission, could not let the opportunity pass of letting all the passengers know, by means of a hideous chorus, to what a happy frame of mind they had brought themselves; but as the person who relates this incident did not see why this ecstatic choral burst of joy should be forced upon those not concerned in the welfare of the "Army," he ventured gently to remonstrate, whereupon the vocalists instantly changed both tune and words to the following very personal chorus:—

Oh he's going to the devil
As fast as ever he can.

The helpless victim of this attack writes to ask whether the law allows him any redress for this grievance. We should assuredly think that it does; and feel convinced that if he had called any officer on duty at the first station he arrived at, he could have had his cowardly assailants at once turned out of the carriage. Persons intoxicated with religion have no more right to insult their fellow-passengers than those intoxicated with ardent spirits; and if the usual regulations for the protection of travellers do not meet the case, railway companies will have to add something to their bye-laws especially for the "Salvation Army."

THE MUSIC OF THE FUTURE AT BERLIN.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

IF I had to report from any other German town about the impression created these last few weeks, artistically and personally, by the visit of the great trias—Wagner, Liszt, Bülow—I should have chosen a different heading to the above, because the notions originally associated with the term "Music of the Future" have become antiquated there long since—being, in fact, identical with the "Music of the Present." In Berlin, however, as is the case in almost all matters of musical progress here, we have also, as regards the strivings of the so-called New German school, remained at least a decade in the rear of the other musical centres of the Fatherland, and the word "Music of the Future," in its original disparaging significance as a sobriquet, cannot be said to be altogether out of date with us. Berlin, indeed, occupies a most singular position in matters musical amongst the towns of the Empire, inasmuch as it harbours within its walls a considerable number of able and worthy musicians, some of them in influential public positions, who not only know nothing of Wagner, but who, moreover, do not care to know. And that these men are backed up by a considerable portion of the public is proved by a series of abnormal manifestations; among which I will only instance the singular attachment shown to Graun's Oratorio, "Der Tod Jesu," which is performed here annually, at least three times during Eastertide, and which, with its old-fashioned, semi-operatic music, stands in strange contrast with the modern deepening of taste wrought by the revived study of the works of the great Bach. On the other hand I will hasten to admit that a rest-and-be-thankful spirit does not by any means pervade the conservative ranks of our town, as is abundantly proved by the meritorious and successful efforts made by such musicians as Edward Grell, Heinrich Beller-mann, Friedrich Kiel, in their respective spheres of a capella choral singing, counterpoint, and musical science. Nor should the untiring zeal of the numerous progressive elements here, notably that manifested for years past by the Wagner-Verein, be overlooked in surveying Berlin musical life, as they have undoubtedly done much to spread the knowledge and the appreciation of the new art whose disciples they are.

In these circumstances, therefore, the presence of the three just-named veteran champions of the artistic movement of our time in Berlin was an event of special interest, and doubly gratifying was it to have been a witness of the enthusiastic reception accorded to them by the public. Franz Liszt arrived here on April 23, in order, in the first place, to assist at the performance by the Cäcilien-Verein, under the direction of its excellent Conductor, Herr Alexis Hollaender, of his Oratorio, "Christus." Long before his advent, however, the lively interest, which is justly associated as much with the man as with the artist, found its expression in the ever-recurring notices concerning his expected stay here published in the numerous organs of the press. Nor was there a lack of artistic demonstrations, in addition to the "Christus" performance, to commemorate the event. Amongst these, first in chronological order, and certainly not last in musical merit, must be mentioned a Liszt Evening, instituted by Musikdirector Bilse, at the Konzerthaus, where the "Faust Symphony" was performed in a manner which may be described as absolutely perfect. That such was the opinion also of the closely packed audience might have been inferred by the enthusiasm it displayed during the performance, and which may have been enhanced by the consciousness that at that very time the author of the work would have arrived in the capital, and taken up his residence in the mansion of the Minister Von Scheinitz, his friend and admirer.

Greeted on his arrival, as was natural, by a few personal friends only, the veteran master became on the following day the object of an enthusiastic ovation on the part of thousands belonging to the élite of the Berlin artistic world, who had assembled in the spacious and elegant hall of the Central Hotel, where a concert and festive banquet in honour of Liszt had been arranged by the Wagner-Verein. The symphonic poems, "Les Préludes" and "Festklänge," the scene, "Jeanne d'Arc" (Fräulein Marianne Brandt), and the "Prometheus" choruses, formed the well-chosen programme of the concert; and the execution by the Parlow'sche orchestra and Eichberg'sche Gesangsverein, under the direction of Herren Mannstaedt, Lessmann, and Eichberg, was equally satisfactory. More than once during the performance traces of emotion could be discovered in the face of the maestro, which was more especially apparent when, after the first number of the programme, he was greeted with some appropriate verses from the pen of E. Dohm, spoken by an actress of the Royal Theatre, Fräulein Clara Meyer. On this occasion already it became evident that the appreciation of the art-reformatory standpoint represented by Liszt is by no means absent amongst our public, and that the outward impulse only is required in order to raise it into full activity. Still more convincingly was this proved, however, on the evenings of April 23 and 25, on which took place respectively the performance of "Christus" and the soirée of pianoforte music by Liszt, given by Dr. von Bülów, both held at the Singakademie. With rapt attention, nay with reverence, the audience, which filled every available space in the hall, listened to these performances, and ever and anon the master was greeted with such storms of applause, as rendered it difficult to imagine that the public enthusiasm displayed forty years ago in the same place, when Liszt, then in the full possession of his youthful powers, enchanted his hearers by his pianoforte-playing, could have been heartier. I do not maintain that the satisfaction displayed by the audience on the first of the two occasions in question was intended for the composer alone. "Christus," with its somewhat bold amalgamation of Catholic-liturgic and modern-dramatic musical elements, could scarcely produce a uniformly favourable impression, although both the vocal and orchestral bodies engaged in the performance under Hollaender's excellent leadership, as well as the principal interpreters of the vocal soli—Frau Anna Hollaender (soprano) and Herr Senft von Pilsach (baritone)—had been rehearsing the work for months previous, had fully entered into the spirit of it, and proved themselves equal in every way to the by no means insignificant technical demands made by the composer. Herr Senft von Pilsach more particularly fused into his part that true religious feeling which pervades the entire work, and which sufficiently explains the general impression it created; an impression which has nothing in common with a so-called succès d'estime, but which, in my opinion (and that even of some reactionary critics), will prove a lasting one.

The final and most brilliant act in these memorable Liszt festivities in Berlin was the musical homage rendered to the master by his most legitimate artistic inheritor, Hans von Bülow. Threefold was the cause of the excitement which manifested itself in the Singakademie on this occasion, to a degree which I do not remember to have been witness to for many a year, but which is not unnatural if we consider the quid, the quo modo, and the quibus auxiliis of the case. Concerning the first question, then, the programme was distinguished by the variety and the judicious grouping of its numbers: it consisted of the Sonata dedicated to Robert Schumann—the same work by the interpretation of which, some twenty-five years ago, Bülow had raised a storm of angry criticism, but which, on this occasion, produced a powerful effect—followed by four pieces from the "Années de pèlerinage," the Legend, "St. François de Paule marchant sur les flots," four Études, the second Ballade, a polonaise, a mazurka, valse-impromptu, and, in conclusion, the Scherzo and March in D minor. The question as to "How?" is to be answered that, in the opinion of all who had heard the pianist during the last few years, Bülow has, in the execution of this gigantic programme, surpassed himself. Even the famous Herculean performance of the five sonatas by Beethoven was outdone here by the sovereign mastery with which the player mustered and sustained his forces in the wide area of battle he had chosen for himself. If ever the receptive capacity of an audience was sorely taxed in endeavouring to keep pace with the executive powers of the concert-giver, here surely was the case. That this rapport was nevertheless sustained, that (to supply the answer to our third proposition) the auxilia—in this case the mental disposition of the audience—never forsook the heroic champion to the last, was shown by the perfect burst of applause which followed immediately upon the performance of the final number, which continued unabated for some time, and was only to be quieted after the imposing yet most sympathetic figure of Liszt had appeared on the platform to receive, jointly with his great pupil, the thanks of the auditory.

Who can fail to be reminded of the old motto, "Le roi est mort, vive le roi," when I state that the artistic animation set on foot by Liszt's presence here was closely followed by a second event, no less stirring and animating, viz., the performance at the Victoria Theatre of Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring," with the personal co-operation of the author. That such an undertaking should awaken the curiosity and attract the attention of far wider circles than those appealed to by Liszt's visit was obvious. And just as the latter himself, many years ago, in modest acknowledgment of the superior genius, had looked upon the propagation of the "Art-work of the Future" as the most important portion of his artistic mission, he will not now take it amiss if the people of Berlin look back upon the "Liszt week" as a mere prelude to the "Wagner week" which followed it. For the reason alone, that the production of the Nibelungen tetralogy would demand the surmounting of difficulties far greater than those required for the Liszt performances, the realisation of the former was looked forward to with the more intense interest. Serious doubts were entertained whether, in an atmosphere charged with the distractions and pre-occupations of a metropolis, the necessary calmness of mental disposition, demanded by Wagner himself for the due appreciation of a serious art work, could be obtained. Again, it was urged that, even if a sufficient number of enthusiasts could be found ready to support the undertaking, it was more than likely that a considerable portion of them would be prevented from doing so by the, at least for Berlin, unusually high prices (viz., dress circle £6, stalls £4, for the series of four evenings). Lastly, it was considered doubtful whether a company of performers gathered together from all parts of the country, and more especially a second-rate orchestra like the Symphonie-Capelle, would be able to fulfil the exacting demands which Wagner is wont to make upon the executive artists. All these doubts have proved to be unfounded. Long before the opening night the demand for tickets had become so great that the financial success of the undertaking was assured, while the attitude of the public during the two performances of the "cycclus" which have so far been completed has been equally satisfactory. Nor could the latter have been otherwise considering the array of talent which the Leipzig Director, Angelo Neumann, had brought together, and whose combined efforts realised an effect not only superior to anything we are accustomed to here, but considerably surpassing what had been accomplished at Bayreuth. I need only name Herr and Frau Vogl (Munich), Herr Scaria and Frau Materna (Vienna), Herren Schelper and Liban, and Frau Reicher-Kindermann (Leipzig), in order to escape any possible charge of exaggeration. In the same breath, however, I must mention the Leipzig Capellmeister, Anton Seidl, as the inspiring and directing spirit of the whole, under whose leadership the hitherto by no means faultless orchestra was metamorphosed in a marvellous manner; for, both as regards euphony and precision and, what is still more important, discretion in accompaniment, its execution was an extraordinary one. The latter quality, indeed, is indispensable for the effective rendering of Wagner's music-dramas, as has been abundantly shown by the unfortunate reprise towards the end of 1876, in Berlin, of "Tristan und Isolde," when this work—which only a few months previously had, under the composer's personal supervision, achieved a brilliant success—was simply killed by the obtrusiveness of the orchestra, and, as its opponents hoped, placed on the shelf for ever. In the present instance, thanks to the exemplary conduct of the Symphonie-Capelle (which, however, was reinforced by several eminent instrumentalists) every word of the singers could be heard, and the full enjoyment of the work be attained, which, as I am more and more firmly persuaded, depends in Wagner's case entirely upon the simultaneous apprehension of tone and word.

Under such auspices an artistically festive atmosphere was felt to pervade the opening evening, the 5th ult., when "Rheingold" was produced. An enormous line of carriages winding its way, long before the hour of commencing, in the direction of the Victoria Theater, an unusual contingent of police, both mounted and otherwise, countless spectators crowding the windows of the neighbouring houses—all this indicated an event of a special character. Still more festive was the appearance presented by the interior of the theatre. From an early hour every seat was occupied, and their fortunate occupants displayed for the greater part the most brilliant toilets, all the members of the Royal family then in Berlin being present. When at last Richard Wagner made his appearance in the box immediately opposite the Royal loge, such cheers were heard from all parts of the house as are probably without precedent in the annals of our theatres, and which must have convinced every one present that Berlin, though late, had at any rate now become mature for the appreciation of the "Nibelungen Ring." I will confine myself to a few remarks regarding the progress of the performance or performances themselves, since I may assume on the part of the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES an acquaintance with the dramatic outline of the tetralogy generally. Vogl (Loge) elicited the same enthusiastic applause as at Bayreuth, while Liban (Mime) and Schelper (Alberich) were at least equal to the representatives of these parts at the memorable first performance in the Bavarian town. Scaria (Wotan) and Frau Reicher-Kindermann (Fricka), however, decidedly surpassed their Bayreuth prototypes, infusing into these characters far greater warmth and dramatic life. Only the Rhine-Daughters (Mesdames Monhaupt, Klawnsky, and Löwy) were better represented at the original production; but then it must be remembered that it is no easy matter to find three such excellent representatives of the parts together as were the sisters Lilli and Marie Lehmann and Frau Lammert in 1876. Scarcely less surprising than the performance of the artists was the attitude of the audience on this occasion, most favourably distinguished as it was from that of an ordinary opera night. There were no late comers, no rising before the curtain had dropped; ladies' fans, which so frequently and pitilessly move at variance with the rhythm displayed in the music, were almost entirely dispensed with; and the barbaric custom of applauding the moment the curtain has gone down, heedless of whatever beautiful things the composer may still have to communicate through the orchestra, was, whenever it began to be heard, met by such energetic opposition that silence was at once restored, and the applause deferred until the final chord had been struck.

Higher still the waves of enthusiasm rolled during the performance of "Die Walküre," and the impresario of our Royal Theatre, Herr von Hülsen (whose credit, by the way, cannot fail to have materially suffered by the success of the undertaking of Herr Neumann, he having pertinaciously refused to perform the "Nibelungen" here) certainly showed discrimination in omitting this part of the tetralogy from his anathema. A finer performance could, however, scarcely be conceived. Herr and Frau Vogl, as Siegmund and Sieglinde, as well as Frau Materna, as Brünnhilde, initiated the spectators by their masterly representation into the profoundest secrets of this grand tragedy; and even the so-called tedious portions of the work—the certainly somewhat long-spun dialogues between Wotan and Fricka—produced at the hands of Scaria and Frau Reicher-Kindermann an effect the reverse of fatiguing, being in fact fascinating in a high degree.

The pleasure of being able uninterruptedly to bestow praise is such a rare one for the critical reporter that I could wish to continue in the same strain, even at the risk of becoming wearisome to the reader. However, there is a limit to all things, and this fact has to be applied also to the Victoria Theater. The performance of "Siegfried" was, it must be admitted, less fortunate than the preceding parts of the "cycclus," since the impersonator of the stalwart hero (Herr Jäger, of Vienna) decidedly failed to interest the audience, either vocally or histrionically, his voice suffering moreover from indisposition. Somewhat less unfavourable was the impression produced by the same artist on the following evening, in "Götterdämmerung," and, thanks to the excellent co-operation of the remaining executants—among whom, as worthy representatives of the minor parts, I have still to mention Mesdames Schreiber, Riegler, Stürmer, and Liebmann, and Herren Schwarz, Siegmundt, Röss, and Von Reichenberg, as well as the imposing and capably trained chorus of the "Mannen"—the first cyclical performance of the work was brought to a worthy close. Regarding the partial failure of "Siegfried," just referred to, I will at once add that it was brilliantly atoned for in the second performance, when Vogl had undertaken the title rôle, and, in association with his wife, who on this occasion replaced Frau Materna, did full justice to this admirable drama.

A considerable share of the success of this after all somewhat hazardous enterprise must, of course, be attributed to the personal participation of Wagner, who not only conducted the rehearsals with his accustomed assiduity, but was present also throughout every one of the performances. At the conclusion of those of "Rheingold" and "Götterdämmerung," indeed, the master stepped on to the stage and addressed the audience to the effect that their plaudits were due this time not to himself, but to the artists who, with devotion and ability, had initiated themselves into a style of music to which at least some of them had been hitherto unused, and also to the enterprising manager who had had the courage to present his work to a metropolis over-accustomed to the enjoyment of all manner of high-class artistic performances. It was a touching sight to behold the master at the final moment, surrounded by his executive artists, who, at his request, were joined likewise by Director Neumann and Capellmeister Seidl, in order, as he said, "to receive publicly his thanks." Gladly should I have seen a third individual in the same position, namely, the manager of the entire scenic apparatus—that is if such distinction had been merited on his part. Unfortunately this was not the case, and here I cannot absolve the Victoria Theater from the blame of having failed to do such justice to the scenic effects as might have been expected from the antecedents of a stage where during the last few years so many spectacular pieces had been most elaborately mounted. As a matter of fact, the scenic arrangements of the "Nibelungen" here are in many respects inferior to those of other establishments where the tetralogy has hitherto been produced (Vienna, Munich, Hamburg, Leipzig, Cologne, Brunswick, Schwerin, Weimar). Considering how much of the complete success of the Wagnerian drama depends upon the visible effects, and how the master, if he has exhausted for many years to come the poetic and musical possibilities of the music-drama, has yet left a wide field open for the ingenuity of the machinist and the art of the scene-painter, the wish naturally presents itself to the mind that a theatre may at last come forward which will do full justice to the "Nibelungen Ring" as regards also a worthy outward mounting. In the hope then, that the prospective performance of the "Festspiel" in London—the realisation of which, after the Berlin experience, can scarcely now be doubtful—will solve this problem in a brilliant manner, I greet the sister capital with a hearty Vivat sequens!

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

A RECORD of the principal performances at this establishment during the month will not detain us long, for the lessee has evidently entered upon a feeble season or is reserving his strength for his concluding weeks. The cast of "Il Barbiere" on the opening night (the 7th ult.) was scarcely what we should expect at a high-class opera house, Mdle. Anna de Belocca, indeed, being the only singer at all equal to the requirements of Rossini's bright and sparkling music. Mdle. Tremelli has made a great advance in public favour by her performance of the heroine in "La Favorita," and Signor Ravelli was fairly good in the part of Fernando. The new comer, Mdle. Adalgisa Gabbi, is a good, but not a great, artist. Her voice is a genuine soprano, and her intonation has improved since the first night, when much of the music in "Aida" suffered from her singing out of tune. As Leonora, in "Il Trovatore," she was more successful; but it is doubtful whether she will permanently retain the high position to which she aspires. Madame Ilma di Murska has been well received as Dinorah, in Meyerbeer's opera—one of her best parts—and Signor Galassi as Hoël, Signor Runcio as Corentino, and Mdle. Tremelli as the Capraja gave much strength to the cast. Madame Christine Nilsson is announced to appear as Marguerite, in Gounod's "Faust," but too late for notice in our present number.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

MADAME SEMBRICH has not only fully sustained, but materially strengthened, the position taken at the commencement of the season, and recorded in our last number. Her refined and truly artistic singing in the part of the heroine in Meyerbeer's "Dinorah" was received by discriminating—if not very warm—applause, especially in the "Shadow song"; and although we might wish for a little more vitality in her action, the purity of her voice and the certainty of her execution created a marked impression upon the audience. The reappearance of Madame Albani in her favourite part of Gilda, in Verdi's "Rigoletto," proves that she has in every respect gained by the rest during the recess, a fact perhaps even more apparent in her excellent assumption of Marguerite, in Gounod's "Faust," and Elsa, in Wagner's "Lohengrin," the last-named characters, indeed, being perfectly ideal representations of two of the most difficult parts on the lyric stage. Madame Patti's appearance in the part of Semiramide has revived the interest in an opera the admiration of which is fast fading away. Her vocalisation is even more perfect than formerly; and both in her solos and the well-known showy duets she was rapturously received. The indisposition of Mdle. de Reszke, who was announced to play Valentine, in "Les Huguenots," made us acquainted with a talented débutante, Madame Fursch-Madier, who sustained the part with fair success. She has a really good soprano voice, and sings in a truly legitimate style, but her upper notes are somewhat uncertain, and her acting is wanting in dramatic power. The début of M. Mierszowsky in the arduous part of Arnold, in "Guillaume Tell," showed that his ambition was somewhat beyond his powers. He has certainly a fine voice, but he sang occasionally out of tune, his best effort, however, being in the "Corriam," which demanded the energy he undoubtedly possesses, but which, in portions of the music where this was not required, he could scarcely control. As Raoul, in "Les Huguenots," he was much better; and we may still hope that he will prove a welcome addition to the company. Of M. Gresse, who made his first appearance as Marcel, in the same opera, but little need be said. His music was tolerably well sung, but he made little impression upon the audience, all of whom have been accustomed to hear much better representatives of this important part. The new tenor, Herr Labatt, disappointed us as Lohengrin in Wagner's opera, because we had heard much of his success in Germany. His voice is hard and unsympathetic, and throughout the evening he failed to impress the audience either by his singing or his acting. Madame Trebelli has given much strength to all the works in which she has appeared, and Mdle. Valleria and Madame Scalchi have been cordially welcomed. Mention must also be made of M. Dupont, whose conducting is remarkable for quiet power, although in some of the tempi he appears to differ from his predecessors. All the operas he has directed, however, have on the whole gone remarkably well, and he will no doubt prove a valuable acquisition to the establishment.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

NEXT to giving too little, there is nothing so unadvisable as giving too much. Such a moral might be pointed from the history of the special performances which the Crystal Palace directors have thought it wise to add to their ordinary series of Saturday Concerts. As regards the interest of the programmes and the excellence of the performances they have certainly shown no falling off; but the audiences have been very scanty, for no other reason apparently than that to the ordinary mind Saturday Concerts in May somehow do not seem to tally with the universal fitness of things.

But before coming to the special performances, we have to say a few words of the interesting Concert given as usual for the benefit of Mr. Manns on the last day of April. Mr. Manns on this occasion had provided a programme to suit the most divergent and the most fastidious tastes. There was Mozart's "Figaro" Overture and an Aria from "La Clemenza di Tito" to pacify the strict conservatives; operatic airs by Gounod, Meyerbeer, and Donizetti, delighted the lovers of the opera; Berlioz upheld the cause of the advanced French school; even English music was represented by two of Dr. Arne's songs; and Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, admirably given by Mr. Franz Rummel, indicated that highest stage of art where difference of opinion ceases to exist. In addition to all this there were two novelties of more than ordinary importance—viz., the two overtures which Brahms was known to have written last summer, and which were first performed at Breslau on the occasion of a Doctor's degree being conferred on the composer. The first of the two Overtures, known as the "Academic," is of a somewhat local character, being founded on German students' songs very familiar at the university cities of the Fatherland, but unknown in England. It cannot be denied that the work as a whole somewhat suffers from the heterogeneous materials of which it is composed; at the same time one cannot but admire the masterly manner in which these materials are blended together and turned to contrapuntal account. The second Overture, surnamed the "Tragic," is the very antipodes of its predecessor. Here Brahms speaks the language most congenial to him, that of deep, thoughtful, albeit subdued, feeling. The key of the Overture is D minor, and its dimensions and import would well entitle it to the name "symphonic poem," provided the author had given us the clue to the ideas in his mind when composing it.

The only important feature, and a very important one, at the opening Special Concert (on the 7th ult.) was the first appearance at the Crystal Palace of Madame Sophie Menter, who gave Liszt's second pianoforte Concerto in A. Madame Menter is amongst the leading exponents of the modern school of pianists. Her tone is powerful and brilliant, her technical skill all but phenomenal. At the same time she is by no means wanting in delicacy and refinement of touch, and some of her pianissimi were beyond all praise. Liszt's Concerto in A, although less popular than that in E flat, played by Madame Menter at Mr. Ganz's concerts, is not inferior to it as regards poetic beauty, and its admirable rendering did not fail to impress the audience at the Crystal Palace.

The most striking feature of Raff's second Symphony in C (Op. 140), heard for the first time at the second Special Concert, is a negative one—the absence of the programme in which this composer usually delights. Apart from this, little need be said of the work, and that little in its favour. Its melodies are pleasing and cling to the ear, and Raff's consummate mastery is, as usual, displayed in instrumentation and contrapuntal writing. Mrs. Meadows White's charming Overture, "Jason," also formed part of the programme, and Herr Heymann, one of the innumerable foreign pianists at present in London, played Chopin's Concerto in E.

Another Symphony, this time by Rubinstein, was the opening number of the third Concert. It is surnamed the "Russian," and accordingly based on the popular songs and dance tunes of the composer's country. Whether these tunes have been literally transcribed or merely imitated by Rubinstein we cannot say; neither is it of much consequence. Such as they stand they give its charm and artistic cachet to a work which, we have no doubt, will be counted among Rubinstein's most pleasing, if not most profound, attempts at symphonic writing. The second movement, a kind of scherzo, with a fugue by way of trio, is the most charming number amongst the four. Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, first played by Mr. Dannreuther, and on this occasion given with admirable effect by Mr. Franz Rummel, was the only other feature worthy of permanent record. It need not be added that Mr. Manns has acted throughout as Conductor, the orchestra also being the same as usual.

MR. SIMS REEVES'S FAREWELL ORATORIO PERFORMANCES.

MR. REEVES has evidently resolved to convince the public that he retires from the profession in the full possession of his powers, for certainly never has he sung more finely than at the farewell performances which have taken place during the past month at the Royal Albert Hall. At the first Concert, on April 27, Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was given, the solos "Call forth thy powers," "So will'd my father," "We come; O see," and "Haste we, my brethren" in the first part, being sung by Mr. Reeves in a style which defies criticism. The tenor music in the second part was excellently rendered by Mr. W. H. Cummings; and it need scarcely be said how attractive was the singing of Madame Christine Nilsson, Madame Trebelli, and Mr. Santley, or that the choral music received an admirable interpretation by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society. At the second Concert, on the 4th ult., when the "Creation" and "Hymn of Praise" were performed, Mr.

Reeves was unfortunately prevented by indisposition from appearing, and his place was most efficiently supplied by Mr. E. Lloyd. On the 18th ult. "Israel in Egypt" was the oratorio selected; and during the evening the admirers of the great tenor had ample opportunity of hearing him at his very best. It is not too much to affirm that Mr. Reeves has made the short solo "The enemy said"—formerly but little noticed—one of the prominent features of the oratorio; and certainly on the occasion under notice he even eclipsed all his former efforts. His singing of the recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and air, "Waft her angels," from "Jephtha," interpolated between the parts of "Israel in Egypt," was also a marvellous display of pure vocalisation, dramatic feeling, and intellectual perception of the text; the overwhelming applause of the audience expressing but feebly the high appreciation of all competent judges upon so ideal a rendering of Handel's music. Mesdames Sherrington, De Fonblanque, and Patey; Messrs. Lloyd, Santley, and Foli, were the other vocalists; and the choruses, sung by the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, were most effective, and elicited warm applause. The performances have been ably conducted by Mr. Joseph Barnby. We much regret to announce that, in consequence of Mr. Reeves having undergone a surgical operation, the next performance, which was to have taken place on the 25th ult., is postponed until the 15th inst., when it is sincerely hoped that he will be enabled to continue the series of concerts which have already afforded such gratification to all music-lovers.

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE third season of these Concerts—which have so suddenly, but far from unaccountably, sprung into a position of first-class importance—began, on the 9th ult., supported, it is said, by a strong subscription and, we know, by vivid recollections of previous excellence. The orchestra engaged was not less numerous than of old, while to a large extent its ranks included artists already accustomed to Herr Richter's beat. Herr Franke again acted as chef d'attaque, the other principals being Messrs. Risegari, Hollander, Ould, Neuwirth, Svendsen, Lebon, Horton, Egerton, Trout, Paersch, Jaeger, Müller, &c. For the most part these are very good names; we must, however, point out that the "wind" department is not in all respects equal to the "string." More than once it has happened that attention could not but be drawn to the fact, and the suggestion is that some of the "rank and file" are not quite up to the standard. We are indisposed to adopt this, since the faults observable might have been due to carelessness rather than want of skill; and really the marvel is that, with both Italian Operas at work and the musical season in full operation, Herr Richter should be able to command the services of so many men against whom nothing can be said.

The first Concert was diversified in character. It began with Wagner's "Huldigungs-Marsch"—that is to say with pompous orchestral effect which wrought up to a climax the enthusiasm kindled by Herr Richter's appearance on the platform. Then came a novelty, purporting to be a "Concerto" or Sonata for strings alone (five parts), the work of John Sebastian Bach, and played for the first time in England. Much interest had been called forth by the announcement of this piece, but it collapsed almost entirely on discovering from the programme-book that the "concerto" was really written by Herr Hellmesberger, of Vienna, who founded it upon a first violin part discovered by some unknown person in Dresden, and supposed to be in the handwriting of the Leipzig Cantor. We need not trouble ourselves about the connection of the work with Bach, who may, or may not—probably not—have had a hand in it. For the concerto itself, as it stands, we can say none but words of praise. The themes are entirely characteristic of the Bach period, and Herr Hellmesberger has treated them not only with cleverness, but with true historical vraisemblance. Because the Bach tradition is doubtful, that is no reason why so able a piece should be set aside, and we hope to hear it again. It was almost perfectly played by Herr Richter's little army of strings, as was, immediately afterwards, the overture to "Oberon" by all the band. Here, indeed, we had one of the exceptional results which even this conductor and this orchestra secure only now and then. Nothing more delicate and refined, where such qualities were demanded, or vigorous and powerful, where these were required, could have been conceived. The Choral Symphony followed, with Miss Pyk, Miss Rosenthal, Mr. Boyle, and Mr. King as solo vocalists; chorus by the amateurs trained last season under Herr Frantzen. Beethoven's great work was presented under almost the same circumstances, and with the same specialties of reading as in 1880. We are, therefore, free from any obligation to go into details. Let it suffice that the time of the Adagio and Scherzo was open to exception by amateurs accustomed to English traditions, the one being faster, the other slower than is our use. As a whole, the performance barely came up to that of last season. It was, however, one of much interest, and worthy of study as illustrating the custom of Beethoven's own city with reference to his greatest work.

The second Concert (16th ult.) opened with the Academic Festival Overture by Brahms, an arrangement of which for four hands was noticed in THE MUSICAL TIMES last month. Our remarks were penned when it was not publicly known that the work, together with the Tragic Overture, its companion, would be so soon heard at the Crystal Palace, where both were performed in connection with Mr. Manns's "benefit," and it is creditable to concert-giving enterprise that the delay in producing them was of the briefest. The Crystal Palace performance discounted the interest attaching to that under Herr Richter, but, as it turned out, the subject is of little moment. Herr Brahms's overture will naturally be valued by Germans, upon whose familiar student-songs it is based; non-Germans, however, will see in it only a kind of orchestral fantasia having a number of themes with no natural artistic affinity, and boasting per se no great measure of attractive qualities. Of course one must avoid looking too critically at works of this sort. The overture is a pièce d'occasion celebrating the connection of its author with the Breslau University; and if it served its immediate purpose, as undoubtedly it did, there is an end of the matter. But even those who look at the work from without, so to speak, must admire the remarkable ability shown in the treatment of the themes, and the wealth of the orchestral effects produced. The performance excited little or no demonstration from those who heard it. A more decided novelty even than the penultimate production of Brahms came next in order. We refer to Liszt's "Mephisto Walzer"—one of two orchestral pieces founded on a poem, itself based upon the legend of Faust, by Lenau. Herr Lenau's work gives to the legend the benefit of Herr Lenau's fancy. Thus it pleased the writer to take Mephisto and his victim to a village inn where a nuptial feast was being observed; and to make the Tempter play a maddening tune to the dancers, under the intoxicating influence of which Faust waltzes away to the woods with the bride. The story, however glorified by poetic talent, is not the most decent, and one might have supposed that even composers of the "intense" school would refuse to degrade an essentially pure art by bringing the two into contact. Liszt, however, has yielded to temptation, and his music purports to tell the story from the tuning-up of the village orchestra to the moment when Faust finds himself alone in the woods with the woman whom devilish art has placed in his power. For a work of this kind we have no criticism. It is a thing to sorrow over. But, in the interest of common propriety, we must protest against such subjects being thrust under the eyes of people who, in going to a concert room, believe themselves secure from offence. Things are coming to a pretty pass when there is need to cry out for a censorship over programme-books! The atmosphere of the room, fouled by Liszt's piece, was effectively purified by Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," with its suggestions of pure and happy family life. Beautifully played, this was received with enthusiasm, and after it Schumann's Symphony in C beckoned the audience to the exalted and rightful home of music, where lives the Heavenly Maid free from the stain of contamination with the vileness of earth, free, indeed, with all the liberty that belongs to purely spiritual conception.

The third Concert (19th ult.) offered a special attraction to lovers of Mendelssohn's music, by placing at the head of its programme the Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo, and Wedding March from "A Midsummer Night's Dream." It would seem from the character of the performance that Herr Richter reckoned with too much confidence upon the familiarity of the subject; but, be this as it may, the execution left a good deal to desire. It was neither so refined nor so precise, neither so picturesque nor practical as it might have been with even a moiety of the care bestowed upon works less deserving. Herr Richter may be no great admirer of Mendelssohn. We do not know whether he be or not, nor does it much signify, in presence of the axiom that whatever music a man in his position undertakes to present should receive all possible attention, with a view to its standing in the best light. The Mendelssohn selections were followed by Chopin's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, as amended (?) by Herr Carl Klindworth; Mr. Walter Bache undertaking the solo part. Upon this we need only dwell long enough to praise the skill shown by Herr Richter in conducting the accompaniments. Under the Viennese bâton a soloist has all possible advantage, and herein lies one of Richter's best recommendations. He excels in a particular work as to which most chefs d'orchestre are conspicuously deficient. Goldmark's Overture "Penthesilea" contains some bright and effective orchestral passages, but does not at first sight appear in an important or even a distinctive light. The Concert ended with a remarkably fine performance of Mr. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, concerning which so much has been said of late. We shall not rediscuss the merits of this work. But little time has passed since its production, and no intervening experience has given cause to retract a word of praise. The "Scandinavian" Symphony is an achievement of talent, and, in some respects, of very high talent. Herr Richter's patronage was therefore given to it as a matter of right on the one side, and of duty on the other. Against that patronage no charge of half-heartedness can be brought. The symphony had been well studied; it was magnificently played, and received with applause that showed how, after all, an Englishman can obtain recognition in his own country, when he has done anything specially deserving.

Coming to the fourth Concert (23rd ult.) two novelties claim attention, the one an orchestral Capriccio by Grädener; the other the "Tragic Overture" of Brahms to which reference has already been made. The first of these has decided merit. It is what its name implies, and the fancifulness of its ideas, together with able scoring, gives it a distinct value. We should know more of Grädener, whose Op. 4 promises exceedingly well. Brahms's overture occupies a position having little in common with the "Academic Festival." It is not a pièce d'occasion; it is not based upon students' songs of limited interest, and it is not more a fantasia than an overture in form. Here we have a work for all musical nations, with nothing about it limited or limiting. Its value as a fine example of the composer lies beyond dispute; nevertheless, one must hear it again and again before assuming to speak thereanent with authority. Certain points are clear at the outset—that the overture is magisterial, distinctive, impressive, and put together with all an artist's devotion to a perfect ideal. Beginning on this basis it is bound to conquer public opinion sooner or later. The rest of Herr Richter's latest programme included Beethoven's Overture "Weihe des Hauses," the same master's "C minor," nobly played, and Spohr's second violin Concerto, to the solo of which Herr Straus did ample justice.

MR. HALLÉ'S RECITALS.

On Fridays during the past month Mr. Charles Hallé has been engaged in the agreeable and, we trust, profitable task of playing Beethoven's Sonatas in chronological order, taking four at each concert, and joining to each set six of the Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues of J. S. Bach. The performances will be continued till both series are exhausted, so that Mr. Hallé's regular hearers—and there are many—will, when the course ends, have enjoyed an educational privilege almost unique in its nature. It is needless to point out how much the scholasticism of Bach relieves the exuberant fancy of Beethoven, each composer doing for the other that which an appropriate background does for a picture. The Sonatas by contrast with the Fugues, and the Fugues by contrast with the Sonatas, have all their salient features accentuated, and so the two masters, widely sundered in point of style and method, come together in perfect harmony. The idea was a very happy one, and is being carried out with entire success. We advise all students of Bach's Fugues to go and hear Mr. Hallé play them. His neat, precise, and well-disciplined talent brings out the structure of those wonderful works with surpassing clearness, so that all the involutions of the parts can be followed with ease. A better opportunity, we feel sure, is not likely to occur again, unless, indeed, Mr. Hallé should be moved by public approbation to do next year as he is doing now.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

AT the fifth Concert, on the 12th ult., the novelty was a "Sinfonietta," composed by Mr. F. H. Cowen expressly for the Philharmonic Society, the success of which proves that the encouragement thus given to composers of our own country is thoroughly in accord with the wishes of the subscribers. The only objection we have to urge against Mr. Cowen's work is that it is not a Symphony, even in the most diminutive form, for the movements do not fulfil the conditions of this species of composition. As an orchestral piece, however, it may take high rank, for not only are the themes fresh and melodious, but their treatment, as far as the prescribed limits of the composition will allow, is thoroughly artistic. The opening movement is unquestionably the best, both the first and second subjects having a strongly marked character, the clever orchestration of which renders them doubly attractive; and some scholarly writing—notably the combination of three distinct melodic phrases—gives much interest to the movement. The Lento, opening with a theme for the clarinet, in alternate bars of 3-4 and 4-4, displays some exceedingly ingenious treatment of two subjects; but the shadow of a Scherzo which follows, and the Finale, repeating the themes of the first Allegro, somewhat disappoint us. The orchestral colouring is throughout skilful and effective, especially in the first movement; and the composer, who conducted the work, fairly earned the applause with which he was greeted at the conclusion. Chopin's Concerto in F minor was well played by Mdlle. Vera Timanoff; but the composition is uninteresting, and produced little effect. M. Ovide Musin performed Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with much artistic skill, and received as much applause as could be expected from an audience wearied with the excessive length of the programme. The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's Symphony in F (No. 8), Weber's Overture to "Oberon," and Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflöte"; and the vocalists, Madame Sembrich (who sang with charming effect the showy air, "Che pur aspro," from Mozart's "Seraglio") and Madame Trebelli. Mr. W. G. Cusins conducted, as usual.

At the sixth and last Concert of the season, on the 26th ult., the programme contained no novelty; but the performance of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat by Madame Sophie Menter proved her right to a place as an interpreter of classical music. Her execution is extremely neat, and her phrasing shows much artistic feeling and intelligence. Both in the Concerto and in a showy Fantasia by Liszt, on themes from "Don Giovanni," she elicited warm and well-deserved applause. The vocalists were Madame Albani and Mr. Herbert Reeves. Schumann's Symphony in B flat, and the Overtures, "Isles of Fingal" (Mendelssohn) and "Leonora," No. 3 (Beethoven), were the orchestral pieces. At the conclusion of the Concert Mr. W. G. Cusins, the Conductor, was much applauded.

THE MUSICAL UNION.

THIS long-established musical enterprise has entered upon a new phase of existence. Through age and infirmity Mr. Ella was compelled at the close of last season to give up the work he had carried on for thirty-six years, and M. Lasserre, the French violoncellist, now reigns in his stead. We should be just to the veteran now retired from the field. Whatever Mr. Ella may have done or left undone, his worst detractors cannot deny that he established and made fashionable a very high class of musical entertainment, and that he steadily persevered against all opposition and rivalry for more than a generation. A man who can do this should not be heedlessly set aside and forgotten. Mr. Ella has of right made his mark upon our musical history. With regard to his successor it is yet too early for an opinion, and we must be satisfied to notice in brief terms the principal features of the three Concerts already given under M. Lasserre's direction. The first (April 27) presented to a critical audience Haydn's Quartet in G (Op. 54), Rubinstein's pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 54), Beethoven's Quartet in F (Op. 18), and Schumann's "Carnaval," the executants being MM. Paul Viardot, Wiener, Van Waefelghem, Lasserre, and Alfred Reisenhauer, a very young! but exceedingly able pupil of Liszt. At the second Concert (the 10th ult.) were performed a Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello by Mr. Hubert Parry, Liszt's Rhapsodie, No. 12, Mozart's Quartet in D minor, and Mendelssohn's in E flat; the string performers being those already named, and Mr. Dannreuther doing the pianist's work. The third Concert (the 24th ult.) was signalled by a performance of Schumann's Quartet (No. 1), Haydn's Quartet in D (No. 63), a Trio in F by Saint-Saëns, a violin solo, "La Folia con variazioni," by Corelli, and two pianoforte pieces played by Herr Ritter. To the character of these programmes no exception can fairly be taken. The old and the new, the classic, and that which aspires to become classic, are mingled in such fair proportion that M. Lasserre has only to persevere as he has begun in order to deserve success. A better first violin than M. Paul Viardot might and should have been obtained. This somewhat feeble though showy player has proved the weak point in an otherwise good quartet. Mr. Dannreuther and Herr Ritter we all know as artists who are entitled to a hearing anywhere and at any time. On the whole the Musical Union under its new chief is doing well.

MISS AGNES ZIMMERMANN'S CONCERT.

THE Concert of this distinguished pianist took place at St. James's Hall on the 5th ult., when a large and most appreciative audience assembled to welcome her on her return from Germany. Her solo, Chopin's exacting Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35), was performed throughout with a refinement of expression and a delicacy of phrasing, united with executive power of the highest order, which charmed every listener, and elicited genuine and enthusiastic applause. The well-known "Funeral March" received an interpretation which might be accepted as a lesson to the many amateurs present, who, although having mastered the notes, might still be unaware of the depth of feeling which the composer has thrown into this beautiful movement; and, but for the interruption of the continuity of the work, it would doubtless have been encored. Miss Zimmermann also took part in Mozart's Quartet in E flat (No. 3), for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello, and Brahms's Quartet in A major, for the same instruments, in both of which she was ably assisted by Messrs. Richard Gompertz, Zerbini, and Daubert. A novelty in the programme was a flute solo, called "Hirtenslied," by Mendelssohn. This piece was found amongst the composer's papers after his death, and Mr. Broadwood, having procured it from Mr. Grove, requested Miss Zimmermann to write to it a pianoforte accompaniment; and, to make it available for concert performance, she also added three variations. In this form it was given for the first time, Mr. Svendsen playing the flute part with his accustomed excellent tone and feeling. The air is graceful, but without any strongly marked individuality; and, but for the sympathetic and cleverly written variations, there is no special reason why it should not have been allowed to rest in peace. The vocalist was Mdlle. Louise Pyk, who sang with much effect Beethoven's "Ah, perfido," and some Swedish songs, well accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Zerbini.

"THE BUILDING OF THE SHIP."

MR. J. F. BARNETT'S Leeds Cantata was produced under the composer's direction in St. James's Hall on Wednesday evening the 25th ult. It had previously been heard at concerts given by one or two suburban choral societies, but this may be accounted as the formal introduction of the work to metropolitan amateurs. That the performance excited considerable interest was proved by the number and quality of the audience who gathered to hear it, while that the occasion was a genuine success no one, marking the unanimity and spontaneous character of the applause, could possibly doubt. In fact, the Cantata met with as good fortune in London as in Leeds. Its pretensions having been already discussed at length in these columns, we have only to deal with the manner in which the work was given. Mr. Barnett naturally took good care to be on the safe side. His soloists, Miss Anna Williams, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, were more than equal to their task; there was a good orchestra, led by Mr. Carrodus; Dr. Bridge presided at the organ, and the choir had been trained to do its work with skill as well as enthusiasm. Thus efficiently supported, Mr. Barnett found it easy to launch his "Ship." Among the numbers most cordially received were the chorus of female voices, "Beautiful they were in sooth"; the unaccompanied quartet, "The sun shone on her golden hair" (encored), sung by Mesdames Williams, Wardroper, Gibson, and Patey; Mr. Lloyd's air, "Love's command" (encored); the chorus, "Thus with the rising of the sun," so finely given that it had to be repeated; and Madame Patey's air "Ah! when the wanderer," to which a like compliment was paid. Mr. Barnett conducted with spirit, and at the close was called back to receive a tribute of very warm applause. The second and miscellaneous part of the Concert included Beethoven's fourth pianoforte Concerto, ably played by Miss Emma Barnett, two orchestral pieces by Mr. J. F. Barnett, and a few songs.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE fourth and last Concert of the season was given at the Shoreditch Town Hall, on the 10th ult. The first part of the programme was devoted to the "Spring" and "Summer," from Haydn's "Seasons"; Miss Jessie Jones, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Mr. Frank Ward, being the principal vocalists. After the trying choral music so ably rendered by the Society since Mr. Prout has become its Conductor, the comparatively simple choruses of this work must have given but little trouble to the choir; but they were sung with commendable care and earnestness, and the melodious "Come, gentle Spring," especially, produced a marked effect. All the singers were thoroughly efficient; and warm praise must be awarded to Mr. Frank Ward for his effective delivery of the well-known air, "With joy the impatient husbandman." The second part commenced with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," the other instrumental piece being the Shawl Dance from Auber's Operaballet, "Le Dieu et la Bayadère," both of which were exceedingly well performed. The selection also included two choruses from Beethoven's music to "King Stephen," the second of which, "See, with flowers," for female voices, would most assuredly have been redemanded had encores been permitted at these concerts. Mozart's Duet, "La ci darem," introduced to us two vocalists—Miss Rose Dafforne and Mr. G. Minett—with whom we should like to become better acquainted; for although, even in the transposed version which was given, the music scarcely appeared within Miss Dafforne's register, she sang both with artistic feeling and intelligence, and Mr. Minett also displayed a good voice and style. The whole of the introductory music in the first act of "Guillaume Tell" gave an excellent opportunity for the choir to display its very best qualities, and brought the concert to a most successful conclusion. Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Rose Dafforne, Mr. W. Shakespeare, Mr. Frank Ward, and Mr. Minett, in the principal parts, were highly satisfactory, Mr. Shakespeare eliciting enthusiastic applause by his charming singing of the Pescatore's song. The concert was, as usual, ably conducted by Mr. Prout.

MILITARY BANDS FESTIVAL.

THE idea, first carried out in 1878 at St. Paul's Cathedral and repeated there the following year, of combining four military bands to take part in the accompaniment of Divine Service was beyond doubt a bold one; the success however which, musically speaking, attended each of the earlier gatherings was in no way diminished when, once more in aid of the Royal School for Daughters of Officers of the Army, the bands of the Royal Artillery, Royal Engineers, Grenadier Guards, and Scots' Guards met, for the first time in its annals, within the venerable walls of the Abbey Church of Westminster, on Thursday afternoon, the 12th ult.

The Service commenced, similarly to both its predecessors, with the performance by the united bands of the slow movement from Mendelssohn's C minor Symphony, followed by a Marche Religieuse by Gounod, during which the choir and clergy entered in procession and took their seats, the former being grouped on either side of the sacrum, with the bandmen immediately to the west of them, nearer the congregation, at the foot of the altar steps. The organ, erected specially for the Festival by Messrs. Hill and Son, immediately at the back of the Cantoris choir, and used in place of the larger instrument on the screen, was, we are bound to say, most inadequate both to the place and the occasion; being, indeed, the one element calculated to mar the general effect of the service: its shortcomings were, however, concealed as far as possible by Mr. George C. Martin, who may certainly be congratulated on the manner in which the voices were sustained and assisted in those places (notably the first portion of the anthem) where the organ accompaniment was not reinforced by any of the wind instruments. The service and anthem were the same as those which have been performed on each of the preceding occasions; namely, Martin in B flat (composed specially for the first of these Festivals) and the last two movements of Sullivan's Festival Te Deum, "Vouchsafe, O Lord," and "O Lord, in Thee have I trusted": a novelty, however, was provided in the form of Sullivan's arrangement of St. Ann's Tune to "The Son of God goes forth to war," scored for full military band by Mr. Godfrey at the suggestion of Dr. Bridge, and with the express permission of the composer. During the offertory the bands performed Mendelssohn's "War March," following which the "Hallelujah" Chorus was sung. Unfortunately a transposition of both works to the key of E flat was necessary to suit the exigencies of the wind instruments, an alteration by which the effect of the chorus at least was by no means improved. A short sermon was preached by the Dean after the third collect, the prayers were intoned by the precentor, the Rev. S. Flood Jones, and the duties of Conductor were divided between the masters of each of the four bands and Dr. Bridge, the greater part of the work naturally falling to the latter, by whom, as the congregation were dispersing, a voluntary was played on the Abbey organ.

THE LONDON GREGORIAN CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE London Gregorian Choral Association held their ninth Annual Festival on Thursday the 19th ult. An addition to the Festival programme has been made this year in the form of an early celebration (choral) of the Holy Communion, and it is the intention of the Association that this service shall always in future form part of the Festival, and be held at some church within the City boundaries. The church selected this year was that of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, where by a small portion of the choir (numbering something under thirty voices) one of the ancient Plain-Song masses recently published by the Association was sung, Mr. C. Warwick Jordan presiding at the organ.

The great Festal Evensong took place, as usual, in St. Paul's Cathedral, the archaic form of music in which the Association delights naturally having almost undisputed sway. On this occasion the choir was somewhat less, numerically, than at some of the previous Festivals of the Association, the trebles numbering about four hundred, and the adult voices only slightly exceeding that number—in all giving a total of rather more than eight hundred singers; the procession nevertheless occupied nearly half-an-hour. Four trombones, four horns, two trumpets, and two clarinets, rendered most important aid in the accompaniments, the heavy wind, particularly, proving invaluable at several junctures which otherwise would have been decidedly critical. There was no sermon, a want which, the service being essentially one of praise and thanksgiving, was probably not very keenly felt. Sir John Goss's Anthem, "O give thanks," was sung after the Third Collect, following the "Easter Sequence"; and the "Alleluia Sequence," to music of the eleventh century, was selected for the offertory hymn. The alms having been presented, a solemn Te Deum, taken to a simple form of the Ambrosian chant, concluded the Festival (save for the benediction and retrocessional hymn), which in all, including the processional, lasted little more than an hour and a half.

Mr. C. Warwick Jordan rendered, as in past years, most efficient and, indeed, invaluable aid at the organ; Mr. Spenser Nottingham was the Conductor; and the Rev. G. Sharland and Mr. E. H. Buckler the Cantors.

FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

THE Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy is an institution which has stood the test of centuries, a fact of which the celebration of the 227th Anniversary Festival on Wednesday, the 18th ult., furnishes ample proof. It is only, however, of comparatively recent years that the elaborate musical service of St. Paul's Cathedral, of which we have now to speak, has formed one, if not the chief, of the attractions of the Festival; for the introduction of the orchestra, which now forms such an important feature of and accompaniment to the Service, dates back no farther than 1873, the period at which the musical arrangements passed into the hands which at present so ably control them—those, namely, of Dr. Stainer, the present Conductor of the Festival.

The Sons of the Clergy Festival has constantly, in past years, been a means of calling forth valuable additions to the musical répertoire of the English Church, some of Sir John Goss's finest anthems having been composed for it; besides which, the Corporation may point with satisfaction to many fine Services, such, for instance, as the late Henry Smart's noble setting in B flat, which their Festival has been the means of introducing to the Church. The novelty consisted this year of a most effective Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, written specially for the occasion by Mr. Joseph Barnby, which received an excellent rendering both from the choir and orchestra. This composition is noticed in another portion of our columns, and we refrain, therefore, from commenting further upon it. The anthem consisted of Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's magnificent setting of the 125th Psalm, "All they that trust in Thee, Lord," the tenor solos of which were sung with great taste and feeling by Mr. Alfred Kenningham, the choruses being given with that precision and finish, little short of perfection, which nowadays one looks for, and almost invariably receives, at the hands of the cathedral choirs. The critic's duty, if indeed criticism of Divine Service be admissible, becomes truly a light and pleasant one on such occasions as the present. Before the sermon, which was preached by Dr. Butler, Head Master of Harrow, came, according to the invariable custom of the Festival, the "Old Hundredth Psalm"; and after it, immediately before the blessing, which was given by the Bishop of London, the "Hallelujah" Chorus. We must also not omit to record a very fine performance by the orchestra, immediately before the commencement of the service, of Sullivan's overture, "In Memoriam," a composition which is admirably suited to the Church, and has already—namely, in 1877—formed an appropriate prelude to this Festival.

The prayers were intoned by the Rev. C. N. Kelly, Minor Canon; the orchestra, numbering in all about seventy performers, was led by Mr. Zerbin; Mr. George C. Martin was the Organist, and Dr. Stainer, as we have already stated, Conductor. The congregation was large, though not unusually so. The usual proportion of dignitaries, ecclesiastic and civic, were present; and royalty was represented in the person of H.R.H. Prince Leopold.

ASCENSION DAY AT WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

It is not altogether easy to distinguish the precise connection between the great event commemorated in Ascension Day, and the incidents recorded in the fourth chapter of St. John's Gospel. The choice, however, of works strictly appropriate to the day is an exceedingly limited one, and therefore, considering the intrinsic worth of the work selected, the authorities of Westminster Abbey may certainly be congratulated from a musical point of view on their choice of Sir W. S. Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" as the central feature of the Special Service held in the afternoon of Holy Thursday, the 26th ult.

In several past years an orchestral Service has been held on Ascension Day, sometimes, we believe, in the nave of the Abbey; whilst on others, as on the present occasion, the choir have been grouped on either side of the sacarium, with the orchestra ranged at the foot of the steps below; undoubtedly the preferable of the two arrangements. Another custom, not so desirable, has been the mutilation in a considerable degree of the service proper for Ascension Day; the use, for instance, of only one Psalm instead of three, of one Lesson instead of both: a custom which we regret to say was not departed from at the Festival of which we have now to speak.

At the appointed hour of half-past three, the orchestra and choir having entered and taken their seats—the former, by the way, not being surpliced—the prayers were commenced by the Rev. S. Flood Jones; the Psalm (the 24th) was sung to the usual chant by Dr. Bridge, a very happy use being made of the full orchestra at the verses prophetic of the Ascension; and the Magnificat was from the same composer's pen, being the setting in G which has been heard at several previous Festivals.

A short sermon by the Dean of Westminster on behalf of the Clergy Orphan Schools preceded the Cantata, which was given from end to end without a break, and with full orchestral accompaniment. The work itself is too well known to need comment in this place; the rendering it received was on the whole commendable—a slight want of brilliancy and vigour was, however, apparent in the singing of the choruses. The solos were all taken by members of the Abbey Choir; the part of the Saviour being allotted to Mr. Hilton, and the solo "His salvation is nigh them" to Mr. Kearton, whose melodious voice was heard to great advantage; the boys also, between whom the treble and contralto solos were divided, acquitted themselves well. The total number of voices was slightly under 200, about 100 being adults; and the boys of the Abbey were strengthened by those from the Temple, Chapel Royal, and St. Peter's, Eaton Square. The organ erected specially for the Military Bands Festival (of which we speak in another column) was again used, the Organist being, as before, Mr. George C. Martin: the want of power noticeable on the former Festival was not the less apparent on the present occasion, and was equally to be regretted. Dr. Bridge was the Conductor.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

Two most interesting Concerts were given by this painstaking and efficient Society on Friday, the 13th, and Tuesday, the 17th ult., the first consisting of chamber music, the second of orchestral. The two concerted pieces at the first Concert were Brahms's Quartet in A (Op. 26), and Schubert's "Forellen" Quintet (Op. 114), admirably rendered by Mr. C. Villiers Stanford (the Society's indefatigable Conductor), Herr Richard Gompertz, Mr. A. Burnett, Rev. T. P. Hudson, and Mr. Prokatzsky. Between these two larger works Herr Gompertz played Bach's Chaconne for violin solo in a finished and masterly manner, worthy of his great master, Joachim, receiving a recall at its close.

The most important feature of the second Concert was the production of Mr. Hubert Parry's "Scenes from Prometheus Unbound," a work in cantata form, based on selections from Shelley's lyrical drama of that name. The words have been admirably chosen, the result being that in this shortened form the argument of the poem is brought much more clearly before the hearer than is the case when the poem is read in its entirety. The scenes chosen for musical treatment are the opening of Act I, the chorus of furies, and parts of the Earth's song of consolation, and the short chorus of spirits ("From unremembered ages") from the same Act, the part concluding with the verses at the close of Act II., beginning "Life of life! thy lips enkindle." This first part, opening with the gloomy darkness of Prometheus's soliloquy, increases in melodic beauty towards the end, until a climax is reached in the words at its close, which are set as a quartet of exquisite beauty and charm. The evident admiration displayed in this part for the "Music of the Future" may be a defect in some eyes, but this charge cannot, by the most prejudiced hearer, be brought against any of the music in the second part of the work. This opens with the tremendously dramatic scene in Act III., in which the rejoicings of Jupiter are cut short by the coming of Demogorgon to expel him from his power. A great solo for Jupiter culminates in a splendid burst of melody on the words, "Pour forth heaven's wine, Idæan Ganymede," which is remarkable for its spontaneous originality, and which is interrupted by an orchestral passage indicative of the approach of Demogorgon. The dramatic effect of the scene is heightened by the fact that the words of this mysterious being are set for a chorus of male voices. Readers will probably remember an effect of the same kind in the Prologue to Boito's "Mefistofele," performed last summer in London, where the words of the Deity are set in the same way. After the descent of Jupiter we come to one of the loveliest numbers of the work, the song of the Spirit of the Hour (soprano), in complete contrast to the previous scene. This is followed by a long and elaborate finale, consisting at first of a dialogue between various groups of Spirits, and after a time changing to a grand choral movement, built on splendidly broad subjects and adorned with many ingenious contrapuntal devices, which all lead up to the climax, an homophonous passage of great harmonic beauty, with which the work closes; the whole exhibiting the composer's thorough mastery over his materials, and being full of thoughtful, earnest work throughout.

The performance at Cambridge did great credit to all who took part in it. The soloists, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hélène Arnim, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. Frederick King, performed their parts admirably, excepting that Mr. Shakespeare showed a certain want of familiarity with both the notes and the words. The performance of the band and chorus, under the direction of Mr. C. V. Stanford, left nothing to be desired, and the work was enthusiastically received, the composer being repeatedly called at the end.

The Concert concluded with a capital performance of Schubert's C major Symphony—that "linked sweetness long drawn out"; again conducted by Mr. Stanford, Mr. A. Burnett being the leader of the orchestra.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

THE only musical events last month were the two Pianoforte Recitals of Herr Rubinstein. Fortunately the great pianist's unique powers are now too well known to need description, so we are spared the difficulty of describing the indescribable. Since his previous visit, four years ago, Herr Rubinstein's playing seems to have gained in delicacy and refinement, whilst losing none of the brilliancy and power which made his performances so remarkable. Some eccentricities of style before noticeable are either toned down or have entirely disappeared; and though his readings are still daringly original, they are comparatively free from the license which once bordered on the fantastic. His first Recital, given on the 12th ult., comprised Bach's Fantasia Chromatique and Fugue, Mozart's Fantasia in C minor, Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, Schumann's great Fantasia dedicated to Liszt, and selections from his own works and those of Chopin. The audience was very large, and the enthusiasm displayed rather resembled that evoked by a popular speaker at a political meeting than the milder demonstration of critical approval usual in the concert-room. At the second Recital, on the 23rd ult., the hall was crowded in every part, the orchestra being invaded by enthusiasts not able to obtain seats elsewhere. The programme, which was even more varied than at the previous Recital, included a Suite by Handel, Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 111, Mendelssohn's "Variations sérieuses," Schumann's "Etudes symphoniques," Liszt's Transcription of the "Erl-König," the Turkish March from the "Ruins of Athens," and pieces by Chopin, Field, Henselt, Thalberg, Liszt, and Rubinstein. It seems invidious to select any particular pieces for special commendation where the performance of the entire programme approached the phenomenal, but we may mention the Suite by Handel as being a most felicitous instance of the breadth and variety of treatment of which the old-fashioned harpsichord music is capable on a modern instrument in the hands of a great player. In Schumann's works Herr Rubinstein is always heard to unusual advantage, the genius of the older composer appearing to find a reflex in that of the great pianist, and his performance of the "Etudes symphoniques" was certainly one of the most remarkable displays of virtuosity ever listened to, even from Herr Rubinstein. The March from the "Ruins of Athens" was encored, and throughout the evening the applause was frequent and prolonged.

A DRAMATIC Cantata, entitled "The Golden Legend," by Mr. Henry Edward Hodson, M.A., was performed at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, on Monday afternoon, the 23rd ult., under the auspices of the Froebel Society, in aid of the Centenary Memorial Fund at Blankenburg. An excellent chorus, efficient band, and a staff of competent principal singers, under the conduct of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a very satisfactory rendering of the work. The original "Legenda Aurea" was written by one Jacobus de Voragine, a Dominican friar of the thirteenth century. The words used by the musician in the present case are from Longfellow's poem, "The Golden Legend." The cantata is divided into three parts, with a prologue and epilogue. It relates how the spirit of evil was frustrated in its attempts to work destruction on a sick prince, and how a gentle maiden heroically resolved to sacrifice her own life to deliver him from a spell that brought in its train misery and death; and it tells of the sweet and high reward that pure and self-sacrificing love brought her. The prologue, from a musical point of view, is full of interest. The utterances of Lucifer and his spirits afford a striking contrast to the chanting of the cathedral choir, in which the alto voices are unusually, yet admirably, utilised. The appearance, in the first part, of Lucifer to the sick prince, and the dialogue that ensues, are given with point; and the quintet in the second scene, "O gladsome light," is particularly attractive, yielding however in charm to Elsie's prayer, "My Redeemer and my Lord." In the aria allotted to Gottlieb, "The wind is roaring," the band completely drowned the singer's efforts. If words are to be used, why place it out of the power of the voice to express them? This division has an effective conclusion in the solo and chorus, "God sent His messengers." The second part supplies scenes equally adapted for musical illustration, and are effectively treated by the composer. The pilgrims chanting the hymn of St. Hildebert, "Urbs cœlestes," to the quiet accompaniments of the band, produce a capital and most appropriate effect: whilst the singing of the tempter, addressed from the sea, with the strains of Prince Henry in response, and the subsequent aria of Elsie on coming forth from her chamber, carry on the interest of the story most satisfactorily. The third part, reciting the happy union of the Prince and Elsie, and the failure of the evil designs of Lucifer, has also some excellent points. The principal singers were Madame Worrell, Miss Louise Augarde; Messrs. Kenningham, Stanley Smith, and Frederick Bevan.

THE Highbury Philharmonic Society gave its third Concert of the season at the Holloway Hall on Monday evening, the 23rd ult. The large room wherein the Society temporarily gives its performances was fairly well filled by an audience evidently taking a lively interest in the evening's doings. Hearty and frequent applause was the rule. Encores, however, were happily averted by the prudent regulations announced—that no repetitions could be allowed. The programme included two works of widely differing merits, Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," and Hatton's "Robin Hood." The former has long since been allotted a high place in art, and when heard—now unhappily but seldom, for our musical societies rarely give the opportunity—it never fails to secure the serious attention and admiration of all lovers of music of the highest order. Hatton's "Robin Hood" filled up the second part of the programme. Coming after the mighty and overwhelming genius of Beethoven, it had but little chance of gaining consideration or distinction. At any time it could not be received as a strong work; nevertheless, it would be unfair to entirely overlook many passages abounding with charming effects, notably the ballad, "Under the greenwood tree," beautifully sung on this occasion by Mr. E. Lloyd; and the part-song for forest-maidens, "In our forest dell." The solos were well delivered by Miss Kathleen Grant, Messrs. E. Lloyd, W. Forington, and Worssam. The choir throughout the evening sang with vigour and precision, and the instrumentalists were fairly efficient. Dr. Bridge directed his forces with the skill of an experienced musician.

MR. WINN gave an evening Concert at St. James's Hall, on Saturday, the 21st ult., which proved in every way successful. The artists who assisted were Miss Clara Samuelli, who gave a tender reading of Spohr's "Rose, softly blooming"; Miss Mary Davies, heard to advantage in Randegger's "What are they to do"; Madame Patey, received with acclamation both in Lindsay's "Sunday Morning" and Behrend's "Auntie"; Mr. Guy, recalled for a charming Serenade by J. Old; Mr. Cummings, honoured with a redemand for the barcarole, "O ma maitresse," by David; Mr. Santley, rapturously applauded for two popular ballads; and Mr. Lewis Thomas, received with favour for a characteristic reading of Stephen Adams's popular "Midshipmite." The concert-giver sang, in his well-known excellent style, Handel's "O ruddier than the cherry," and the old ballad, "Come, lasses and lads." It is not too much to say that the warmest interest felt by those present was centred in the efforts of his daughter, Madame Florence Winn, who sang Barnby's most expressive song, "When the tide comes in," and the Scotch, or rather Newcastle, ditty, "Call'er herrin'." In both she showed that the fine voice given by nature had been thoroughly trained under the tuition of her father. She secured the sympathy, and thoroughly deserved the hearty applause, of the large audience assembled. The London Vocal Union sang some part-songs, in which Mr. Hodges' voice was conspicuous for its agreeable quality. M. Sainton played two compositions of his own, a Berceuse and a Scherzettino, in his well-known charming manner.

MR. GEORGE GEAR's annual Concert, held at St. George's Hall on Friday afternoon, the 6th ult., was attended by a fairly numerous audience, drawn together by the interest naturally taken in the career of a promising young musician. It will be understood, therefore, that attention was centred in Mr. Gear's contributions to the programme announced for performance, first and foremost of which in point of merit was the Sonata in C, Op. 53 (Beethoven), commonly called the "Waldstein." A work of such gigantic dimensions requires the very highest qualifications, and should on no account be attempted lightly. Only remarkable artists are able properly to approach such music without an amount of doubt and diffidence. Some constraining feeling of this kind must have been felt by Mr. Gear, for, although most correct and painstaking, he on this occasion lacked brilliancy and fire. In addition to playing in the second part the Nocturne in E flat, Op. 9, No. 2 (Chopin), and Valse fantastique from his own pen, he, in conjunction with Signor Erba, performed the duet Rondo Brillante in B minor, Op. 70, for piano and violin (Schubert), and Rondo in A (Mozart). The vocalists who assisted were Miss Cecilia Fuller, Miss Edith Brandon, Madame Mary Cummings, and Mr. Bernard Lane. Mr. Henry Parker accompanied.

The Tufnell Park Choral Society gave the second Concert of the season on Tuesday evening, April 26, at St. George's Rooms, N., when Sullivan's new and popular work, "The Martyr of Antioch," was performed to a large and gratified audience. The first chorus of heathen worshippers puts any body of voices to a severe test, not only by requiring precision, but also by demanding faithful observance of light and shade, for upon the latter point much of the success of the work depends. It must be said, however, that the Society came most creditably out of the ordeal; and marked the entire performance of the work by an intimate knowledge and an intelligent reading that reflected great credit on the industry of the Conductor. The solos were, with one exception, taken by members of the Society, the exception being the excellent soprano, Miss Hoare. Misses Angel, Harding, Tabram, and Philips; Messrs. Martin, Day, Smith, Puzey, Hodgson, and Grylls, accomplished their tasks in an admirable manner. Mr. W. Henry Thomas conducted with his usual skill and discretion.

THE seventh annual Students' Concert of the Academy for the Higher Development of Pianoforte-Playing took place at the Marlborough Rooms, Regent Street, on Saturday afternoon, the 7th ult., when the following pupils appeared: Misses Stonard, Hardy, Stone, E. Wildy, Ranyell, Macmahon, Freda Porter, Gedge, Hutchison, and Rosselli; and Messrs. Aldridge and Dubrucq. The programme was admirably fitted to show off to the best advantage the young performers. It need not be said that many of the numbers were but imperfectly rendered, but perhaps it would be out of place to apply ordinary criticism to the tentative efforts of young students. Yet several of the performers deserve now to receive some special recognition, as indeed they did obtain from the hands of the numerous and highly interested audience. Miss Macmahon, for instance, was recalled after her rendering of the Impromptu in F sharp, Op. 36 (Chopin); Mr. Aldridge receiving a like compliment, and Mr. Dubrucq, who appeared in the double rôle of pianist and composer, was heartily applauded for his efforts.

AN Organ Recital, in aid of the Henry Smart Memorial Fund, was given at St. Augustine's, Highbury New Park, on Thursday evening, April 28, by Mr. A. M. Colchester (Organist of the church), assisted by Mr. A. E. Bishop (Organist of St. Mary, Abchurch, City). The programme consisted chiefly of Mr. Smart's compositions, amongst which, were his "Festival March," "Evening Prayer," Andante in E minor, and "Grand Solemn March," all of which were played in a masterly manner by Mr. A. M. Colchester. Mr. Bishop performed Mendelssohn's second Sonata, Guilmant's Communion in A flat, and an "Air with variations" (composed by H. Smart for the opening of the Albert Hall Organ). The hymn, "Hark, hark, my soul" (Smart's tune, 325, "Hymns Ancient and Modern"), was sung during the time the collection was being made; and the hymn, "O Paradise" (Smart's tune, 324, "Hymns Ancient and Modern"), was sung at the conclusion of the Recital. It is to be regretted that an effort is not made to complete the organ, which is at present in a most unsatisfactory state.

Mlle. JULIE PELLETIER'S Soirée Musicale took place on Wednesday, April 27, at the Beethoven Rooms, Harley Street, the Conductors being Signor Li Calsi (pianist to H.R.H. the Duchess of Cambridge), Signor Samuelli, and Herr Lehmyer. Mlle. Pelletier was assisted by Madame (Strindberg) Elmore, Miss Ida Audain, Miss Agabeg, Herr Oberthür, and Signor Erba, instrumentalists; and Mrs. Powers, Miss Eugénie Kemble, Miss Carlotta Wilmers, M. A. de Martelly, Signor Monari-Rocca, and Mr. Frank Elmore, vocalists. Herr Schuberth contributed a violoncello solo which won great applause. Mlle. Pelletier was in excellent voice, and rendered her portion of the programme in her usual finished manner, the Duet "Ama," in which she was ably supported by M. A. de Martelly, being marked by a double encore. During the evening Mr. Cyril Audain gave a recitation, and Mr. Berridge a reading. The programme throughout, a well-selected and excellently rendered one, was thoroughly and deservedly appreciated by a crowded audience.

At the monthly Church Meeting of the friends and members of Latimer Congregational Church, Mile End, on Thursday, April 28, a handsome testimonial was presented to Mr. Jno. Mills, who has lately resigned the office of Choirmaster. The presentation, which consisted of a richly bound Oxford Bible, the "Biblical Treasury," in five volumes, and several complete works of the great composers, was made by the minister, Rev. J. W. Atkinson, who spoke warmly of the manner in which Mr. Mills had performed the duties during the last six years, and of the hearty appreciation by the church and choir of his exertions in their behalf.

THE evening Concert given at the Drill Hall, Bromley, Kent, on Thursday, April 28, by the Plaistow Choral Society, was an occasion of special interest, inasmuch as it was the first public performance of the young Society. The programme, in addition to some high class part-songs, included Macfarren's "May Day." The cantata was rendered with spirit and accuracy by the choir, numbering some seventy voices. Indeed, the choral pieces generally showed that the members had practised well together at the rehearsals of the season, under the careful guidance of their Conductor, Mr. F. Lewis Thomas. The soprano solo in "May Day" was sung in an admirable manner by Miss Hoare. Mr. Abercrombie also achieved success in Handel's "Where'er you walk," and the old ballad, "Sally in our alley"; and Mr. Lewis Thomas evoked hearty applause by declaiming Handel's "Honour and arms" and Adams' "Midshipmite." The accompaniments were efficiently played on two grand pianos by Messrs. Fred. W. Partridge and W. Henry Thomas.

THE South London Choral Association gave its second Concert of the third season on Thursday evening, the 19th ult., at St. James's Hall. The successful efforts of the evening were "Two angel hands" (Pinsuti) and "The Bells" (Lahee); both of these works receiving almost perfect justice in performance. As much, however, cannot be said of "Hear my Prayer" (Mendelssohn) and "O clap your hands" (Stainer). In the execution of both compositions the need of more rehearsals was felt in order to render the efforts worthy of an important choral society. The soloists were Miss Catherine Penna, Madame Patey, and Mr. Edward Lloyd. Madame Patey sang Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn" and Behrend's new song, "Auntie," to perfection, and, responding to a "call" for the latter, she substituted "The Bailiff's Daughter." Mr. Lloyd gave "In native worth" and "Sally in our alley" in his well-known and highly successful manner. Signor Papini contributed violin solos, and Mr. Venables conducted.

MR. HENRY PARKER gave a morning Concert at St. James's Hall on the 4th ult. The principal feature of the programme was Odoardo Barri's Cantata for female voices, "The Dream Queen." The music of this is decidedly pretty and graceful, especially the choruses, which are effectively written for the voices, though quite unpretentious. Madame Florence Clare, Miss Thorndike, and Miss Mary McLean, gave great satisfaction in the solos, and the choral numbers were well sung by Mr. Stedman's choir-boys. The music of the cantata is interspersed with lengthy—perhaps too lengthy—recitation, which, however, was rendered in his usual impressive manner by Mr. Charles Fry. The miscellaneous part of the programme included several songs and other compositions by Mr. Parker. Beside the performers already named, Miss de Fonblanque, Mr. Faulkner Leigh, Mr. Walter Bolton, and Mr. Victor Buziau took part in the Concert.

AN evening Concert was given, under the direction of Mr. George Calkin, in the Vestry Hall, Hampstead, on the 3rd ult., before a large and appreciative audience. Part I. consisted of the first part of "Elijah." The choruses were rendered by the St. Mark's Choral Society in an admirable and effective manner, and Miss Marion Wardroper, Miss Mary Willis, Mr. G. Lance Calkin, and Mr. Webb sang the principal parts with much success. In the second part Mr. G. Lance Calkin gave with much feeling "The angel at the window" (Berthold Tours), after which the Choral Society sang a beautiful part-song composed by Baptiste Calkin, and entitled, "Night winds that so gently flow." Mr. King Hall played two harmonium solos, and Mr. Val Nicholson a fantasia on the violin. The Concert was brought to a close by the choir singing "Song of the Vikings" (Eaton Faning) in a manner which deserves the highest praise.

At the Leeds Town Hall 10,000 persons have, we understand, attended the three successive Recitals on the grand organ, "In memoriam, the Earl of Beaconsfield," by the Corporation Organist, Dr. Spark, who also produced a new and effective Funeral March for the occasion, which has been published and appropriately dedicated to Mrs. Blagden (wife of the vicar of Hughenden), who played the music at the funeral service of the late earl.

THE second Concert of the Woodside Musical Society was held at the Public Hall, South Norwood, on Wednesday evening, the 4th ult. The room was well filled by an attentive audience, who derived pleasure by listening to an admirable performance, and at the same time did good service by assisting the funds of the National Schools, Woodside, for which charitable object the Concert was given. The first part of the programme, devoted to sacred music, included Mendelssohn's "Christus." Regarding the performance of this work, much must be said in praise, for the many difficulties of the choral numbers were fairly overcome. The tenor recitatives were intelligently rendered by Mr. J. G. Langton. The second part opened with the chorus, "Who shall be queen?" from Macfarren's "May Day," which also received due justice. In addition, several members of the Society contributed miscellaneous songs more or less successfully. Mr. Fred. W. Partridge conducted carefully and well; and added to his honours by singing, most admirably, Gounod's "Nazareth."

IN the presence of a somewhat numerous audience, Mr. H. Walsley Little (Organist of St. Matthew's, Denmark Hill) gave a Concert of an excellent character at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, on Monday evening, the 23rd ult. The solo vocalists were Misses Mary Davies, Annie Matthews, and Marian McKenzie; Messrs. Henry Guy and Maybrick, each of whom elicited well-earned marks of appreciation. Part-music, including a composition by the bénéficiaire, was very fairly interpreted by the Denmark Hill Choral Society. Mr. Little did not act in the capacity of soloist, but was heard in successful association with Mr. H. A. Campbell in "Tarantelle" (Raff). Mr. Tobias A. Matthey executed Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise," and violin soli were played by Miss Colvina Waite (pupil of M. Sainton).

MISS HOPE GLENN gave a very successful morning Concert, under the patronage of the Earl of Dunmore, at Aberdeen House, on the 12th ult., before a large audience. Miss Glenn was assisted by many eminent artists, and the result was an entertainment of more than usual interest. The vocalists were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Hope Glenn, Mr. C. Abercrombie, Lord Bennett, and Mr. Edward Plater's Glee Union; pianoforte, Miss Bessie Waugh and Mr. W. G. Cusins; violin, Signor Consolo; and violoncello, M. Lasserre. Miss Glenn was heard to great advantage in "Or là sull' onda" (Mercadante), and in songs by Arne; and Mrs. Osgood's rendering of three songs (MS.) by Cowen, accompanied by the composer, formed a prominent feature in the programme. Mr. W. Kuhe, Mr. J. Pittman, and Signor Pinsuti conducted.

THE third Concert of the Kilburn Musical Association for the present season took place on the 4th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given, the performance being for the benefit of the Directors. The choruses were sung with great precision and spirit, the accompaniments being played upon an harmonium and piano. The soloists were Miss Florence Norman, whose singing met with especial favour; Miss Allitsen, encoired in "O rest in the Lord"; Mr. Ben Davies, who achieved a real triumph in "Then shall the righteous"; and Mr. W. F. Clare, who, although suffering from severe indisposition, acquitted himself creditably. The trio, "Lift thine eyes," had to be repeated. Mr. A. Gollmick conducted with his usual ability.

At a special Musical Service given at St. Barnabas Church, King Square, Goswell Road, on Wednesday evening, the 18th ult., a selection from Handel's Oratorio, "Judas Maccabeus," was performed by the St. Barnabas Musical Society, assisted by a band under the leadership of Mr. Bent. The solos were efficiently rendered by Miss Anita Austin, Miss Mantell, Mrs. Sutton, Mr. Shedrick, and Mr. Luckville Evans. Mr. J. M. Ennis presided at the organ, and Mr. Lopresti conducted.

A RUBINSTEIN Concert is announced to take place at the Crystal Palace on the 11th inst., when an interesting programme will be presented, and the Sacred Drama "The Tower of Babel" will be given for the first time in England.

THE Church of England Temperance Society held, as a part of their Annual Festival, a Special Choral Service in St. Paul's Cathedral, on Monday evening, the 2nd ult. The musical arrangements were in the hands of the Lay Helpers' Association, whose choir acquitted themselves in a most creditable manner, repeating the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis composed specially for their recent Festival by Mr. C. E. Miller (noticed in these columns in April last), and selecting for the anthem Dr. Bridge's "It is a good thing to give thanks." The prayers were intoned by the Rev. Dr. Simpson, Succentor of St. Paul's; the Bishop of Bedford being the preacher. Mr. W. S. Hoyte presided at the organ, and Mr. C. E. Miller conducted.

ON the 12th ult. an evening Concert was given in the Athenæum, Camden Road, under the direction of Mr. H. B. Gibbs, in aid of the Church Funds of St. Mary, Hornsey Rise, when a selection of secular music was performed. The Chorus consisted of thirty voices, and included the greater part of the church choir. Miss Clara Samuelli, R.A.M., Miss Grace Maine, (National Training School of Music), Mr. J. H. Asman, Mr. C. A. White (R.A.M.), Mr. James Budd, and others, kindly assisted. Some part-songs were well sung under the skilful bâton of Signor A. Mora, and the "Patriotic March," by Edwin Bending, was ably rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. H. B. Gibbs.

Two Special Choral Services in connection with the Church of England Sunday School Institute have been held during the past month; one on Thursday, the 5th ult., in Westminster Abbey, and the other on Monday, the 9th ult., at St. Paul's Cathedral. At the former of these, intended chiefly for youths, King's Evening Service in F, and Sir John Goss's Anthem, "O praise the Lord of Heaven," were efficiently rendered by a special choir, assisted by the boys of the Abbey, Dr. Bridge presiding at the organ; while at the latter the music was of a plainer character, the Sunday evening choir receiving the assistance of the boys of the Temple and Lincoln's Inn choirs, and the Organist being Dr. Stainer.

THE Incorporated Church Building Society held their Festival on Friday evening, the 20th ult., in St. Paul's Cathedral. The musical portion of the service, which was fully choral, was sustained by the choir of the cathedral, consisting of eighteen men and the usual number of boys, without any external assistance. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was Martin in B flat (written for military band); and Spohr's Cantata, "God, Thou art Great," which occupied the place of the anthem, received an excellent rendering. A sermon on behalf of the fund was preached by the Lord Bishop of Truro (Dr. Benson), and Mr. G. C. Martin, Sub-Organist of the cathedral, presided at the organ.

ON Friday, the 20th ult., the Grosvenor Choral Society, at their monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, gave a very successful performance of Gade's Cantata "The Crusaders," the solos being rendered by Miss Annie Daymond, R.A.M., Mr. Charles Strong, and Mr. Henry R. Baker. Miss Florence Hartley accompanied on the pianoforte, and Mr. D. Woodhouse on the harmonium. Some part-songs and vocal solos were given in the second part of the programme, the latter by Miss Vivienne Hamilton, Mr. Charles Strong, Mr. Thos. Nettleship, and Mr. Henry R. Baker. The Concert was under the direction of Mr. G. R. Egerton.

AN interesting Exhibition of Ancient and Modern Musical Instruments is announced to take place at the Alexandra Palace from July 2 to 23. Several valuable ancient instruments have already been promised, and eminent manufacturing and trading firms have signified their intention of co-operating in the undertaking. Lectures will be given on the improvements which have from time to time been effected, and illustrated by performances of efficient players on the various instruments displayed.

THE examination for Associateship and Fellowship of the College of Organists will take place at the College on July 6 and 7. Candidates for Associateship may obtain the list of subjects included in the paper to be prepared for that department of the College Examinations upon application to the Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. H. Turpin.

MESSRS. W. H. BAMFORD and C. E. Luker, respectively the Organist and Choirmaster of St. James's Church, Camberwell, gave a successful Concert, at Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on April 28. Vocal contributions were given by Madame Adeline Paget, Misses Matilda Roby, Pauline Featherby and Davey; Messrs. Sidney Tower, Luker, Holliday, F. Smith, Daniel, and Chaplin Henry. The instrumental music comprised pianoforte duets by Messrs. Bamford and John Harrison; the former also executing "Tarantelle" (Jarvis) and "Polonaise" (Moniuszko).

THE following have consented to act as examiners for the musical diplomas and other higher certificates of Trinity College, London, in July next: Sir Julius Benedict; Dr. A. E. Dyer, Organist of Cheltenham College; Sir George Elvey, Mus. D., Organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor; Mr. C. S. Jekyll, Organist to Her Majesty's Chapels Royal; Mr. James Keene, F.R.C.S., England; Mr. G. A. Osborne; Mr. C. Hubert H. Parry, Mus. B.; Mr. A. L. Peace, Organist of Glasgow Cathedral; Dr. W. H. Sangster; and Mr. D. J. Wood, Mus. B., Organist of Exeter Cathedral.

A FESTIVAL Service in aid of the East London Mission was held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday evening, the 12th ult., the music being rendered by a contingent of the London Church Choir Association, under the conductorship of Mr. J. R. Murray. The Order of Service, being the same in all respects as that used at the Festival of the Association in November last, and noticed at the time in these columns, does not now call for further remark from us. There was a fair congregation, and a sermon in aid of the Mission Fund was preached by the Bishop of Bedford, under whose auspices it originated.

THE Canterbury Diocesan Choral Union purpose holding their eighteenth Festival on Tuesday afternoon, the 14th inst., in the noble Cathedral of the diocese. The Service-book, which has been prepared with great care, contains the whole of the hymn-tunes, chants, and responses to be used, as well as the vocal scores of E. J. Hopkins's Chant Service in F, composed for Sion College Choral Union in 1875, and the Anthem, "The Glory of the Lord," by Sir John Goss. The names of Dr. S. S. Wesley and J. Baptiste Calkin appear among the composers of the hymn-tunes.

THE first Smoking Concert of the Blackheath Glee and Madrigal Club was held on the 25th ult., the Rev. F. G. Holbrooke presiding. The programme consisted of part-songs, glees, and madrigals, by Bishop, Beale, Becker, Cooke, Stevens and Sullivan, well rendered by a choir numbering about thirty-five voices. Mr. Arthur Oswald was the vocalist, and his songs—including a new composition, "To Arms," by Mr. Charles E. Tinney—were enthusiastically received. Mr. Sidney Tinney gave a cleverly played solo on the flageolet, and Mr. Henry R. A. Robinson was the pianist.

A SPECIAL Service was held at St. Thomas's Church, Portman Square, on Thursday evening, April 28, at which "Judas Maccabæus" was performed. The soloists were Miss Adela Vernon, Miss White, Mr. Trelawney Cobham, and Mr. Henry Baker. The choir, consisting of upwards of 100 voices, sang throughout with an earnestness deserving of all praise. Mr. E. H. Birch, Mus. B., Oxon., presided at the organ. The whole of the musical arrangements were intrusted to Mr. Edmund Rogers, Organist of the church, who conducted.

THE fifth annual Choral Festival Service of Nonconformist Choirs took place in the City Temple, on Thursday, the 12th ult., under the direction of Mr. E. Minshall, the Organist of the church. Sixteen choirs took part, the whole forming a choir of 400 voices. The anthems were "The heavens are telling" (Haydn) and "Praise God in His holiness" (Tours). The music was well rendered throughout.

IN spite of rumours to the contrary, it is now announced that Mdlle. Zaré Thalberg—who was married to the Marquis de la Petrella Pulce Doria, at Naples, on April 14 last—has resolved to retire from the profession.

THE fourth Concert of the St. Giles's Choral Society was given in the Mission Hall, Little Wild Street, Drury Lane, on the 17th ult. The singing of the choir was very good. The soloists were the Misses Barry and Wilkinson, and Messrs. Haywood and Leonard. A feature at the concert was the introduction of a young pianist, Miss Emily Ray, who played the pianoforte accompaniments throughout, and was also very successful in a pianoforte solo. Valuable assistance was rendered by Mr. Arthur Haywood at the harmonium.

MR. JAMES SAUVAGE gave an evening Concert at the Athenæum, Shepherd's Bush, on Friday, the 13th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The artists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Clara Samuëll, Miss Annette Albu, Miss Damian, Madame Patey, Messrs. Ben. Davies, Gabriel Thorpe, James Sauvage, and Signor Foli; the accompanist being Mr. Sidney Naylor. Mr. Sauvage's baritone voice was heard to great advantage in Handel's "O ruddier than the cherry" and the "Gold Song" from "Dinorah."

A FINE-TONED Organ, by Messrs. Walker and Sons, of Francis Street, Tottenham Court Road, was opened at St. James's Church, Camberwell, on Wednesday evening last, the 25th ult., in the presence of a very numerous congregation. The Service, which was fully choral, was commendably rendered, and included the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis from Calkin in B flat; Anthem, "In that day" (Sir G. Elvey), and Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus. The instrument, which cost £800, was ably played by Mr. W. S. Hoyte, who also gave a Recital after the Service.

A PERFORMANCE of Sacred Music, principally selections from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," was given at Brixton Independent Church, on Tuesday evening, the 11th ult. The South London Choral Association, under the bâton of Mr. Leonard C. Venables, sang with much precision. The soloists were Madame Worrell, Miss Pauline Featherby, Mr. A. J. Thompson, and Mr. Alfred Moore. Messrs. A. Rhodes and W. H. Harper accompanied.

ON Tuesday, the 17th ult., at Trinity College, Mr. Henry C. Nixon's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, which had gained the prize of fifteen guineas offered by the College, was performed for the first time by Miss Florence Browning and Mr. E. Woolhouse. Tickets for the occasion were forwarded too late for use, and our opinion as to the merits of the work must therefore be reserved.

MR. CHARLES GARDNER'S sixteenth annual Matinée Musicale will take place on Tuesday, the 14th inst., at the Marlborough Rooms, 307, Regent Street. The artists announced are Madame Leonora Braham, Miss Marian McKenzie, Signor Gustave Garcia (vocalists); Herr Ludwig (violin), M. Albert (violoncello), Mr. Charles Gardner (pianoforte), and Mr. Fountain Meen (accompanist).

ON Tuesday evening, the 17th ult., Mr. Fountain Meen, Organist of Union Chapel, Islington, gave an organ recital at the Presbyterian Church, Holly Park, Crouch Hill. Notwithstanding the unfavourable weather there was a tolerably good audience. The Recital was varied by solos from the "Creation," sung by Madame Margaret Buntine.

AN Organ Recital was given at St. Mary's, Brookfield, Highgate, on Sunday evening, the 15th ult., after the usual service, by Mr. Albert E. Bishop, of St. Mary, Abchurch, City. The programme included works by Mendelssohn, Merkel, and others. The organ, a new one by Messrs. Brindley and Foster, is only partially completed.

IN consequence of Bank Holiday falling on the first Monday in June, the final meeting of the present season of the Musical Association has been postponed until Monday, the 20th instant, when a Paper will be read by F. Meadows White, Esq., Q.C., the subject being "A concise view of the Law of Copyright as affecting Musical Composers."

IT is announced that during the meeting of the Church Congress in the present year there will be a Special Service in St. Andrew's Church, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, when Dr. Armes's new Church Oratorio, "St. John the Evangelist," will be sung by a choir organised expressly for the occasion by Mr. T. Albion Alderson.

A COMMITTEE has been formed for the presentation of a testimonial to Professor Ella, in recognition of his long services to the cause of musical art. The list of subscribers is already considerable, and includes many eminent names in music and the sister arts. The Secretary is Alan Cole, Esq., 20, Redcliffe Road, S.W.

IN recognition of services rendered during a lengthy period, a complimentary Concert was given to Mrs. Stevenson, at the Institute, Priory Grove, South Lambeth, on the 2nd ult. The attendance was very large.

THE members of the South London Musical Club gave their tenth private Concert, before a numerous audience, at Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on Tuesday evening, the 3rd ult.

REVIEWS.

The Village Fair. An Alpine Idyl. Cantata for Female Voices. Words by Jetty Vogel. Music by W. H. Longhurst, Mus. Doc. Cantuar.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE subject of this Cantata is thus briefly told: "Suzanne and Aline, compelled by poverty, come from their mountain home to the Village Fair, in order to sell Charmante, their favourite and last-remaining cow. Out of harmony with the mirthful scene, they are received somewhat derisively by the village girls, led by Lisette. At the last moment unexpected help arrives, and all ends joyously." This "unexpected help," it may be said, comes from Conrad, the son of Suzanne, who, at the right moment, returns from India to share his "silver and his gold" with his family. There is always danger in selecting a story for musical illustration where the scene is laid in Switzerland; not because it is difficult to preserve the traditional characteristics of the country, but because this "local colour," as it is termed, will too often obtrude itself, to the detriment of that artistic design which is imperative when no such convenient aid is at hand. In this case, however, the composer has wisely resisted such temptation; for, although his Introduction is "à la Suisse" and a choral "Aio! Aio!" is once heard, as a rule the music is sufficiently abstract to be judged on its own merits. The Introduction is rather weak; but the chorus, "The bells they are ringing," is flowing, vocal, and melodious. The Trio which follows, for first and second soprano, and contralto, has many good points; and the unaccompanied Part-song, "Dear is the shed," is extremely effective. The Duet between Aline and her mother, "Ah! do not weep," is simple in construction, but contains some good writing, a point of interest being the agitato phrase in B flat minor, on the words "The sunshine all is shaded," the return to the key being managed with much skill. The choruses for the girls are extremely pleasing; and the airs for the principal characters—especially the "Song of the Mountain Flowers," for Suzanne, with an ad lib. harmonium accompaniment—may be made highly attractive with even moderately good singing. We may also mention a song for Aline, in which the chorus is interwoven, and a solo for Suzanne, leading to a Duet and Trio, the accompaniment to which has much character. The final chorus, "Joy to the Wanderer," is extremely unpretending; but melodious enough to bring to an effective conclusion another meritorious addition to the many drawing-room pieces for female voices which the present musical age has drawn forth.

Novello, Ewer and Co's. Pianoforte Albums. Edited by Berthold Tours.

Nos. 4, 5 and 6. Compositions by George Frederick Handel. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

ASSUREDLY the many pianoforte students who are desirous of devoting themselves to the practice of the works of the classical composers cannot now complain either of the compositions not being ready to their hands, or of the outlay required to procure them. We have already noticed the numbers of the "Pianoforte Album" containing the works of Bach, and have now before us, precisely in the same form, those of Handel. Since the study of high-class pianoforte music has become so general, not only the more elaborate, but the minor pieces of Bach have been republished and extensively circulated amongst amateurs; but comparatively little is known of Handel; and we have met with even advanced pianists who are astonished at finding that the composer of the "Messiah" has written hornpipes. In the admirable selection contained in these volumes we assure our readers that they will be enabled to make acquaintance with many exquisite compositions of which they did not previously know even the existence; and of course will also meet with many old friends. In addition to Fugues, we have Chaconnes, Sarabandes, Gavottes, Bourrées, Gigue, Courantes, Musettes, Airs with variations—including that known as "The Harmonious Blacksmith"—and also the characteristic Hornpipe in F, from the "Water Music." The work is most clearly printed, and carefully edited; and pianists not intimately acquainted with music of Handel's day will, we are certain, thank Mr. Berthold Tours for his explanation of the various signs which so often occur in these compositions.

Hints to Young Teachers of the Pianoforte, and all who are interested in Musical Instruction. By George Frederick West. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

HAD Mr. West no other claim to be heard in the cause of healthy musical instruction than the fact of his being, as he affirms, "a teacher of thirty years' experience" he would assuredly command attention; but he is well known as a successful "arranger" for young players, and may be presumed, therefore, to understand their requirements. Truly he says, "If a young pupil be allowed to fancy she is progressing in proportion to the number of tunes she can manage to stumble through, it will some day cause her much unhappiness, and her master will feel it an unpleasant task to undeceive her." Here indeed is the root of the mischief; but, unfortunately, in these instances it is not so much the fault of the pupil as of the parent or guardian that the evil continues; for if a young player is flattered into the belief that she is a performer at home, it is not at all likely that she will believe those candid friends who may hint that there is any room for improvement; and the consequence is that the truth dawns upon her when it is too late to retrace her steps. The late Mr. Cipriani Potter used invariably to draw a line between teaching "pieces" and teaching "music," and would be assured, before accepting an engagement as a master, that it was for the latter purpose his services were required. The author of the book before us gives some really valuable hints on the subject he evidently has so much at heart; but—although we have not one word to say against the value of the works he recommends—his suggestions appear somewhat weakened by his constant reference, in foot-notes, to books published by only one firm, not another work being even mentioned. Although Mr. West addresses his "Hints" to teachers of the Pianoforte, both pupils and those who have the care of them will derive much profit from an attentive perusal of the Treatise, which is well considered and well written throughout.

Four River Songs. Trios for Female Voices.

No. 1. Pangbourne. No. 2. Clieveden Woods.

" 3. Sonning Lock. " 4. Hurley Mill.

Written and Composed by F. Corder.

THESE four contributions to "Novello's Collection of Trios, Quartets, &c., for Female Voices," should be warmly welcomed both by singers and teachers. Mr. Corder is one of the most promising of the rising young English composers; and cannot be too earnestly encouraged in a career upon which he has so successfully entered, as nothing comes from his pen which has not been duly and maturely considered. The graceful and melodious style with which all these "River Songs" are coloured will assuredly be appreciated by every listener, and as there are no difficulties to frighten even the most sensitive vocalist, they can be conscientiously recommended for drawing-room performance. No. 1, although extremely simple in construction, contains some effective passages of imitation; No. 2, however, being perhaps even more attractive in melodious beauty—a charming phrase to the lines commencing "Sun, oh set not," and a sympathetic semiquaver accompaniment to the opening subject, on its recurrence to the words, "The evening bell recalls us," being amongst the many excellent points to which we may direct attention. No. 3 has a flowing theme, in 6-4 rhythm, well adapted to the lazy verses to which it is wedded, the coolness of the shade "underneath the willows" being admirably reflected in the music. No. 4 is set to a rhythmical subject, the effect of which is heightened by a triplet semiquaver accompaniment, occasionally broken where the words seem to require repose. As all these songs will doubtless be most acceptable—from the character of the words as well as the music—in domestic concerts, we may say that the pianoforte accompaniments, although essential to the effect of the compositions, are easily within the means of moderate amateurs.

A Musical Christmas Tree. Five characteristic pieces for the Pianoforte.

Six Album Leaves for the Pianoforte.

Allemande. Morceau de Salon, pour le Piano.

Composed by Charles Wehle.

[Forsyth Brothers.]

WE have selected these three from a number of pianoforte compositions by an artist who certainly writes both gracefully and melodiously for his instrument, although his music has scarcely that individuality which would stamp him as a composer of mark. The "Musical Christmas Tree" has decided merit, especially in the little pieces entitled, "In the Church," "Infant Jesus," and "Christmas Fête," the last-named being redeemed from commonplace by some effective passages of imitation. We infinitely prefer, however, the "Six Album Leaves"; for here we have three sketches—"Alma," "Styrienne," and "Serenade," which, although demanding mind as well as fingers for their due effect, will be cordially welcomed by pianists who desire to give pleasure rather than to excite wonder. The "Allemande" has a pleasing florid subject for the right hand, with little but accompaniment for the left. The second theme forms a good contrast with this; but we cannot say that we like the triads descending in fifths with which it commences. Disregard of established rules may be tolerated when a good effect is gained; but these have not a good effect, and we shall not be accused of pedantry, therefore, in recording our opinion. We may say that all these pieces are edited and carefully fingered by Charles Hallé.

Communion Service in E flat. By Carl Maria von Weber. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE cordially welcome this English adaptation of the above-named work. A critical examination of the musical part will not be expected or required, as this Mass is already well known in its original Latin form. The most important movements are the "Gloria in excelsis" and the "Credo," the latter of which opens grandly with three notes in unison for the voices, thereby giving a kind of theological reflection to the music, while the former is joyous and exultant in the extreme. We may add that the voice parts are, for music of this kind, exceedingly simple, and the accompaniment, though possessing much of the composer's lively characteristics, is not too exacting, so that the work lies within the reach of any moderately ambitious choir. The English adaptation is by the Rev. W. Russell, and the orchestral part has been condensed into an excellent pianoforte accompaniment by Mr. Berthold Tours.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat. By Joseph Barnby. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE publication of a new festival setting of these canticles by Mr. Barnby is an event of importance for church choirmasters and organists. We see by the title-page that this work was composed for this year's Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, held in St. Paul's Cathedral, and it is therefore scored for orchestra. We predict that Mr. Barnby's admirers will have cause for satisfaction on becoming acquainted with this composition, for it contains many points of effect and interest, and undoubtedly shows the strong hand of a master: at the same time we are bound to observe that some of the melodious phrases approach very nearly to the style of the modern part-song. The Magnificat opens with an elegant eight-barred phrase, which reappears afterwards in several places. At the words "He hath shewed strength with His arm," occurs a passage of much dramatic power; and although the modulations at first sight appear to be rather abrupt and unexpected, we feel convinced that on closer acquaintance this passage will be found both effective and fine. The Nunc dimittis, contrary to common usage, is developed to nearly the same length as the Magnificat; in fact, this canticle is treated in rather an anthem-like form, and notwithstanding the more than allusion to one of Beethoven's finest sonatas, we think it is a work which occupies a very high position among Mr. Barnby's contributions to church music. Although the accompaniments are originally intended for the orchestra, yet, with the hints given as to instrumentation, they can be quite effectively played upon the organ.

Practical Organ Building. By W. E. Dickson, M.A., Precentor of Ely Cathedral. [Crosby Lockwood and Co.]

"This little work is undertaken," the author tells us in his preface, "because it is believed that no treatise on the construction of organs, at once short, practical, and accessible by all classes of readers, is extant." Mr. Dickson's book, however, is by no means a "little work," for although not elaborated to any extent, every portion of the organ is clearly explained, and very plain directions given for constructing an instrument which, as he says, shall be "creditable to its builder." We are glad to find the author emphatically supporting the fact that the process of voicing metal pipes is one which can only be satisfactorily accomplished by a person who has given to the subject years of steady practice under skilled guidance. "A very sensitive and educated ear," he observes, "a delicate sense of touch in the handling of fine tools, and a thorough familiarity with the tonal quality, or timbre, of the best examples of the many varieties of pipes—these gifts are essential to the successful voicer." In the instructions afterwards given, the author freely acknowledges his indebtedness to a little tract of about forty pages on "Organ Voicing and Tuning," which he strongly recommends to those who desire to become masters of this important subject. In recommending Mr. Dickson's work, we do not by any means desire that it should supplant Hopkins and Rimbault's volume, or indeed any book where the matter is treated in a thoroughly exhaustive manner; but as the author tells us that he was once a "plodding and untiring boy-workman himself," it may reasonably be presumed that he sufficiently sympathises with other aspiring young organ-builders; and that his chief aim, therefore, is to smooth the path of those who might otherwise be deterred from their task by unforeseen difficulties.

Light. Song. Words by F. E. Weatherly. Music by Joseph Barnby. [Metzler and Co.]

If any vocalist will study the words of this song before singing it as earnestly as Mr. Barnby has evidently done before composing it, no sympathetic listener can fail to be struck with its poetical beauty. The modulations in many places may be pronounced bold, but throughout the composition the desire has evidently been to intensify the quiet pathos of the story by appropriate musical colouring, and in every respect this design has been most successfully carried out. Amongst the many beautiful points in the song we may mention the eloquent phrase, "And I've been blind these fifty years," the passage into the minor key seeming like a sudden cloud over the sunny recollections of the speaker; and the immediate alteration into the major (in the third bar of which, by the way, a sharp is omitted before the G in the voice part), with the arpeggio accompaniment, carries to a most effective termination one of the best songs we have yet seen by this composer.

Trois Morceaux de Salon, pour Piano. No. 1, Gavotte; No. 2, Berceuse; No. 3, L'Espiègle. Par Joachim Raff. [Ashdown and Parry.]

THESE three pieces, by a composer who has already fairly earned a welcome in this country, will, we are certain, meet with warm approval by those drawing-room performers for whom they are especially written, although it cannot be said that they are equal in merit. The Gavotte, commencing in A minor, has a remarkably original subject, which gains much in effect by an obstinate syncopation in the bass. The Trio, in the tonic major, is also good at first; but the brilliant scale passages are scarcely in character with the nature of the piece. The figure in the accompaniment of No. 2 is thoroughly sympathetic with the theme; but the "Berceuse" is so completely overdone in the present day that it requires more original thought than Herr Raff has here given us to make his piece stand forth prominently from the multitude. No. 3, a rapid Valse, has a flowing and melodious subject, which will demand elastic fingers to do it justice. The frequent changes of key give a somewhat restless character to the composition; but modern Germany so pertinaciously insists upon considering the key of a piece as merely the point of departure and return that we may now accept this restlessness as a characteristic of the school.

Troubadour's Song. Words by Rev. T. E. Brown. Music by Sir Herbert Oakeley. [J. B. Cramer and Co.]

PROFESSOR OAKELEY always writes like an accomplished artist, and certainly his "Troubadour's Song"—which was sung with much success by Mr. Maas at the recent Reid Festival in Edinburgh—will most thoroughly sustain his reputation. The words are set to a spirited and attractive theme, which is accompanied with a masterly hand; and any tenor who can fully command the high B natural will be certain to make the song effective before a mixed audience, especially if he can be aided by orchestral accompaniments. The composition was, we believe, originally written as a chorus for mixed voices, and is now to be had as a choral piece for male voices, and also in a lower key for a solo voice.

For You and Me. Song. Words by F. E. Weatherly. Music by Ciro Pinsuti. [Ricordi.]

CERTAINLY of all the song-writers of the day no one can be more simple, refined, and thoroughly artistic than Signor Pinsuti, and vocalists, therefore, when they see his name upon the title-page, may confidently rely upon the composition being not only effective, but good. "For You and Me" has a fresh and melodious subject, to which the placid and appropriate accompaniment adds an additional charm. The song is quite within the compass of ordinary voices; and the modulations move so naturally into the attendant keys as to delight all amateurs who are frightened at "accidentals."

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE first performance at Berlin of Wagner's tetralogy, "Der Ring des Nibelungen," took place on the 5th, 6th, 8th, and 9th ult. at the Victoria Theater, where the "cyclus" is to be produced four consecutive times. We render a detailed account of this interesting event in another part of our present issue.

A correspondent writes to us from Freiburg-im-Breisgau: "A great and successful Liszt Festival took place here on May 1 and 2, the composer himself being present. On the first day the oratorio "Christus" was performed; the programme of the second day included the symphonic poem "Tasso," the pianoforte Concerto in A (executed by Herr Bertrand Roth), a baritone solo with male chorus and orchestra, entitled "Cantico di San Francesco" (MS.), and other compositions by Liszt. The solo vocalists were Fräulein Keller (Düsseldorf), Fräulein Breidenstein (Erfurt), Herren Thieme (Weimar), and Hauser (Carlsruhe); the vocal and orchestral body being composed of the combined choirs and orchestras of Baden, Basel, Freiburg, and Lahr, under the excellent direction of Herr Hermann Dimmler. To the latter, a musician of the first order and a most gifted pianist, a brilliant career may confidently be predicted. Liszt showed himself extremely pleased with the performances, and the fact of such a festival being at all possible in this small German town certainly proves how numerous are the admirers of the pianist-composer throughout the Fatherland."

We extract the following from a letter received from Leipzig, dated the 10th ult.: "The chief public examinations of the Conservatorium, which always take place in the spring of the year, have just commenced here. On the first day the large hall of the Gewandhaus was filled to overflowing with an audience prepared, and for the greater part fully qualified, to pass a critical opinion upon the performances of the aspiring débütants. As usual, the pianoforte was the chief instrument chosen for displaying the capabilities of the performers, and five young ladies and three gentlemen were the pupils selected to take part in the execution of the by no means easy pieces. The first two performers were ladies belonging to the town of Leipzig, Fräulein Gutwein and Blauhuth, who gave Mozart's Concerto in A major, the next was Frl. Oppenheim, of Rudolstadt, who played a Serenade and Allegro Gioioso by Mendelssohn. Mr. Metcalfe, of Chicago, followed with Weber's Concerto in F minor, and was succeeded by Mr. H. Carter, of Oberlin, Ohio, who played the first movement of Schumann's Concerto in A minor from memory, the remaining portions of the same Concerto being given by Frl. Albrecht, of Leipzig. Vocal music found only one exponent in Frl. Elsasser, of Hanover, who sang Mendelssohn's Concert Aria and two Lieder; and the first day's examination was closed by Herr Otto Beck's performance of the Andante and Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. The executants acquitted themselves, on the whole, extremely well, specially deserving of praise being the performances of Fräulein Oppenheim and Albrecht and Mr. Metcalfe. Herr Beck also displayed, on his part, rare talent and executive skill."

Herr Nessler, the composer of the opera "Der Rattenfänger von Hameln," has completed a new operatic work, "Der wilde Jäger," the subject of which is akin to that of "Der Freischütz." The new work is to be brought out at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater during next winter. Herr Nessler is an Alsatian by birth.

An interesting and important invention for the manufacture of pianofortes has just been patented by Herr C. René, of Stettin. The interest of the invention consists in the fact that by his process Herr René is enabled to reduce wood intended for the construction of instruments from a comparative green to a perfectly mature state, equal to the old and well-seasoned material. The importance of the invention need hardly be pointed out, since it has long been a problem for the trade how to obtain by artificial means the material required, more especially, for instruments intended for the varying temperature of tropical climates. This problem Herr René appears at last to have solved. While dispensing entirely with the preparations of vitriol, sulphuric ether, &c., hitherto in vogue, and which have proved in many respects unsatisfactory, Herr René's process imitates as nearly as possible the action of nature herself in the seasoning of wood by the application of oxygen, heated by means of electric currents. Under this treatment the new wood becomes thoroughly hardened, able to withstand permanently the influence of any climate, and, of course, gains considerably in its resonant qualities. Thus the utility of the invention speaks for itself, and is already attracting the attention of German manufacturers.

The corresponding membership of the Académie des Beaux Arts of Paris, vacated by the death of Signor Gaspari, of Bologna, has been conferred upon Franz Liszt, there being only one dissentient voice amongst the electing body. The other candidates proposed were Johannes Brahms and Arrigo Boito.

M. Gounod's new opera, "Le Tribut de Zamora," continues to be the principal attraction at the Grand-Opéra, the first ten performances of the work having produced the round sum of 194,000 francs.

A Congress of Italian musicians will be held on the 16th instant at Milan, for the purpose of discussing practical questions connected with the art, the principal of which will be the reorganisation of orchestras in Italy as regards complement and quality of instruments, and their proportionate distribution. The meetings of the Congress will take place at the hall of the Conservatorio.

Signor Baldassare Gamucci, the well-known musical savant, has just published an interesting essay, based upon the theories of Helmholtz, and the recently published work on the music of the ancients by M. Gevaert, and examining the question why the ancient Greeks have made so little progress in harmony. The pamphlet, which is entitled

"Perchè i Greci antichi non progredirono nell' armonia," is issued by Guidi in Florence.

The seven hundredth performance of Meyerbeer's opera "Les Huguenots" was recently recorded at the Paris National Opéra.

The first of M. Alexandre Guilman's Organ Recitals, to which reference was made in our last issue, took place on the 12th ult. at the Trocadéro Palace of Paris, with the co-operation of eminent artists. We give the programmes of these excellent Concerts at the foot of these columns.

The Oporto Choral Society gave a successful Concert (the first since its foundation) at the Crystal Palace Theatre of that town, in connection with a theatrical entertainment, and in aid of the Society of Friends of Foreigners in Distress in London. The Choral Society in question is composed of the resident English and German colony, and is conducted by Mr. G. H. Mason. The Concert, of which we append the programme, was highly successful, and afforded great promise for the future progress of the young Society.

Herr Georg Henschel, the eminent baritone, will take up his residence permanently at Boston, Mass., and is about to form an orchestra of sixty performers, with whom he proposes to give weekly symphonic concerts in that town.

Count Geza Zichy, the one-armed pianoforte virtuoso, of whom mention was made in our last number, has a colleague in the Hungarian Baroness Alphonsine Weiss, who with her (only) right hand performs equal feats of dexterity as the Count does with his left. During a concert recently given at Paris the lady created a sensation by her playing with much ability Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, Chopin's Etude in C minor, an Adagio by Beethoven, and other pieces.

The Paris Grand-Opéra has acquired twelve autographs by Meyerbeer from the collection of Herr Lindner, late editor of the Berlin Vossische Zeitung, including the complete score of the first act of an opera entitled "Cinq Mars," composed in the year 1876.

At the Munich Hof-Theater a "cyclus" of Wagner's music-dramas, from "Rienzi" to "Tristan und Isolde," will be performed twice between September 1 and 26 next.

We hear from Boston, U.S.: "On Good Friday last the Handel and Haydn Society, under the direction of Carl Zerrahn, gave a part of Bach's "Passion" Music, and on the Sunday following, Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," at the Boston Music Hall. The Cecilia Society has also produced, for the first time in America, Schumann's "Faust" Music, besides giving several performances of Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust," and "Roméo et Juliette."

A grand "Beethoven Hall" has been inaugurated at Barcelona with a festive performance directed by M. Massenet, who composed a march expressly for the occasion. At the Liceo Theatre of the same town Rubinstein's opera, "Die Maccabäer," will be performed in October next.

Among the posthumous works of Félicien David has been found a comic opera in one act, completely scored, written for two female voices and a tenor. The operetta, which is said to be very melodious, will probably soon be brought out by the Paris Opéra-Comique, the directors of which are in treaty with the heirs of the deceased composer, in order to obtain the right of performance.

M. Colonne, the famous leader of the Châtelet Concerts in Paris, has, in company with the members of his orchestra, proceeded to Lisbon, where he has been invited to give a series of symphonic concerts.

Maestro Luigi Mancinelli has been nominated Director of the Liceo Musicale at Bologna.

A series of operatic performances, to be carried on during the summer months, was inaugurated on the 14th ult. at the Kroll'sche Theater, at Berlin, with Gounod's "Faust."

An opera, entitled "König Otto's Brautfahrt," by A. Ueberlee, was performed for the first time on the 8th ult. at the Berlin Royal Opera House, and was well received. The Royal establishment will close its doors for the annual vacation from the 16th inst. to August 14.

The operatic season of the Théâtre de la Monnaie of Bruxelles has just closed with the thirty-eighth performance of M. Gevaert's "Quentin Durward."

In Max Maria von Weber, whose death we briefly announced in our last number, a man of great scientific attainments and of exceptional general culture has passed away. Max Maria, as every reader of the biography of his great father knows, was born on April 25, 1822, at Dresden, and had thus just completed his fifty-ninth year. He was the eldest of the composer's two sons (the second, Alexander Victor Maria, died before he had attained his twentieth year), and although not without musical talent himself, he wisely abstained from following his father's career, but chose a technical one, in which he made a decided mark. For a number of years he was engaged in the service, first of the government of Saxony, and later of Austria, as scientific telegraphist and railway expert, and in 1878 accepted a high post in the Prussian Ministry of Commerce at Berlin, where he was acknowledged to be one of the first railway authorities of Germany. In his leisure hours Weber also contributed to the light literature of the day, wherein he exhibited a pleasing and attractive style. His literary name, however, will be most surely preserved in the picturesque and exhaustive biography of his father, published in 1864, which yet awaits a worthy English translation. Max Maria von Weber was buried at Dresden, by the side of the composer of "Freischütz," a few days before the four hundredth performance of that opera was celebrated at the Dresden Hof-Theater.

At Leipzig died, on the 13th ult., at the age of seventy-three, Conrad Schleinitz, director of the Conservatorium, and an intimate friend of Mendelssohn.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

ENGLISH COMPOSERS AND THEIR CLAIMS, PAST AND PRESENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—How comes it that the English, patriotic enough in their love of British painters—Reynolds, Gainsborough, Hogarth, Wilkie, Turner, Landseer, Millais, Holman Hunt, and a thousand more—are so seemingly cold to the claims of their native composers? Sterndale Bennett is doubtless admired, but not half enough. The exquisite elegiac beauty of his strains, their singular elegance, their silvery sweetness and crystalline clearness are not spoken of with a tenth part of the enthusiasm they ought to command, and some of his loveliest MSS. still remain all but unknown to the general public. It is foolish to say, as some have done, that he is a mere follower of Mendelssohn. There is an affinity in the genius of these two great composers, but the relationship is that of the loveliest starlight to clear sunshine, or that of the tenderness of lakes to the dashing river. There is less impulse, perhaps, in Sterndale Bennett, but a tender purity marks his strains which, in its way, is absolutely unsurpassable.

Then we have a great man living amongst us, the author of "St. John the Baptist" and so many classical works, ever ready to praise other masters with that generous fervour which a noble nature and strong sense of beauty prompt, and content to receive only the homage of respect where hearty admiration is due. Perfect mastery of all the resources of art pairs in this master with genuine creative power. I believe that if Macfarren were a German, his fame would have been European long before this.

Other living composers might be named, but I will only speak now of three or four who have passed away, but whose musical creations ought to live for generations to come. One was a man of undisputed genius. When one of his lovely anthems was performed on a week-day afternoon in York Minster, a year or two ago, I found the choir absolutely thronged with worshippers, who had come from far and near for miles around to enjoy the beauty of the well-nigh celestial strains. All his melodies have what the French call an unmistakable cachet of their own, full of soul, and fraught with sweetness. I allude to Dr. Dykes. Is his name known in the great art-world? Has he ever met with that artistic recognition which is his right? I pass now to a more celebrated name, that of Field, sometimes called the Russian Field, because he lived long years in St. Petersburg. Does it not seem strange that the comparatively vulgar and noisy music of so many pianists should be so frequently performed, while we scarcely ever hear those lovely starlight poems, the Notturmos of Field?

There is a greater name yet practically unknown amongst us. I write now of an English composer, thoroughly and altogether English, who made his reputation in Paris, and whom the Parisians adopted, as they did Meyerbeer and Cherubini. You cannot go to a classical concert in Paris, where Beethoven and Mozart's masterpieces are performed, without also hearing Onslow. On two or three occasions I have been lucky enough to listen to absolutely lovely trios by this great master, sustaining, as it seemed to me, a perennial spring of charming melody. Englishmen scarcely know that such a composer has existed. Why is this? Why does not Mr. Arthur Chappell take a delight in making known these masterpieces of English musical genius?

I will name one more name. It is that of my dear friend Hugh or Hugo Pierson, a composer of subtle and peculiar power, a tone-poet, if there ever was one. True, Pierson might be called deficient in popular melody, and is open to the charge at times of breaking off too suddenly in his strains, of being abrupt, if not inconsequent, as in parts of his noble "Jerusalem"; but genius takes many forms, and creates its own laws. We must not impose the exactness and continuity of a Pope on a Victor Hugo. Pierson's strains have a genuine magic, which may be compared to the rich sweetness of the pomegranate, with a hard rind indeed, but how luscious is the fruit! His setting of Medora's Song in the "Corsair," "Deep in this heart the tender secret dwells," is alone enough to immortalise the singer, such a pathetic sweetness, such a genuine passion breathes from this most lovely strain. Many of his songs are equally beautiful. His "Faust" music is singularly noble. Especially to be recommended to all chorus-singers is the splendid "Heilige Poesie." His orchestral compositions have not seemed to me so satisfactory, such as the Overture to "Macbeth," &c.; but that may be from lack of sufficient hearing. Of one thing I am sure—he was an inspired singer; and yet England knows him not, or scarcely knows him.

It should seem as if it was the fate of musical genius of a high order to pass without due recognition through this earthly sphere. At least, it has been so too often. Even the emperor of music, Beethoven, to the disgrace of his fatherland be it said, received little temporal reward for his immortal works. Schubert's lovely Symphonies have only been recognised since the departure of the master. This is partly to be accounted for by the fact that works which live for ever rarely command a large immediate sale. There are exceptions to the contrary—witness Mendelssohn. Still the rule is comparative neglect for genius in its earthly day. Let us do our best to prevent this as far as living genius is concerned, and not let fear of ridicule or unconscious envy make us slow to acknowledge any form of merit. And, as far as the great departed are concerned, especially those of our own race and country, let us not be niggard of our praises, or cold in the offering of our homage. "A thing of beauty is a joy for ever"; it is a heritage for all humanity, not for one race alone. But other countries are ready enough to do justice to their great masters in the world of music. Other nations yield national encouragement to this branch of art. We, under the influence of a kind of material Philistinism or hard Puritanism, arising partly from a reaction against the Frenchified art of Charles II., have gone on wondering, with Pope and Swift—and, till lately, have thought it almost unmanly to cultivate the art which breathes most on earth of heaven. We may thank heaven that this childish prejudice is passing fast away; but still there is a seeming reluctance in our art-world to acknowledge the just claims of English composers.

How great the difference can be
'Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee—

We are proud, and well may we be, of Purcell—the great Purcell—and of Bishop, and of Arne; but, in spite of the vast popularity of the "Bohemian Girl," we scarcely know Balfe's best music—that of the "Castle of Aymon," or "Les Quatre Fils d'Aymon"; and we have even forgotten Loder's charming "Night-Dancers," and Barnett's "Mountain Sylph." I do not rate these with the greater names of which I spoke before, but they too are not to be despised; nor is Wallace, whose "Amber Witch" has surely never had its full meed.

But I refrain. We have genuine power in our midst at this time. Need I name Arthur Sullivan, and many another—Garrett, Barnby, &c.? If I am not greatly mistaken, Sullivan's essential bent is dramatic, and he could give us chef-d'œuvres worthy of being classed with the best creations of Mozart, Rossini, and Auber. But, for some unexplained reason, there is no patriotism, as to musical art, in the leaders of the world of rank and fashion, and so true power is wasted, comparatively, on farces. A National Opera-house worthy of the name is a great desideratum.

Pardon the length of this expostulation. I am not a one-sided patriot in music. I love the tender melancholy and holy fervour and genuine power of Germany's minstrels; the lively grace, the often exquisite charm and high dramatic fervour of those of France; and the passionate nightingale strains of Italy. But genius has no single fatherland. The country which has produced the greatest of word-poets, from Shakespeare to Tennyson, can surely bring forth minstrels of genius also, nay, has brought them forth, and the word of sympathy alone is needed to bid the living waters flow.—Your obedient servant,

Rhayader.

ORGAN CONSTRUCTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Speaking as a mechanic and not as a performer, it is impossible for me not to sympathise with Mr. Cooper's advocacy of the radiating and concave pedal-board. Nothing is gained by unnecessary mechanical difficulties, and the human mechanism should be provided with such appliances as facilitate the work it is called upon to do. The extended feet radiate naturally, whether crossed or not.

It is not to the point that experts can and do perform well on straight pedals. Herr Joachim could, no doubt, play very well standing on a slack wire, if he practised enough; but his time might be more usefully employed.

It is not to the point that the radiation and concavity are sometimes excessive, bringing the heels on to wrong pedals owing to the keys being too close. Abuse is no argument against use.

It is not to the point that the pedals should be straight because the manual keys are so. The mobility of the elbows enables the hands to be kept square to the front.

What are the advantages of straight pedals as contrasted with radiating and concave?

Mr. Cooper's wish to have the centre of the pedal-board under the centre of the manuals would with a manual to G and pedals to F bring the pedal centre D under the manual centre E. This is very nearly the "D under C" advocated by Mr. Best. It would hardly do to change the relative positions of the manuals and pedals with every upward variation of the manuals, and Mr. Best's suggestion seems therefore to be the most perfect.

Mr. Seaton's arrangement of drawstops is hardly practicable. If but one kind of crescendo and diminuendo were invariably required it would do well enough; but one sometimes requires the double in a soft combination, or four- and two-feet stops with only light eight-feet, &c.; so that the best grouping is that in which the positions of the knobs are most easily remembered, and that not only by the regular organist, but also by any casual performer. The difficulties of the casual are great enough in any case, and there is the less reason for change because the stereotyped crescendo and diminuendo of the composition pedals are arranged without regard to the position of the knobs.

There is no great mechanical difficulty in arranging an organ to transpose. Töpfer shows such an instrument: the keys are fixed, but the backfalls are movable. The expense of the mechanism would not be great; but in a large organ an extra third of pipes downwards would absorb an amount of money and room quite out of proportion to the value of the result.

Has any one of the F.C.O. yet hit upon a method of bringing a large pedal organ under complete control, so as to provide an appropriate "Pedale" instantaneously for any combination on any manual, with, or without its coupler? I have, I think, succeeded in doing this without involving the constant worry of moving ventils or composition pedals, drawstops or couplers, with every change of manual. If nothing of the sort has yet been done, I will explain the contrivance with pleasure.

Yours faithfully,

THOMAS CASSON.

Denbigh.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you allow an amateur to say a few words on three questions of organ building? First, radiating versus straight pedals. Those who advocate the use of the latter only assume that their opponents declare it to be impossible to play certain passages of legitimate organ music on straight pedals. This is simply begging the real question at issue, which is: On which set can organ music as a whole be more conveniently and better played? The answer to this question must decide the strife for all unbiased people. Naturally, those used to one sort only will always find the other sort, whatever its advantages, awkward to use. In my humble opinion a beginner would learn to play on concave radiating pedals more readily than on straight flat ones. I maintain that thirds and greater intervals can be played more smoothly with one foot (this is in double-pedal passages particularly necessary) on radiating than straight pedals. Organ pedals must, I take it, always be a compromise, for were they very far apart there would be danger of putting down two at once, but it would be well-nigh impossible to stretch from one end of them to the other; whereas were they very close, while it would be easy to take intervals yet it would be extremely difficult to always play only one at a time. Secondly, the position of the drawstops. I would suggest that the most prominent and powerful stops should have their handles placed next the manual, so that the hand may most readily be able to get at them, while the softer ones that do not need so often to be pulled in or out suddenly in the middle of a piece might be placed behind them, but the whole at an oblique angle to the jamb. Thirdly, there should be due proportion between the parts of an organ. An organ I know has six stops on the great (including stopped bass), while the swell has twelve, including three reeds (one to C only), fifteenth and mixture; the pedal organ, however, consists only of an open diapason, sixteen feet. How much better to have put a little more of this power into the great, in order to enable it to take its proper place, instead of being drowned by the swell. It seems to me that very moderate-sized organs ought to have at least one eight-foot stop on the pedals to prevent the necessity of almost always coupling to one of the manuals, and thus destroying the independence of tone. Though it often is not possible to increase the number of stops, yet adding couplers would not much increase the expense and would greatly add to the expression to be derived from the instrument. For example, what beautiful effects can be produced by coupling two eight-foot stops of opposite character, the one loco to the other super-octave; thus combining the fulness of the eight-foot tone with the four-foot pitch.

Hoping that you will, while the question is in people's minds, allow it to be fully discussed in the columns of your valuable journal,—I am, Sir, yours, &c.,

CONCAVE-RADIATING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you allow me to ask some of your readers if the following facts are the exception or the rule in most National Schools?

I must explain that, thanks to the Dean (Dr. Vaughan) and the energetic Succentor of Llandaff Cathedral, we have here a very high class Cathedral School, where the choristers (who are all sons of gentlemen) are educated, the only unusual feature being that the boys are allowed the ordinary public school holidays, during which time we have to draw on the National School for boys for the "holiday choir." Now I find that, although these boys have just been "passed" by the Government Inspector in vocal music, not one of them can tell what interval it is from Do to Re, or have any notion of time or tune; and on inquiry, I find that all the vocal music is taught by ear—that is, the master having taught a large number of the boys to sing a few ditties in two parts, by constantly playing the parts over on the harmonium to them, the Inspector duly "passes" them, and goes on to judge the needlework of the girls in the next room!

Is it possible that Government grants are made amounting to over £100,000 per annum to schools in England and Wales where the vocal music is thus taught?

Surely no one can say it is unreasonable of me to expect that boys who have been "passed in vocal music" by a Government Inspector should, at any rate, know a little of the subject in which they have passed. In some cases that have lately come under my immediate notice I can testify that the boys' knowledge was actually nil: I only made this discovery by accident, and should be glad to know if this case is an exceptional one.—Yours, &c.,

C. L. WILLIAMS, Organist, Llandaff Cathedral.

P.S.—Since writing the above I have been told by the schoolmaster of our National Schools that he understands the Government grant is only given "to foster the love of music in the children, and not to teach them anything of practical musical value."

I cannot think that this is the best way to foster the love of music in children, who will and can learn to read from notes easily and quickly on almost any system.

CHURCH ORATORIO.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Kindly allow me small space for a short answer to Mr. Bengough's letter in your last issue. Little streams make big rivers, and true growth has small beginning. The Church Oratorio movement in our district began with one efficient choir, under the management, however, of one of those quiet earnest laymen who form the backbone of our Church, and the mainspring of its working. I was honoured by being taken into counsel. We set our purpose before us, gathered into association the cream of a few neighbouring choirs, and a few musical ladies, and held services with a choir of but fifty or sixty voices. We repeated the process on other centres; and now look forward to join in a festival in York Minster in July, in a choir already reaching to nearly 800 singers: and we have the satisfaction of knowing that not only will the service be repeated at most of the centres whence the larger choirs came, but that it is proposed to give "St. John the Evangelist" at a Church Congress Service in Newcastle in the autumn. One "unknown country parson" as Mr. Bengough calls himself, may thus set a stream—small at beginning—a-flowing, which in time will surely meet other streams that among them will make up the big river. At any rate, let him try. Boldly take "St. John the Evangelist" in hand, gather round the nearest good choir that will help the work, beat up recruits, hold summer rehearsals of such parts of the contingent as can be got together, and at a harvest thanksgiving in the autumn give the work with "the shortened service."—Yours truly,

J. POWELL METCALFE.

ORGAN PEDALS ATTACHED TO PIANOFORTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will some of your readers vouchsafe me a little information on the subject of organ pedals attached to a cottage piano? I have a cottage piano, to which I should like to apply organ pedals; and whilst I am, on the one hand, deterred from going to an organ builder for a set of pedals with organ action, I am also deterred from buying the cheap pedals advertised on account of the instability of the attachment action, which I believe consists merely of twine, subject to the influence of the weather, breakage, &c.

I shall therefore feel exceedingly obliged if some gentleman having experience in this matter will give me information on the subject, through the medium of your paper.—Yours faithfully,

PARISH CHURCH ORGANIST.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

BAGSHOT.—Two Concerts were given by the members of the Choral Class on the 11th and 14th ult., under the direction of Mr. G. Paxton More, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church. The programme consisted of solos, madrigals, and part-songs. Two pianoforte duets were well performed by Miss Hare and Miss A. James. "In going to my lonely bed" (Edwards), "Sweet and low" (Barnby), "The Young Musicians" (Kücken), and "Old Daddy Longlegs" (Macrone) were especially well rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Sumpster, Miss J. Frimbley, Mr. Maskell, and Mr. Sumpster, all of whom gave much satisfaction to appreciative audiences.

BANFF.—The members of the Banff Musical Association gave their second and concluding Concert of the present session in the County Hall, on Friday evening, the 13th ult., to a large and fashionable audience. The principal work in the programme was Barnby's sacred Idyl, Rebekah, the libretto of which is written by Arthur Merthiton. The work is perhaps, taken as a whole, one of the most meritorious of modern productions of a similar character, and in some of the parts its melody is strikingly beautiful, breathing throughout a tone of earnestness and spiritual reverence. The dramatis personae are three in number—Rebekah, Isaac, and Eliezer—and the choruses are formed by maidens of the city, attendants, and others. Upon the rehearsal of the piece the members of the Association have spent a considerable time, and the result was a decisive success. The solo parts were taken as follows:—Rebekah, Miss Isa Dickson; Isaac, Mr. A. Simpson; Eliezer, Mr. W. Williamson; and perhaps the choice could not have been more fortunately made from amongst the members of the Association, for the whole of the solo music was excellently rendered. The piano and harmonium accompaniments were played by Mrs. Clement Gordon and Miss K. Martin respectively. The second part of the programme was devoted to miscellaneous pieces, and included a violin performance by Mr. G. A. Duncan, a piano duet (by X. Scharwenka), given by Misses H. Simpson and B. Ramsay; and an Andante and Allegro de Concert for violin with piano, performed by Herr J. Hoffman and Miss Dickson, the former playing the violin in his usual masterly way. The bâton was wielded throughout the whole of the evening by Herr Hoffman, the Association's Conductor, and it will be sufficient to say that he discharged the duties with his customary ability, and that his efforts were crowned with success.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Birmingham Scholarship at the National Training School for Music, Kensington, having lapsed at Easter, the local committee arranged for an invitation Concert by the pupils, which took place at the Masonic Hall on Wednesday, April 27. Miss Emily Walker, Miss Helen Synner, and Mr. H. Russell Crompton gave highly creditable performances on the pianoforte; Miss F. M. Donaldson showed extraordinary promise as a violinist; and Miss Ellen Atkins, Miss Blower, Miss Ada Porter, and Mr. F. King appeared with success as vocalists, the gentleman last named having already won a distinguished position in our concert rooms.

—The last of the series of Free Organ Recitals at the Town Hall, provided through the generosity of the Mayor (Alderman Chamberlain), took place on Saturday afternoon, April 30, and was attended by a large audience. The programme consisted of seven items of high-class music, all of which were performed by Mr. Stimpson with his customary care and taste. Towards the conclusion of the proceedings the Mayor, who was received with great cheering, made a speech, in which he spoke hopefully of the musical taste of the people of Birmingham, and said that Mr. Stimpson had asked him to announce that he was so well pleased with the result of the organ performances that, pending any arrangements between the Town Council and the Hospital, his Recitals would be in future free, and that there would be simply a collection at the doors to pay the expenses of the hall. Mr. Impey (Secretary of the Birmingham Musical Association) then came forward, and asked the audience to give three hearty upstanding cheers for the Mayor, an appeal which was responded to with great enthusiasm. The Mayor thanked those present, and said no one had derived so much enjoyment from the Organ Recitals as he had done, from the spectacle of such audiences as had gathered Saturday after Saturday to enjoy such music, on such an organ, and by such an Organist.

—On the 12th ult. a Réunion of the members and friends of Mr. Alfred J. Sutton's choir was held at Nock's Assembly Rooms, Temple Row. The first part of the evening was devoted to a Concert, in which the whole of the music was performed by members of the choir, assisted by Mrs. A. J. Sutton. The vocal solos were selected from the works of Handel, Weber, Cooke, Cowen, and others; and the programme also contained glees, part-songs, and other concerted pieces by Bishop, Nicolai, Pinsuti, Flotow, and L. T. Palmer. Mrs. Sutton was encored in "Ocean, thou mighty monster!" from Weber's Oberon. Several other solo pieces were capitally given, and the choral music was most efficiently sung. Besides the vocal pieces the programme included two pianoforte and two violin solos, all of which were well played, the rendering of the Andante and Finale of Mendelssohn's C minor Concerto by Miss Marian Edwards being worthy of special commendation. Mr. Rubinstein gave two Recitals in the Town Hall on the 6th and 25th ult. The most noticeable features were the magnificent rendering of Beethoven's Sonatas, Op. 53 and 111, Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, and Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses. Works by Bach, Handel, Chopin, Field, Liszt, Thalberg, and Rubinstein were also included. There was a very large audience at each Recital, and the utmost enthusiasm prevailed; the performer was honoured at the close with a triple recall, and heartily cheered, amid waving of hats and handkerchiefs; and escorted to his hotel on each occasion by large numbers of admirers.

BISHOP AUCKLAND.—The Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Kilburn, Mus. Bac., Cantab., gave its second Concert of the season on Monday evening, April 25, assisted by Miss Jessie Royd, Mr. Harper Kearton, Miss Bertha Brouill (solo violin) and Mr. J. A. Brouill (solo violoncello). The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's unfinished Oratorio, Christus, and the concert version of Weber's Opera Preciosa, supplemented by songs and solos by the artists above named. H. Gregory, Mus. Bac., Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and Mr. Frank Arnold (violin); all the artists, with the exception of Mr. Gregory, being students of the Royal Academy. An excellent miscellaneous programme was satisfactorily performed. —On Saturday, the 29th ult., the Boston Choral Society gave their final performance for the present season, the principal feature being Van Bree's St. Cecilia's Day, for soprano solo and chorus. Mrs. Daglish was the soloist, the accompaniments were rendered by a string band, pianoforte, and American organ, and Mr. G. H. Gregory (Organist of the Parish Church) conducted. The whole performance gave great satisfaction to a numerous audience.

BOURNEMOUTH.—The first Concert of the Bournemouth Musical Association took place at the Town Hall on April 27, and afforded great gratification to a fairly large audience. Lahee's Cantata The Building of the Ship formed the first part of the programme, the second part being miscellaneous. Miss Eliza Rogers' pure soprano voice was greatly admired, and Mr. B. Mansell Ramsey conducted with skill and precision. The reception of this first effort of the Association was most encouraging.

BRISTOL.—On Tuesday, April 26, a ballad Concert was given in the Colston Hall, which was largely attended. The vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Farley Sinkins, and Signor Foli; Miss Randegger, solo pianoforte; and M. Albert, solo violoncello and Conductor. —On Thursday, April 28, the members of Mr. John Barrett's Choir gave their first annual Concert in the Colston Hall. The Choir, which has recently been formed, consists of about seventy voices, the parts being very evenly balanced. The performance was a thoroughly efficient one. The works rendered were Schubert's Mass in E flat, which had never before been heard in Bristol, Schumann's New Year's Song, and a miscellaneous selection, including C. Bucknall's new Part-song, "The Linden Tree"; Pinsuti's Choruses, "Where wavelets rippled gaily," and "We'll gaily sing"; Dr. Hiles's prize Glee, "Hushed in death"; Métra's Waltz for ladies' voices, "Summer Fancies"; and Garrett's Waltz for men's voices, "Hope." —On Monday, the 9th ult., the twelfth and last of Mr. George Riseley's Monday Popular Concerts, for the present season, was given in the Colston Hall, which was completely crowded. On this occasion the programme consisted of works selected by the audience at the previous Concert: Schubert's Symphony in B minor (No. 8, unfinished), and the Overtures to Tannhäuser (Wagner), Midsummer Night's Dream (Mendelssohn), and William Tell (Rossini), were finely rendered. The other works performed were Boccherini's Minuet for muted string orchestra, Beethoven's Concerto in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra (the solo instrument being taken by Mrs. J. L. Jackson Roeckel), and Handel's Largo in G major, given by the band with pianoforte (Mrs. Roeckel), violin (Mr. A. W. Waite), and organ (Mr. George Riseley). The vocalists were Miss Rosa Bailey and Mr. Theo. Marzials, who sung two of his own songs ("A summer shower" and "The three sailor boys"). —On Thursday, the 12th ult., the second annual Festival of the United Choirs of the city took place in the Cathedral. Since last year several other choirs have joined the Bristol Church Choral Union, under whose management the Festival was given, and at the present Festival seventeen choirs took part, representing in all about 500 voices. The whole of the choirs were surplused, and walked in procession from the cloisters into the cathedral, preceded by their organists and followed by their clergy. Gadsby's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C was selected as the Service, and the Anthems were Sir John Goss's, "Lift up thine eyes," and Bach's "Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks," all of which were rendered with great precision, the effect of the large number of voices in the anthems being very grand. The proper Psalms were chanted to three old single chants, and the hymn, "Light's abode, celestial Salem," was sung before the sermon to the tune in the new edition of "Hymns Ancient and Modern." The sermon was preached by the Rev. Prebendary Ainslie. The rehearsals of the choirs were conducted by Messrs. Frank Smith, John Barrett, J. W. Lawson, C. Bucknall, and E. Cook, and the post of Conductor at the Festival was taken by Mr. Frank Smith. Mr. George Riseley presided at the organ. —Mr. Brooke's Private Choir gave their second Concert this season in the Colston Hall on Tuesday evening, the 24th ult. Niels Gade's Cantata, The Erl King's Daughter, a selection from Sonnambula, and Sullivan's Trial by Jury were the works performed.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—A Concert was given by the Choir of St. Mary's Church on the 11th ult., in the St. Botolph's Hall, under the conductorship of the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. T. B. Richardson. The part-songs and glees gave evidence of careful training, especially "The Miller" (G. A. Macfarren). Mrs. Benson Walsh, Misses F. Pattie, A. E. Snape and K. Richardson were very successful in their songs, and the pianoforte playing of the Misses Ida and Richardson was specially noteworthy. The other soloists were Messrs. F. Pattie, Carliell, Whitehead, and W. S. Finch; the former receiving a rapturous encore for his rendering of "Non più andrai" (Mozart).

CHELTONHAM.—The Musical Society gave its last subscription Concert of the season on the 10th ult., J. F. Barnett's The Building of the Ship and Hummel's Grand Septet in C major (Op. 114) being the chief items. The Concert was well attended and most successful, Mr. Von Holst's pianoforte-playing in the excellent rendering of the Septet being entitled to the very highest praise. Dr. Arthur E. Dyer conducted.

CLEVEDON.—The members of the Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. H. E. Marchant, Organist of the Parish Church, marked the termination of their first session by rendering J. Farmer's popular Oratorio, Christ and His Soldiers, at the Public Hall on Wednesday, the 11th ult. There was a chorus of fifty voices, and, aided by a grand harmonium and a most efficient string band, the oratorio was performed in a manner which reflected the greatest credit both upon the members of the class and their Conductor. Of the choruses it is difficult to speak too highly, and the solo singing of Miss Visger, Miss F. Button, and Mr. Visger was highly satisfactory. An agreeable variety in the programme was afforded by the performance of the Andante and Finale from Mozart's Quartet in C, played by Messrs. W. Norgrove, W. Woodhill, C. Momber, and J. E. Pavey, members of the string band. Mr. A. Price ably presided at the harmonium. Mr. Marchant may be cordially congratulated on so successful a result of his labours.

COVENTRY.—A performance of Judas Maccabæus was given by the members of the Musical Society on the 5th ult. Mr. Edward Lloyd was engaged, and sang the tenor solos finely, the other parts being taken by Mrs. Mason, Mrs. Sharpe, and Mr. Ward (members of the Society), all of whom acquitted themselves in a highly creditable manner. Mrs. Mason particularly displayed, in her rendering of the soprano airs, a power and flexibility of voice and a finished style which delighted the audience. The band and chorus numbered about 130. Mr. Arthur Trickett conducted.

DARLINGTON.—The Darlington Orchestral Society gave its first Concert on Thursday, the 12th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Fred Tovey. The Concert was a great success.

The warmest applause greeted every performer throughout the evening.

DUNDEE.—The members of the Dundee Orchestral Union (Conductor, Mr. S. C. Hirst) gave their first public Concert in the Kinraid Hall on Thursday, the 19th ult. The orchestra was under the able leadership of Mr. A. C. Haden, and Mr. R. Stiles supplied some of the wind parts on the harmonium in a manner at once unobtrusive, accurate, and effective. Among the pieces performed were the Symphony in E flat by Pleyel, in which the slow movement was beautifully rendered. The most effective item in the programme was the orchestral rendering of one of Schubert's compositions, a composer greatly appreciated in Dundee. Mrs. Haden sang "With verdure clad" and Mr. Watson's "Dream Song" with exquisite purity of tone and taste, both songs being redemanded by the audience.

DUNSTER.—On Thursday, the 19th ult., the Dunster Philharmonic Association gave the last Concert of the season at the Assembly Rooms. The programme was exclusively sacred. The first part consisted of Dr. Stainer's Cantata, The Daughter of Jairus; the principal vocalists being Mrs. Anderson, Mr. F. B. Erridge, and the Rev. J. Utten Todd. The solos and choruses (especially the final trio and chorus, "To Him who left His throne on high") were alike admirably rendered, and the introduction and accompaniments were effectively given by the orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Windeatt. The second part opened with a new "Introduction et Grande Marche Triomphale," composed expressly for the Dunster Amateur Orchestral Society, by the Conductor, which was exceedingly well received. The rest of the programme consisted chiefly of Mendelssohn's compositions, which were all well given; the Rev. J. Utten Todd, Rector of Dunster, being particularly successful in "If with all your hearts." The "War March of the Priests," from Athalie, by the orchestra, brought to a conclusion one of the most successful Concerts ever given by this society. Mrs. West presided at the piano with her usual ability, and Mr. J. Warriner, A. Mus. T.C.L., Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

EDINBURGH.—The fifth annual Recital of the Canongate Church Musical Association was given in the church on the 4th ult., assisted for the occasion by Miss Moir and Mr. J. L. Gardner. The solo vocalists were Miss Mary Davies, who has made rapid progress since her last appearance in Exeter, her singing being admirably displayed both in the oratorio and the Stabat Mater; Miss Marian McKenzie, who possesses a rich and powerful voice, and gave evidence of a true style, which will assuredly advance her to the front rank of vocalists; Mr. Edward Lloyd who created the greatest enthusiasm by his rendering of "Cujus animam" and Mr. Farley Sinkins, of the Cathedral choir, who was highly efficient in "Thus saith the Lord," from Spohr's work, and "Pro peccatis," from the Stabat Mater. The rendering of all the choruses gave evidence of careful study and practice; amongst the most successful may be named "Praise His awful Name," "Holy, holy," and "Blest are the departed"—both of which were sung unaccompanied—"All glory to the Lamb," "Destroyed is Babylon," and the concluding "Great and wonderful are Thy works." The choir, the largest the Association has yet mustered, numbered 334 voices; the strength of the band was fifty-eight, and consisted of first-class professionals (engaged by Mr. Rice the leader), local professionals, and amateurs from the various centres. Mr. Wood, the Conductor, Mr. Moore, the Chorus-master, and all who undertook the charge of the practices in the various parts from which the contingents came, are deserving of especial praise on the result of their painstaking work.

GALASHIELS, N.B.—On Thursday evening, the 5th ult., a miscellaneous Concert was given in the Volunteer Hall by a band and chorus consisting of over seventy performers, conducted by Mr. W. R. Morris, Organist of St. Peter's Church. The most important item in the programme was Macfarren's May Day. Miss Turner sustained the part of the Queen of the May in admirable style, and the choruses were well sung. In the second part of the programme several popular part-songs were given by the choir, and Mr. Morris contributed two pianoforte solos in a musician-like manner.

The whole of the solos and accompaniments were performed by members of the choir. Mr. J. Westwood Tosh ably conducted.

HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA.—The Halifax Choir, devoted to the study and performance chiefly of the choral classics, conducted by Mr. Arnold Doane, has recently completed its sixth season. Last year was inaugurated a series of subscription performances, which were sufficiently successful in all respects to warrant a like series for the present year, and the result is highly encouraging to those who desire an improved taste for good music and good performance. Last season the principal works were Elijah, Beethoven's Mass in C, Van Bree's St. Cecilia's Day, and Bennett's May Queen; this season, The Creation, Acis and Galatea, Mozart's Requiem, and Macfarren's May Day, each of which was studied with interest by the members of the Choir, and performed to the satisfaction of their small but select audience. A variety of other music, vocal and instrumental, was also included in the programmes.

HIGH WYCOMBE.—On Monday, April 25, the Choral Association gave its last Concert of the season in the Board School. The principal feature in the programme was a selection from Haydn's Creation. The solo vocalists were Miss Bessie Holt, R.A.M., Mr. R. H. Hodgson, and Mr. D. Sutton Shepley, who acquitted themselves admirably. The choruses were sung in an excellent manner, reflecting the utmost credit on their indefatigable Conductor, Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac. Oxon. The second part comprised a miscellaneous selection of vocal and instrumental music, the chief item being Auber's Overture to Masaniello; Brahms's Hungarian Dance in D, well played by the orchestra; Handel's "O ruddier than the cherry," exceedingly well sung by Mr. Shepley; Bishop's "Bid me discourse" by Miss Holt (encored), and Mozart's Concerto in D for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo part admirably played by Mr. J. G. Wrigley. The band was ably led by Mr. J. S. Liddle, and Mr. J. G. Wrigley conducted.

HULL.—The members of the Harmonic Society gave their last Concert for the season on the 13th ult., when Beethoven's Engedi and Bennett's May Queen were performed before a large and appreciative audience. The principal vocalists were Miss C. Clelland, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. A. McCall. Mr. G. H. Smith (Mus. Bac. Oxon.) presided at the organ; Mr. E. Winter led the band, and Mr. J. W. Stephenson conducted.

ILFRACOMBE.—The Choral Society's Concert at the Oxford Hall on April 26 was one of the most ambitious yet attempted by this Association, the programme comprising Spohr's Oratorio, The Last Judgment, and Cowen's Cantata The Rose Maiden. Both, however, were excellently rendered, the solos, all taken by members of the Society, being without exception sung with much care and judgment, and the choruses showing the result of good training. Mrs. Brand and Miss Francis presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. T. Backhouse at the harmonium.

Morton and Mr. Vyvyan Williams, violinists; Miss Bertha Flint accompanying on the harmonium, and Mr. Crosby Smith on the piano. The Rev. R. S. Flint was Conductor. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous. In the second part, the Oratorio Christ and His Soldiers, by J. Farmer, was effectively rendered by the church choir, and too much credit cannot be given to Mr. Smith, the efficient Organist and Choirmaster of Ladock. The room was crowded to excess on both occasions. The proceeds amounted to £11 8s. 4d.

LANCASTER.—The members of the Choral Society gave a performance in the Music Hall of Gade's Cantata, The Erl-King's Daughter on the 12th ult.; the second part of the programme being miscellaneous. S. Birch. The Concert was for the benefit of the Midland Counties and Leamington Home for Incurables.

LEATHERHEAD.—A most successful Amateur Concert was given on Wednesday evening, April 27, in the Swan Hotel Assembly Room, by a few members of the Church choir, assisted by friends. The programme was miscellaneous, and commenced with the pianoforte duet, Hymn of Praise, arranged by Sidney Smith, brilliantly executed by the Misses Crispe, who afterwards played "Spanish Dances" (Moskowsky). Miss Crispe also rendered "Phantasistücke" (Xaver Schwarwenka) with equally good effect. The singing of Miss Louisa Sumner in the solo parts of Hear my Prayer (Mendelssohn) and in some ballads called forth the warmest marks of approbation. The choir sang several choruses very creditably. Mr. G. Alcock ably conducted, and Mr. A. Alcock rendered valuable service in the accompaniments.

LEICESTER.—The annual Visitors' Evening of the Amateur Vocal Society took place on Wednesday, the 4th ult., at the Temperance Hall. The two works selected for performance were Mendelssohn's First Walpurgis Night and Barnett's new Cantata, composed for the Leeds Festival, The Building of the Ship. The accompaniments were played by a band composed chiefly of members of the Orchestral Union. Miss Deacon rendered valuable assistance at the pianoforte, and Miss Clowes at the harp. Mr. C. Hancock presided at the organ, and Mr. H. B. Ellis conducted with his customary judgment. The performance was one worthy of the trouble which had been bestowed upon it.

LUDLOW.—On Thursday, April 28, Edwin Aspa's Cantata, Endymion, was performed by the Choral Society before a large audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Madren, Mr. Odoardo Barri, and Mr. F. Bevan, all of whom were highly efficient, Miss Royd being especially effective in the trying scena allotted to Séle. The choir readily responded to the conductor's baton, thus showing the careful training they had received. Mr. R. Bartholomew conducted with his usual ability. The second part of the Concert was miscellaneous.

MAIDENHEAD.—On Wednesday, April 27, the Philharmonic Society gave its last Concert in the Town Hall. The programme was miscellaneous, and commenced with Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, followed by Mendelssohn's Lorelei, the solo part being admirably sung by Miss Holt, R.A.M., who made a most excellent impression on her first appearance in Maidenhead. Mr. Whitehouse gave an admirable rendering of Dunkler's "Caprice Hongroise," for violoncello; and Mr. J. G. Wrigley played the Andante and Finale from Mozart's Piano-forte Concerto in D. Mr. J. S. Liddle led the orchestra, and Mr. J. G. Wrigley, Mus. Bac. Oxon, conducted.

MONMOUTH.—On Thursday, the 19th ult., the Monmouth Choral Society gave two very successful concerts at the Borough Court. The first part of each included Dr. Stainer's Cantata, The Daughter of Jairus, with pianoforte and organ accompaniments. The solos were most admirably rendered by Mrs. Charlesworth, Mr. Fredericks (Hereford Cathedral), and the Rev. G. D. Cartwright. The second part of each programme was miscellaneous, including excellent renderings of Haydn's Second Symphony (the Misses Skinner), Weber's "Moto Continuo" (Miss Manning), Pearson's "Anglers," and Macfarren's "Summer Song." Weber's pianoforte solo, by Miss Manning, Sullivan's "Chorister," by Mrs. Charlesworth, Tosti's "For ever and for ever," by Mr. Fredericks, and Parry's "Flow gently, Deva," by Mr. Fredericks and the Rev. G. D. Cartwright, were encored. Miss Williams and Mr. Reynold (Hereford Cathedral) were most efficient accompanists. Mr. E. W. Spiller, Organist of St. Mary's Church, was Conductor.

OLDHAM.—On Wednesday evening, April 27, a Concert was given in the Town Hall by Mr. S. R. Platt's Private Orchestra and Choir. OTTAWA, CANADA.—Mr. Oliver King's second Pianoforte Recital took place in St. James's Hall on April 12, before an intelligent and appreciative audience. His programme was one selected to please every taste; the old and modern composers were chosen with excellent judgment, and the young player fully sustained the reputation he has gained. Mr. King's greatest effort was in Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata (Op. 57), which he interpreted with an intelligence and finish which stamped him as an ardent student of the great master. Mendelssohn's E minor Prelude and Fugue were played with great care, and loudly applauded. He also played, by request, though the item was not on the programme, the same writer's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, following the same by four humorous pieces by Grieg, which were thoroughly enjoyed by his hearers. Three items of his own composition were also played for the first time in Ottawa, a Gavotte, still unpublished, having been written for this Recital. At its close, Mr. King received a unanimous encore. Liszt and Chopin held their usual places on Mr. King's programme, both introducing something new to his audience. The G minor Ballade of the latter was magnificently played, the touching little melodies receiving a careful reading. The most striking descriptive music for the piano Mr. King has ever presented to an Ottawa audience was Liszt's "Wild Hunt"—well-named and most forcibly played. This brought an exacting programme to a close.

OXFORD.—The Oxford Vocal Union, a new society lately established for the practice and performance of oratorios, cantatas, part-music, &c., were enabled, through the untiring exertions of their Conductor, Mr. A. L. Fryer, to give their first Concert on Wednesday, April 27. The programme was miscellaneous. Some of the best rendered pieces by the choir were "Sweet and low" (Barnby), "Home" (Benedict), "Now is the month of maying" (Morley), and "O were I but a drop of dew" (Cummings); Schubert's Sonata (Op. 137, No. 3) for piano and violin, played by Mr. A. W. Whitehead (pupil of Walter Bache) and Mr. F. Guggenheim, met with a very warm reception. The soloists were Miss Matilda Roby, R.A.M., Miss Adelaide Turner (National Training School), and Mr. A. G. Crane.

PLYMOUTH.—An excellent Concert was given at the Guildhall on the 18th ult. by Mr. S. Weekes, in aid of the South Devon and East Cornwall Hospital Building Fund. Hiller's Song of Victory is a production of high merit, and was finely rendered throughout. The choruses were sung with power, taste, and precision, and Miss Mary Bliss gave the solos remarkably well. Mendelssohn's As the hart pants was also an admirable performance. The brilliant pianoforte-playing of Mr. F. Weekes in a Concerto by Hiller, accompanied by the band, was deservedly rewarded by loud applause. In the miscellaneous portion of the concert Miss E. Triplett was highly successful in a vocal solo, and a feature in the evening was the scena from Der Freischütz, sung by Miss Mary Bliss, which elicited the most enthusiastic marks of approbation.—The Plymouth Vocal Association gave a fine performance of Sir Michael Costa's Oratorio Naaman, before a large assembly, at the Guildhall on the 18th ult. Mr. F. N. Löhr conducted the efficient band of vocalists and instrumentalists. The principal singers were Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Bridson, all of whom were highly appreciated. The choruses sung by the Association betokened the careful training the members had undergone. Mr. Löhr was assisted by Mr. John Pardew (principal violinist) and Mr. Fly (first cornet); and the organ was skilfully presided over by Mr. A. C. Faulk.

READING.—An excellent Concert was given on April 26 in the Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt, by the Reading Glee and Madrigal Society. The selection commenced with a fine performance of the Cantata God, Thou art great (Spohr), the solos being taken by Mrs. J. P. Wilson and Mr. J. A. Brain, the duet by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bradley, and the choruses by the Society. Mr. F. J. Read, who accompanied throughout the evening with great skill and judgment, was very ably assisted in the Cantata by Mr. A. W. Moss, who presided at the harmonium. The programme also included Mendelssohn's setting of the Psalm, Judge me, O God; the part-songs, "Song and Melody," and "The Silent Land" (Gaul); "Ave Maria" (Smart); the madrigals, "The Silver Swan" and "My bonny lass"; and the humorous glee, "Little Jack Horner"; all of which were rendered with much care and precision. The principal vocalists, besides those already mentioned, were Miss M. A. Lyne, Miss Fleming, Messrs. Bernard Lane, Bridson, and R. Bradley. The Concert, if not financially a success, was artistically all that could be desired, and well repaid the Conductor for the painstaking training he has given the Society.

RETFORD.—The Retford Choral Society gave its second Concert for the season in the Town Hall on the 3rd ult., when there was a very large attendance. In Mr. Hamilton White, as a musical director, the Society possesses a teacher of great ability, and to his careful and intelligent training the main share of the success of the performance is due. Mr. Dunkerton, of Lincoln Cathedral, was engaged to sing the tenor solos, and the bass solos were carefully sung by Mr. George Musgrave, of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal. Sterndale Bennett's Cantata The May Queen was excellently rendered, Miss Jenkinson and Miss Crow sustaining the principal female parts with much effect. The other solo vocalists during the Concert were Miss N. Birkett, the Misses Batley, Messrs. Pidd, White, and Denman. As on many previous occasions, Mr. F. W. Wells, the Organist of Ordsall Parish Church, and Mr. G. F. Ashley, organist, of Lincoln, played the accompaniments, the former on the piano, and the latter on the harmonium, and acquitted themselves in a most praiseworthy manner. The overture to The May Queen was played by the conductor, Mr. Hamilton White, Mr. Wells, and Mr. Ashley. The march from Wagner's Tannhäuser was given with much success by Mr. Wells and Master Denman, pianoforte, and Mr. Ashley, harmonium. Master Denman also assisted at the pianoforte in some portions of The May Queen.

RICHMOND, YORKSHIRE.—A Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms on Tuesday evening, the 3rd ult., by the members of the Richmond Choral Society (President, Sir John Lawson, Bart.). The first part of the programme consisted of Rossini's Stabat Mater, which was most efficiently rendered. The solo vocalists were Miss Winks, Miss Horne, Mr. Blagbro', and Mr. W. H. Emsley. The choruses were well sustained by the members of the Society, and there was a good band, under the leadership of Mr. W. B. Sewell, of the Bradford Orchestral Society. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous. Miss Johnson presided at the harmonium, and Miss Sander-son and Miss Ritchie at the pianoforte. The entertainment was most efficiently conducted by Mr. James H. Rooks.

ROCHESTER.—The last Concert of the season was given by the Rochester Choral Society in the New Corn Exchange on Monday, April 25. Mendelssohn's Elijah was the work chosen. The principal vocalists engaged were Mrs. Osgood, Miss Grace Damian, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Ludwig, assisted in some of the quartets by Mrs. Hopkins, Miss Thomas, Mrs. Leonard, Miss May Terry, Mr. J. G. Jeffery, Mr. T. Oldoyd, the Rev. E. C. Corfe, and Lieut.-Col. Thomas. In every respect the oratorio was excellently rendered; and, in congratulating all connected with the Society on the unqualified success which their eighth season has proved, special praise must be awarded to the hard-working and thoroughly qualified Conductor, the Rev. W. H. Nutter, and the zealous secretary, Mr. G. Watson, jun.

SALISBURY.—Miss Aylward gave a morning and evening Concert on the 3rd ult. at the Assembly Rooms, both of which were extremely well attended. The principal vocalists were the Viscountess Folkestone, Lady Simeon, Miss Edith Parkyns, and Miss Amy Aylward; and the instrumentalists Mr. W. H. Leslie (violin), Miss Curzon and Miss Aylward (pianoforte), and Mr. T. E. Aylward (organ). Mendelssohn's Motets for female voices were amongst the most attractive items in the programme of the morning Concert; and in the evening Henry Smart's Cantata, King Ren's Daughter, was excellently performed. The Concerts were so successful as to realise the sum of sixty pounds, after paying all expenses, which was handed over to the Institution for Training Nurses, in Salisbury, on behalf of which excellent charity the performances were given.—On Tuesday evening, the 10th ult., the members of the Vocal Union gave their last Concert for the season to a crowded audience in the Assembly Rooms, under the patronage of the Mayor, E. F. Kelsey, Esq. The programme was selected from sacred and secular compositions. The solo vocalists, Miss S. J. Copp, and Messrs. Wade, Hayden, and Crick, were highly successful, and deservedly encored. The Misses R. and F. Thomas presided at the piano, and Mr. A. Foley at the harmonium; Messrs. Davis, Eyres, and Sutton assisting in the accompaniment. All the concerted music was sung unaccompanied by upward of fifty vocalists, whose excellent training reflected great credit on the Conductor, Mr. John M. Hayden.

SHEFFIELD.—On Sunday, the 22nd ult., the half-yearly sermons were preached on behalf of the Organ and Choir Fund of St. Philip's Church. The services were full choral throughout, the music of Tallis, Smart, and Tours being employed. At morning service the Anthem was the tenor solo, "My hope is in the Everlasting, that He will save you," with the chorus, "To Him who left His throne on high," from Dr. Stainer's Daughter of Jairus. The solo was excellently sung by Mr. Abercrombie, of Her Majesty's Chapel Royal, St. James's. The afternoon service comprised the Litany, the recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and the air "Waft her, angels" (from Handel's Jephtha); and Mendelssohn's "Then shall the righteous shine," sung by Mr. Abercrombie, was a special feature of the performance. The service was concluded with Mr. Best's chorus, "The Lord is great in Zion." The choir sang with precision and clearness.

SPALDING.—An excellent Concert was given on Thursday, the 10th ult., in the Masonic Hall. The vocalists were Miss M. C'Lean, Signor Fabrin, and Mr. Egbert Roberts. Miss M. C'Lean's songs were rapturously received, and she also sang in the duet from Il Trovatore, with Signor Fabrin, "Home to our mountains." The vocal solos of Signor Fabrini and Mr. Egbert Roberts must be mentioned in terms of high praise, the last-named vocalist also joining Signor Fabrini in two duets. Mr. W. G. Price, son of the Organist of Spalding Parish Church, contributed two solos, and ably officiated as accompanist to the whole of the programme. The Concert was in connection with the celebration of the twenty-fifth year of the priesthood of the Rev. Th. Van Biesen as Roman Catholic father. There was a grand Mass in the Oratory of St. Norbert in the morning, at which the three London artists mentioned rendered part of Haydn's Sixteenth Mass and other sacred compositions, their services being gratuitous.

SPILSBY.—The Amateur Choral Society gave its annual Concert on Tuesday, April 26, when Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, with full chorus and orchestral accompaniments, was very successfully performed. Principals: Miss Rose Maddison, Miss Talfourd, Mr. Dunkerton, B. B. Dyer, Esq.; Conductor, Mr. Keller.

STOKE-ON-TRENT.—Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed at the Town Hall, by the Stoke Philharmonic Society, on the 3rd ult., with great success. The principal vocalists were Miss Anna Williams, Miss Lilian Yates, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. Bridson; the band was carefully selected from the Birmingham Philharmonic Union Orchestra; the chorus consisted of about 150 or 160 resident vocalists, and Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap was the Conductor. All the solos were excellently rendered, and the chorus-singing was exceptionally good.

SURBITON.—On Monday, the 2nd ult., a very successful Recital of Sacred Music was given in Surbiton Park Congregational Church, in aid of the organ and choir funds. The programme included Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalms, which was well rendered by the choir, accompanied by the Mid-Surrey Orchestral Society, the solos being ably taken by Mrs. Herbert E. Newton, Miss Emily Dones and Mr. S. Williams were the other vocalists. The orchestra, conducted by Mr. S. R. Phillips, played the Overture to Samson, and the "Cornelius March." Mr. R. J. Abbott accompanied, and Mr. Basil H. Philpott, Organist of the church, conducted the choral music, and during the evening played two solos.

SWADLINCOTE.—The Harmonic Society gave a performance of Haydn's Seasons on Wednesday, April 27, which fully sustained the character attained by the Society, the band and chorus being thoroughly effective throughout. Miss José Sherrington was highly appreciated in the soprano airs, and Messrs. Grayson and Tuke, of Lichfield Cathedral, sustained the principal tenor and bass parts in a fairly correct manner. Honorary Conductor, Mr. H. Buckley.

TROWBRIDGE.—A complimentary benefit Concert was given, with much success, on April 28, to Mr. H. Millington, as an acknowledgment of the perseverance and assiduity he has exhibited in conducting so successfully the series of six monthly subscription Concerts during the last season. The following artists gave their services: Miss Marian Burton, Mr. H. Horscroft, Mr. L. Waite (violinello), the members of the Trowbridge Musical Union, and the orchestral band.

TRURO.—Mr. W. Mitchell, Organist of St. Mary's (the pro-Cathedral), being about to leave for a new appointment in Wales, was recently presented by a few of his friends with a very handsome silver tea-service, weighing forty-five ounces, supplied by Mr. Dorington, of Church Lane, Truro, and an illuminated list of the subscribers. The presentation was made by Mr. W. Barrett. Mr. Benjamin Williams and Mr. Holloway also spoke in high praise of Mr. Mitchell, who replied in suitable terms.

TWICKENHAM.—The members of the Strawberry Hill Choral Society terminated, with much success, their first season on Thursday evening, the 19th ult., with a vocal Concert in the Town Hall. Under the able and careful tuition of Mr. Barnby, the members of the Society have made great progress, and the excellence of their training was fully manifest on this occasion. The principal feature of the evening was Mendelssohn's Athalie, and this formed the first part of the evening's programme. The Overture and March of the Priests were played on the piano by Mr. Barnby and Mr. William Hodge, of St. Anne's, Soho (who performed the duty of accompanist with much skill and ability). Mr. Barnby's kind assistance at the piano was quite unexpected, and delighted his choir and the audience. The soloists were Miss Clark, Miss Dixon, and Miss Booth. The duets were splendidly sung, and the trio "Hearts feel that love Thee" was encored. Most of the choruses were given with remarkable precision and taste. The second part, which was miscellaneous, opened with Johannes Brahms's Song of Destiny, which the chorus interpreted in praiseworthy style. The concert terminated with Mendelssohn's Loreley (finale to the first act), Miss Clark taking the character of Leonora, most successfully.

WALSALL.—On Monday evening, April 25, the members of the Philharmonic Union, assisted by Miss Larkcom, R.A.M., Miss Hancock, Mr. Hanson, Mr. Winn, and an efficient band of thirty performers, gave Handel's Oratorio Samson in the Agricultural Hall. Mr. E. Proust's additional accompaniments for the orchestra were used. Miss Larkcom gave an artistic rendering of the airs, "Ye men of Gaza" and "Let the bright seraphim," assisted in the latter piece by Mr. T. Harper, who played in a brilliant manner, the cadence for voice and trumpet being splendidly executed. Miss Hancock (who was called upon quite unexpectedly to supply the place of Madame Poole, absent through indisposition) did full justice to the part allotted her. Mr. Hanson sang with much feeling the air, "Total eclipse," and Mr. Winn, in "Honour and arms" and "How willing my paternal love" was loudly applauded. The choruses were admirably rendered, especially "Great Dagon has subdued our foe," "Fixed in His everlasting seat," and "Let their celestial concerts all unite." Dr. Heap conducted. On Thursday evening, the 19th ult., His selection comprised Mendelssohn's First Sonata, Bach's Fugue on St. Ann's Tune, Best's arrangement of the Larghetto from Beethoven's Symphony in D, and Festal March (Heap), &c. The Organ, which has lately been remodelled and enlarged, reflects much credit upon the builders, Messrs. Bishop and Son. The programme was interspersed by several vocal pieces, given by the Choir in a praiseworthy manner.

WELLINGTON.—The annual meeting of the Wellington Harmonic Society was held on Tuesday evening, the 17th ult., when the secretary, Mr. C. H. Fox, reviewed the work of the past year, and congratulated the members on having reached the eighth year of its existence, not only without diminution of interest, but, on the contrary, with growing enthusiasm and numbers. For the first time the Society has attempted this season to give its accompaniments with some approach to orchestral completeness, and the introduction of both string and wind instruments is, no doubt, the beginning of a complete local orchestra. The programme of the Society for the coming year was selected as follows: 1. An open air Concert in union with the Tonedale band, to be held about the first week in July. 2. A performance of Handel's Messiah before Christmas. 3. A performance of Mendelssohn's St. Paul, which is the subject for the next Festival of the Western Counties Musical Association, about Easter. The proceedings ended with the presentation of a purse to Mr. Manley, with the hearty thanks of all members of the Society for his kind and unwearied exertions.

WEM.—The members of the Wem Choral Society gave their annual Concert on the 12th ult. The programme was miscellaneous. Miss Winkworth received great applause for her songs, which were well rendered; Mr. F. Williams, baritone and pianist, was also well received. The novelties of the evening were two Toy Symphonies, by Romberg and Haydn respectively, which were listened to with great attention, and much applauded. Mr. Prendergast, Organist of the Parish Church, conducted.

WIDCOMBE.—The organ belonging to St. Matthew's Church, having been considerably enlarged and improved, was formally reopened on the 12th ult. The improvements have been carried out by Messrs. J. Clark and Son, organ builders, of Bath, and St. Matthew's has now an instrument powerful in combination, mellow in the quality of its diapasons, rich in the number of its reeds, and thoroughly effective in its strength of swell. Mr. F. W. W. Bampfylde, Organist of St. James's, Paddington, ably presided at the organ. Mendelssohn's choral, "To God on high be thanks and praise," was sung at the opening of the service, which was throughout choral. The Rev. James Fox, Rector of St. Werburg's, Bristol, preached an appropriate sermon, at the conclusion of which the hymn, "O Lord of Heaven" (Gauntlett), was sung, and the benediction having been pronounced, Mr. Bampfylde gave an Organ Recital from the works of Smart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Batiste. His rendering of the selections was a finished performance, exhibiting as it did all the best qualities of the organ.

WIGAN.—The members of the Wigan Musical Society gave a performance of Elijah in the Public Hall on Tuesday evening, April 26, under the conductorship of Mr. A. Alexander, Organist of the Parish Church. The band was almost exclusively professional, being selected from Mr. Charles Halle's orchestra. The solos were well sung, Mr. W. A. McClure essaying the whole of the music of the title rôle. The choruses, on the whole, were executed with precision and taste, the best efforts being "He that shall endure," "He, watching over Israel," and the concluding chorus.

WINDSOR.—On Thursday, April 28, the Windsor and Eton Choral Society gave its third and last Concert of the season at the Albert Institute. The first part of the programme consisted of Spohr's Oratorio, The Last Judgment, the choruses being well rendered by the members, and the solos by Miss Annie Knowles, Master Winterbottom (of St. George's Chapel choir), Mr. Albert Joll, and Mr. D. Sutton Shepley, each of whom were warmly applauded. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection. There was a large audience. Mr. Samuel Smith ably conducted. Mr. J. S. Liddle officiated as leader of the band, and Mr. H. R. Coudrey presided at the harmonium.

WORCESTER.—A newly-formed Society, with the name of the Worcestershire Musical Union, gave a very successful Concert on the 4th ult. at the Guildhall. The programme contained Haydn's Spring, the Andante from Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, the Andante and Finale from Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1, portions of Schubert's Ballet music from Rosamunde, and some part-songs and vocal solos. The band played with great refinement and delicacy, and the choruses were well sung. The solos were most satisfactorily rendered by Miss Elliott, of Gloucester, Wm. Austin, Esq., and the Rev. W. D. V. Duncombe, of Hereford. The Rev. E. V. Hall, Precentor of Worcester Cathedral, conducted.

WORKSOP.—The members of the Worksop Choral Society gave their second Concert of the season in the Assembly Room at the Corn Exchange, on Wednesday, the 18th ult., before a large and appreciative audience. The work chosen for the first part was Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, which was rendered in a most efficient manner, under the able direction of Mr. Hamilton White. The overture was performed by Mr. Hamilton White and Mr. F. W. Wells (Organist of Ordsall Church, Retford) on the pianoforte, and Mr. G. F. Ashley (organist of Lincoln) on the harmonium. The principal solos were sung by Miss Riesmann, Miss Hardcastle, Mrs. Wilson, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. Mallinder, all of whom were well received. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous.

FIRST PRIZE & HIGHEST AWARD.

HAVE BEEN ADJUDGED THE

HIGHEST AWARD

FOR UPRIGHT IRON-FRAME PIANOS,

The Jury having accorded to them a GREATER NUMBER OF GOOD POINTS than were obtained by ANY OTHER English Firm.

Extract from Jury's Report :—

“ First Prize, Challen and Son—for great excellence and durability.”

CHALLEN & SON'S IRON-FRAME PIANOS,

Powerful and pure in tone, require but little tuning—are more damp-resisting than those made upon the old system of bracing—and especially adapted for Country Houses and the Colonies.

CHALLEN & SON'S GOLD MEDAL PIANETTES

PRICES FROM 25 GUINEAS.

May be obtained from all Musicsellers. Illustrated Lists and Testimonials forwarded free.

PARIS EXHIBITION, 1878,

the highest distinction was conferred upon Messrs. HOPKINSON by the Musical Jurors—viz., the only Gold Medal awarded to any British Manufacturer.

MESSRS. HOPKINSON, therefore, feel fairly entitled to repeat the opinions expressed in the year 1845, by the most celebrated Pianists and Musicians then living—viz., THALBERG, Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, Madame DULCKEN, Sir HENRY BISHOP, and others, as still being correct—that their Pianofortes are “unsurpassed in tone and touch by those of any other maker.”

Since these opinions were expressed, the leading musical judges in all parts of the world have confirmed them.

Messrs. H. having also, after carefully conducted experiments, introduced improvements of great value, with confidence invite the Trade, Professors, and the Musical Public, specially to inspect and judge of their Metal-framed Grand and Cottage Pianofortes, which they believe to deserve the eulogium passed upon them by the President of the Musical Jurors at Paris, 1878, that—

“THEY ARE FAULTLESS.”

Pedals and Action for Pianofortes,

Begs to inform Organists, Organ Students, and others that his invention for attaching PEDALS to PIANOFORTES is so useful that it has earned the approbation of over a thousand members of the musical profession. For a small outlay the great pleasure of playing organ music (from Bach's Grand Fugues to the late Henry Smart's beautiful movements) at home can be obtained. This action is easily attached to any kind of Pianoforte in a short time, as it is all sent complete with printed instructions "How to attach."

A Set of Straight Pedals (CC to F, 30 notes), with action and printed instructions, price £4 4s.

Or Radiating and Concave Pedal Board (CC to F, 30 notes), with action and printed instructions, price £5 5s.

TESTIMONIAL.

Brinscall, near Chorley, February 4, 1881.

Sir,—I received the pedals and action yesterday, and have got it attached to my pianoforte. I must say that its utility and usefulness exceed all my expectations, it is perfectly noiseless, and just what every organist or any one wishing for pedal practice at home ought to have. I should have had a set of your pedals years ago had I known they acted so well.—I remain, yours most truly,

J. AINSWORTH, Professor of Music.

Agents are required for every town and district.

Send for prices to the profession and trade; also for testimonials. Orders accompanied with cheque or P.O. order will receive immediate attention.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

A TRUE MUSICAL PATRON.

It has been often said that "example is better than precept"; but then, as precepts are so plentiful and examples so scarce, it must not cause surprise that, although we may progress surely, we progress but slowly. Many there are, for instance, who conscientiously assure us that a cause wants but liberal pecuniary support to ensure its permanent success; yet when they are appealed to for the very support they advocate, some special reason strikes them for withholding it. Now, whatever may be said of the advantage of securing social position and influence in furtherance of a movement, there can be no question that the real motive power of the world is money; and the man of fortune, therefore, can accomplish in one day, by a mere stroke of his pen, more real good than thousands of poor men have accomplished by strokes of their pen in many years. Patronage in art—and more especially in music—is good; but the timely help proffered to struggling genius, however much it may become a valuable personal benefit, is rather the patronage of artists; and he, therefore, who, disregarding individuals, helps to found institutions which shall spread a knowledge of the standard works amongst the people, is the true missionary, for he sets in action, by the magic power of wealth, those grand creations, the beauties of which can alone be revealed by the engagement of a large number of performers at an outlay beyond the means of a private speculator. Disinterested patrons of this kind are rare, but their rarity increases their value; and as it is in the nature of these benefactors of the art to shrink from any demonstrations of gratitude which their actions must necessarily call forth, it is the duty of all who become acquainted with such actions to reveal the name of the actor, not only that justice may be given to whom it is due, but that a worthy pattern may be held up to the world for others to imitate. Let us then at once say that such a person as we have attempted to describe has recently appeared—not in this country, but at Boston, in the United States. Quietly and unostentatiously—as all earnest workers in a cause they have at heart invariably proceed—he has devoted himself to the task of organising performances of the greatest compositions in musical art, and admitting the public at a price thoroughly within the reach of all. Our readers will, we are certain, be interested in knowing how this work is to be carried out; and as the facts are in our possession, we will briefly state them. At the last Harvard Concert Herr Henschel conducted an overture, which went remarkably well. Amongst the audience was Mr. Henry Lee Higginson, son-in-law of Professor Agassiz, and one of the most prominent citizens of Boston, who, struck with the excellence of the performance, immediately resolved not only to found an orchestra, with the desire of its becoming a permanent institution of the city where he resides, but to place Herr Henschel at the head of it. It appears that Mr. Higginson had for twenty years resolved to carry out this idea, and waited only for the right time and opportunity. Presuming even that he had also put himself forward as chairman of a board to determine how such an undertaking should be directed, and to suggest, if not actually to command, what music should be performed, the Boston public would owe him a deep debt of gratitude. But to prove—for it scarcely would be believed without proof—how, after making himself responsible for the large outlay which must be involved, and intimating his desire that all classes shall be enabled to share the benefits of his generosity, he modestly retires from the scene, we now give the business details of the plan. Herr Henschel was commissioned to engage an orchestra of from sixty-five to seventy performers, which, as we have already said, is to be permanent, under the title of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra," and at the time of the publication of this article is complete, and ready for the first rehearsal. The sole charge of this orchestra rests with Herr Henschel, who is to be the Conductor, and who, without the slightest supervision or control, is to make out the programme of each performance. The concerts are to take place on twenty Saturday nights between October 15, 1881, and March 15, 1882. Three rehearsals are to take place for every concert, each rehearsal of three hours' duration. There are to be no committees, nor any kind of criticism upon the actions of the Conductor. Mr. Higginson pays all the artists and every expense connected with the concerts. We may also say that he has bought a splendid library for this orchestra, which already includes fifty symphonies, seventy overtures, and ninety miscellaneous pieces, all the best editions, in full score, and with the orchestral parts. Herr Henschel has on his programmes all the nine symphonies of Beethoven, two of Mozart, two of Haydn, two of Schumann, one of Mendelssohn, one of Schubert, two of Brahms, and one of Rubinstein, besides a varied selection of overtures and pieces; and it is his intention to produce novelties at not less than fifteen of the concerts. In addition to the orchestral performances—the main feature of the enterprise—the most talented solo vocalists will be engaged at every concert. The entrance fee for the performances are twenty-five and fifty cents (1s. and 2s.). Season tickets, with reserved seats, will also be issued for all the twenty concerts, for five and ten dollars (£1 and £2). Here, then, are the authentic particulars of a plan which we believe we are safe in saying has no parallel in musical history. We have many instances of wealthy patrons of art helping young composers not only to make a reputation, but to partially free them from the great battle for existence, so that they can sustain and add to that reputation in maturer years. Help of this kind came to Beethoven, for example, in Germany; and in England we may cite the case of the Duke of Chandos, who appointed Handel to the place of Chapel-master at Cannons, and encouraged him to compose, placing an orchestra and vocalists at his disposal. But all this kindly aid, although indirectly benefiting the art, was mainly directed towards the fostering of a special gift for composition which had already decisively developed itself in the two great artists we have named. The object of our Boston patron is avowedly to further the knowledge of the art itself—not to draw forth new treasures from rising composers, but to make thousands acquainted with the treasures lying around them. The realisation of this object is still in the future; but meantime we cannot withhold the expression of our admiration at the noble manner in which the project has been organised. Let us indulge the earnest hope that wealthy lovers of art on this side of the Atlantic may take this lesson to heart. America has shown us that she can practise as well as preach. Here, the "precept" has long, very long, been set before our artistic capitalists, but we have yet to wait for the "example."

BEFORE considering more particularly the psalms of Marot, M. Douen devotes a chapter to the metrical psalms and hymns of earlier date written in the vernacular tongue. In France the seven penitential psalms were versified at the end of the fifteenth century, and a few sacred songs are found between that time and 1533.* Song, however, formed as yet no part of the worship of the French Reformers, and their first liturgy, prepared by Farel in 1533, is silent on this subject. But when Calvin was at Geneva, in 1537, he, with the co-operation of Farel, presented to the Council a scheme for the organization of the Church, in which he suggested the introduction of singing into divine service, with the object of infusing into it more warmth and life.† He recommended the employment of the psalms as the best means for effecting this purpose, and some children were to be instructed in a "modest and ecclesiastical song," which they were to sing aloud, while the congregation listened attentively and joined in their hearts with the melody, until by degrees they were enabled to take part in it themselves. Many congregations of the present day might profit by this advice. The expulsion of Calvin from Geneva in the following year postponed the realization of this design, but he never lost sight of it, as we shall see hereafter, and meanwhile the materials for carrying it into effect were being prepared independently at Paris.

We have already seen that in 1533 Marot had published a metrical version of Psalm 6. He seems to have occupied himself between that time and 1539 in similarly translating other psalms. Whether he undertook this task at the suggestion of Queen Marguerite or of some other person, whether he intended his work to supply a want which he felt to exist in the religious services of the Reformers, or whether it was merely that the poetry of the Hebrew psalms commended itself to his taste, it is of no great importance to ask. Marot himself knew nothing of Hebrew, but the revival of learning a few years before had deprived the theologians, much to their indignation, of the monopoly of interpreting the "forbidden languages," as they termed Hebrew and Greek, and had given an impetus to a spirit of inquiry far from pleasing to the Doctors of the Sorbonne. In 1534 Vatable published a Latin version of the Psalms, and it is not improbable that to this eminent scholar Marot was indebted for assistance in his work. About 1539 Marot completed his first instalment of the psalms, thirty in number, and submitted the manuscript to the king and the members of the royal family. His translations were at once received with favour, especially by the Dauphin (afterwards Henry II.), who took great pleasure in singing them himself. Where princes lead the court follows. Marot's psalms became the fashion, but in a manner very characteristic of Parisian society of the time. Each courtier adopted a psalm, which he sang to some light tune as he would a favourite ballad. We cannot suppose that the religious element had much to say to the practice.

At the beginning of the year 1540, when Charles V. visited Paris, Marot, by the king's command, presented him with a copy of these translations. The emperor rewarded the poet by a present of two hundred golden doubloons, and ordered a psalm to be written expressly for himself. Had Marot's psalms remained in manuscript and their use been confined to the court, they might have escaped the notice of the Church, but about the beginning of 1542* there appeared "Trente Pseaumes de David, mis en francoys par Clement Marot, valet de chambre du Roy," Paris, Roffet, with dedication to Francis I. Of this, the first author's edition of Marot's psalms, a copy, probably unique, still survives in the National Library at Paris. It contains the following psalms: 1 to 15, 19, 22, 24, 32, 37, 38, 51, 103, 104, 113, 114, 115, 130, 137, and 143.† To facilitate the singing of the psalms Marot added some metrical notices to the headings of twenty of them, but the volume contains neither melodies nor references to melodies.‡

Marot had completed his thirty psalms in 1539, but probably abstained from publishing them then on account of the numerous edicts that had been issued against printing Bibles and other religious works. He may have thought that the time had now arrived when he might safely send his manuscripts to the press. The king and the court had found no heresy in them, and the licence for their publication was certified by three doctors of theology, but, unfortunately, just about this time Francis was again falling under the influence of the party of persecution, several rigorous edicts against heretics and heretical books were promulgated in the course of the year 1542, and two persons were burnt in Paris. Under such circumstances the publication of Marot's psalms, and their consequent dissemination among the people, would be certain to alarm the Sorbonne. Former experience was not forgotten, and Marot left Paris with the intention of retiring to Cahors, but hearing on the way that a warrant had been issued for his arrest, he turned aside, and crossing the frontier, left France never to return.

From its own point of view the Sorbonne was right. The psalms of Marot became one of the most powerful instruments in promoting the Reformation in France.

We pass to the Genevan psalter, the history of which we are now for the first time enabled to trace. Copies of the early editions are of extreme rarity, and until lately they had not been examined and their contents collated. But even the minute research and critical acumen of M. Douen would have yielded imperfect results were it not for the fortunate discovery in the royal library of Munich of a copy of the psalter published by Calvin at Strasburg in 1539.§ There was already good evidence that such a psalter had been compiled, but its character and contents were unknown. Its recovery has now not only supplied the link missing in the chain of history, but has revealed some unexpected facts. We have already seen that Calvin had proposed to the Council of Geneva to introduce song into the service of the Church. In what way he intended to carry out the details of this project is uncertain, but at any rate his banishment from Geneva put an end to it for the time. At Strasburg, however, where he arrived in September, 1538, he found himself in a place which afforded him the ‡ Timbres.

§ We hope that this most interesting volume may be published in fac-simile. The loss of the Strasburg psalter of 1545, which perished in the flames during the bombardment of the town in the Franco-German war, is an example of the unforeseen dangers to which a library may be exposed. M. Douen pathetically remarks that if the custodians of the Strasburg library had complied with his request to lend him their psalter for examination, it would be still in existence and uninjured.

* Curiously enough, one of these is a chanson of Marot, converted into a sacred song by the alteration of some of the words.

† This alone is sufficient to disprove the charge often brought against Calvin of utter want of musical sensibility. He speaks elsewhere to the like effect.

means of realizing his plan. Singing had been for some time in use among the German Protestants of the city, and musicians of experience were to be found at the cathedral. Calvin, accordingly, seems to have lost no time* in preparing the psalter for which he had probably been already procuring materials. In some of his letters he speaks of the psalms which he was collecting, and writing on December 20, 1538, to Farel, then at Neufchâtel, he says, "We regret that the psalms have been sung among you before they arrived at the place you know of,† for we wish to publish at once. As the German tunes were more pleasing, I exerted myself to try what I could do in verse.‡ Accordingly Psalms xli. and xxv. are my first essays, and I have added others to them."

On June 28, 1539, we find Pierre Toussaint, pastor at Montbéliard, writing to Calvin to send him the French psalms, and in the following October Calvin, in a letter to Farel, makes inquiry respecting a hundred copies of the psalter which he had ordered to be sent to Geneva.

Now that we possess the psalter itself we can see what Calvin really did. The title of the book is "Aulcuns Pseaulmes et Cantiques mys en chant. A Strasburg, 1539." There is no printer's name. The volume consists of four sheets of sixteen pages each, the title-page being included. It contains eighteen psalms, the Song of Simeon, the ten Commandments, and the Credo, each with a melody prefixed. On examination it was found that twelve of the psalms were by Marot, viz.: 1, 2, 3, 15, 19, 32, 51, § 103, 114, 130, 137, and 143. Of the other pieces Psalm 113 and the Credo are prose chants, while Psalms 25, 36, 46, 91, and 138, together with the Song of Simeon and the Ten Commandments, may be confidently assigned to Calvin himself.||

It seems strange that of the three pieces already printed by Marot, Psalm 6, the Pater Noster, and the Credo, not one should appear in the Strasburg psalter. M. Douen supposes that, from the aversion of Calvin and his friends to the Court and everything connected with it, they had never read the "Miroir" of Marguerite, or the "Adolescence Clementine" of Marot, and were not even aware at that time that Marot had translated any of the psalms. This view is supported by the fact which we now learn, that the Strasburg psalter of 1539 not only contains twelve of Marot's psalms, but gives them with a text which varies considerably from that afterwards published by the author.

This altered text, however, agrees with that found in a psalter published at Antwerp in 1541, with which, therefore, it must have had a common origin. The title of this psalter is "Psalmes de David, translatez de plusieurs autheurs, et principalement de Cle. Marot. Veu, recongneu et corrigé par les theologiens, nommeement par M. F. Pierre Alexandre, concionateur ordinaire de la Roynie de Hongrie."¶ The "Approbation" is signed by P. Alexandre. This collection contains forty-five pieces, viz., the thirty psalms of Marot (which, it will be remembered, were, with one exception, as yet unpublished), and fifteen* by other persons. One of Marot's psalms, and nine of the others, have references to tunes of the day. M. Douen discusses minutely the probable date of the publication of this volume, and arrives at the following conclusions regarding it. About 1539, the Carmelite monk, Alexandre, even then inclined towards the reformed doctrines, had obtained in manuscript twelve of Marot's psalms, which he proceeded at once to "improve," after a fashion not unknown to the editors of modern hymnals, and these psalms, as altered by Alexandre, were sent to Calvin, then seeking materials for his psalter. Early in the following year Charles V. arrived at Brussels with the whole of Marot's psalms, which the author had lately presented to him. The preacher to the Queen of Hungary would have little difficulty in procuring copies of the eighteen psalms wanting to complete his collection, and, doubtless, lost no time in mutilating the text to his own satisfaction.†

On June 15, 1540, the first Flemish psalter with tunes, known as the Souterliedekens, appeared at Antwerp, and would naturally suggest the publication of a similar work for the use of the French-speaking inhabitants of the Low Countries.

About three years after the publication of his psalter Alexandre fled from Brussels on a charge of heresy, and after various wanderings became pastor at Strasburg about 1554.‡ Five years afterwards he settled in England, and, in 1561, was appointed to the charge of the French congregation in London.

Calvin returned to Geneva in September, 1541, and a few months afterwards there was printed at Strasburg, probably under the supervision of Pierre Brully, Calvin's successor there, a psalter which forms the next step to the evolution of that of Geneva. This volume, now of extreme rarity, is of especial interest as containing a complete liturgy of the Reformed Church.§

Its title is, "La maniere de faire prieres aux églises francoyses . . . ensemble pseaulmes et cantiques francoys quon chante aus dictes églises, MDXLII." At the end of the work is, "Imprimé à Rome par le commandement du pape, par Theodore Brüz allemand, son imprimeur ordinaire. La 15 de february." Some writers, Fétis among them, have actually treated this imprint as genuine, but putting aside the impossibility of such a work being printed at Rome, we have a letter of March, 25, 1542, addressed by the pastor of the French church to the magistrates of Strasburg, in which he begs their assistance in recovering six hundred copies of a new impression of this very book, which had been seized at the gates of Metz because the printer, in his "inconsiderate zeal" had inserted the words "Imprimé à Rome avec privilege du pape." False imprints of this kind were not uncommon in former times. In the present case the object, no doubt, was to promote the circulation of the work among Roman Catholics. Theodore Brüz is, of course, a fictitious name, and M. Douen gives reasons for believing it to be a pseudonym of Jehan Knobloch of Strasburg.

Looking at the pseudo-Roman psalter more particularly in relation to our immediate subject, we transcribe the preface in full, as it seems to connect this Strasburg psalter of 1542 with its predecessor of 1539.

* A letter, dated November 9, 1538, from Zwick of Constance, to Bullinger at Zürich, shows that Calvin must have introduced song into the public worship of his congregation almost immediately after his appointment as pastor. The writer informs his friend that "a church had been granted to the French in Strasburg, in which they hear sermons from Calvin four times a week, and also celebrate the Lord's Supper, and sing psalms in their own language." Je te prie de prendre en bonne part ce petit liuret, et en faire ton profit. La paix du seigneur Iesucrist soit avecques toy. Amen.

There is every reason to believe that this preface is by Calvin, and formed, so to speak, the first draft of that which he prefixed to the Genevan psalter of 1542. M. Douen believes the liturgy also to be by the same hand, and argues from internal evidence that both it and the preface belonged originally to a lost reprint of the psalter of 1539, that soon afterwards Calvin added the two "petitz tractez," and that after Calvin's departure from Strasburg all these pièces were inserted without further alteration in the pseudo-Roman psalter of 1542. The work of its editor consisted in enlarging the psalter of 1539 by the addition of the eighteen remaining psalms of Marot* which had already appeared in the Antwerp psalter, four by other authors† taken from the same collection and the Pater Noster of Marot which had been published in 1533 in the "Miroir" of Queen Marguerite.

The twenty-one tunes of 1539 reappear, and eight new ones were added to Psalms 4, 6, 22, 24, 38, 104, 113, and the Pater Noster, while Psalms 13 and 8 of Marot and 43 by C. D. were assigned to the tunes of 4, 32, and 24 respectively. Twelve psalms thus remained unprovided with tunes, viz., 5, 7, 9,† 10, 11, 12, 14, 37, 115, of Marot, and 120 anonymous, 130 by A., and 142 by D.

Soon after Calvin's return to Geneva in September, 1541, he obtained the consent of the Council to introduce some of his Strasburg psalms into public worship.§ Then followed the publication of the enlarged Strasburg (pseudo-Roman) psalter, but instead of adopting it as it stood, Calvin preferred to prepare a new edition with the former tunes revised, and new ones supplied to those as yet unprovided with them. This psalter appeared in the middle of 1542. One copy alone is known to exist in the library of Stuttgart. The title is "La forme des prières et chantz ecclesiastiques, avec la maniere d'administrer les Sacremens, et consacrer le Mariage, selon la coustume de l'Eglise ancienne." Beneath is an olive leaf terminating in an ornamental G, the mark of Jean Girard, a printer at Geneva. MDXLII. There is no imprint.

The volume commences with Calvin's celebrated second preface, but without some pages on sacred music which were not added until the following year. It contains the Psalms and Canticles exactly as in the pseudo-Roman edition, excepting that the prose version of Psalm 113 and the four Antwerp Psalms are omitted, and the Credo|| of Marot is substituted for the prose Credo of Strasburg. With some very slight variations the text is that of Alexandre, which shows that Calvin had not yet seen the authentic edition of Marot. The liturgy which follows was modified, but the chief difference between the Strasburg and the Genevan psalters lies in the music. Of the thirty Strasburg melodies seventeen only are retained, and of these all except three are more or less altered.* All the other tunes are new; thirteen of them (4, 6, 8, 9, 13, 19, 22, 24, 32, 38, 51, 113, and the Decalogue) are substituted for the former melodies, eight (5, 7, 10, 11, 12, 14, 37, and 115) are set to the Psalms left without music in the pseudo-Roman psalter, and one is adapted to Marot's Credo.

A second edition of the Genevan psalter of 1542 is recorded, which has on the title the additional words "comme on l'observe à Geneve," thus indicating the contemporary existence of a different "use" elsewhere.

We have now seen that from the first appearance of Marot's psalms they were at once appropriated by the French reformers, who adapted them to music, introduced them into their worship, and published them with Calvin's catechism and liturgy united in the same volume. We also find that of sixty-five works placed on the index by the faculty of theology at Paris, between December, 1542, and March, 1543, no less than six were editions of these psalms, and it is therefore evident that those writers have fallen into error who speak of Marot's translations as used for several years by both religious parties indiscriminately, and who imagine that they were not definitely branded as heretical until 1553, or even 1562.

The time had now arrived for Marot to resume his work, but this time not for Francis and the Court of Paris, but for Calvin and the Church of Geneva.

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. X.—BERLIOZ (continued from page 291.)

SOON after the composition of "Roméo et Juliette" Berlioz had further experience of government patronage. The year was 1840, and the authorities decided to celebrate in a special manner the tenth anniversary of the Revolution of July. Under these circumstances, and with direct regard to the ceremony of reintering the remains of the "patriots" beneath the column on the Place de la Bastille, M. Rémusat, Minister of the Interior, commissioned Berlioz to write a symphonic work, for the sum of 10,000 francs, out of which he was to pay the cost of copies and performance. No task more congenial could have been set the master, and he addressed himself with avidity to the composition of a "Symphonie funèbre et triomphale" for 200 wind instruments. The work was conceived in three parts; first, a funeral march for the procession; second, an "adieu" addressed to the illustrious dead, as the bodies were lowered into the vault; third, a movement of apotheosis, or Hymn of Glory. In actual performance, this Symphony made no effect. During the procession, little or nothing of the march could be heard, while, as soon as the last movement began, the National Guards, weary of standing in a burning sun, commenced their defile to the noise of fifty drums. For this fiasco some compensation was made by the success of the work at a public rehearsal; which led to the engagement of Berlioz and his "200" for four concerts, whereat the symphony figured largely and

‡ This seems an error. M. Douen subsequently (p. 617) places 9 in the list of psalms supplied with tunes at Strasburg, and quotes the tune itself on the following page. There were therefore nine new tunes in the pseudo-Roman psalter, and eleven without tunes.

§ An Ordinance of November 20, 1541, says: "It will be a good thing to introduce the Church tunes, the better to excite the people to pray, to praise God. As a commencement the children are to be taught, then in time the whole Church can follow." This was what Calvin had proposed five years before.

|| Published in the "Miroir" in 1533.

* The altered melodies are 1, 2, 3, 15, 25, 46, 91, 104, 114, 130, 138, 143, the Song of Simeon, and the Pater Noster. The unaltered melodies are 36, 103, and 137. From his not reckoning the Pater Noster and the Credo, M. Douen's account at page 624 is, at first sight, inconsistent with that at page 351.

brought much money. M. Rémusat, unlike his predecessor, paid the sum agreed upon without delay, but out of the 10,000 francs Berlioz received for himself no more than 2,800. The rest went in expenses. The master was satisfied nevertheless, if only because he had made the jealous Habeneck exclaim, "Decidedly that — has grand ideas."

In the same year Berlioz went on his first artistic journey—as far as Brussels. This led to a domestic crisis, which should be described in his own words:—

"Under one pretext or another, my wife had always set herself against my travelling projects, and if I had listened to her I should not have quitted Paris to this day. A foolish jealousy, for which during a long while I had given no reason, was at the bottom of her opposition. In order to carry out my purpose I was obliged, therefore, to keep it secret, to smuggle my music and a portmanteau out of the house, and to start suddenly, leaving a letter explaining my disappearance. But I did not go alone; I had a travelling companion, who, since then, has accompanied me in all my excursions. In consequence of being accused, tortured in a thousand fashions, always unjustly, and finding no longer peace and repose at home, I finished, chance aiding, by taking the benefit of a position of which I had only the evils. Thus my life was completely changed. To cut short the story of this episode in my career, and not to enter further into sad details, I will only say that from the day in question, and after squabbles not less prolonged than painful, a separation by agreement took place between my wife and me. I see her often; my love for her has not changed, and the sad state of her health makes her only the more dear."

So, while the suffering wife remained in Paris with all her bitter recollections, the husband travelled about in company with his mistress. Thus ended love's young dream—the romance of Ophelia and her passionate adorer.

Going first to Brussels, our master gave two concerts with results not altogether satisfactory. His music was attacked by Fétis with great vigour, and out of this grew a somewhat excited controversy on points of detail, as to which Berlioz complacently shows that the author of the "Universal Biography of Musicians" came off second best. We need not touch the points of dispute here. They belong to the dead past, and not to the living present. Returning to Paris, Berlioz made arrangements for a colossal concert before setting out on a more extended tour; again got into trouble with all about him; had to encounter a formidable conspiracy, and to pull his enterprise through a fire hot enough to consume it in the hands of a less energetic spirit. As it was he made no money, but was called upon to pay 360 francs out of his own pocket to meet the balance of costs and receipts. This done, he started on his tour, concerning the experiences of which we have a good deal of information in the form of letters to different persons.

The tour began badly. At Brussels, to the master's great disgust, a promised concert could not be given because a favourite singer had not arrived. The people there professed great annoyance, and their visitor did not soothe them when he said, in his most ironical vein: "Be calm. The concert will not take place, and you will not have the pain of listening to my music. That is sufficient compensation, I think, for such a misfortune." Going on to Mayence, Berlioz waited upon Schott the publisher, who said, "I don't think—you cannot—give a concert here. There is no orchestra, there is no public, and we have no money." Away to Frankfort flew our master. Some concerts had been arranged for in the Free City, and there would compensation be found.

We see the actual result in the course of a conversation with Guhr, director of the theatre—"a little man with bright, piercing eyes; rapid gestures, brief and incisive words, and a strong habit of swearing." N.B.—We shall put asterisks in place of Guhr's oaths.

"G. Oh! it is you, is it, my dear fellow? You haven't received my letter, then?"

"B. What letter?"

"G. I wrote to you at Brussels to say * * * Wait. I can't speak well—a misfortune—'tis a great misfortune. Ah! here is our régisseur, who will act as interpreter.

Then he went on, still in French:—

"G. Tell M. Berlioz how much I am upset; that I wrote asking him not to come; that the little Milanollos fill the theatre every evening; that we have never seen such a furor among the public, * * * and that we must put aside for the moment grand music and grand concerts.

"R. M. Guhr charges me to tell you, sir, that—

"B. Don't take the trouble to repeat it. I have understood—too well understood, since he has not spoken in German.

"G. Ha! ha! ha! I spoke French * * * without knowing it!

"B. You know it very well, and I know that I must either return, or boldly go on at the risk of elsewhere finding infant prodigies who will give me checkmate.

"G. What am I to do, my dear fellow? These children bring in money. * * * French romances make money; French vaudevilles draw the crowd! What would you? * * * I am director; I cannot refuse money; but at any rate wait till to-morrow, I will let you hear 'Fidelio' with Pischek and Mdle. Capitaine, and * * * you can give me your opinion about our artists.

"B. I believe them to be excellent, especially under your direction. But my dear Guhr, why do you swear so much? Do you think it consoles me?"

"G. Ha! ha! that is said en famille. (He intended to say 'familiarily.')

"B. Then, since we are en famille, come and drink some Rhine wine; I forgive you your little Milanollos, and I will remain to hear 'Fidelio' and Mdle. Capitaine, of whom you seem to be the lieutenant."

Having renewed at Frankfort his acquaintance with Ferdinand Hiller, Berlioz went on to Stuttgart and saw Lindpaintner about giving a concert in the little capital. Lindpaintner received him like a brother, but took up Schott's parable at Mayence: "This is a royal residence, it is true; but there is neither money nor a public." However, if Berlioz would proceed, he had only to take the Redoutensalle and pay eighty francs into the musicians' pension fund. The artists would rehearse with and play for him gratis. At the concert the Symphonie Fantastique and the Overture to "Les Francs Juges" were performed with an effect upon some of the leading connoisseurs such as induced them, on Berlioz' showing, to get rid of the composer without delay:—

"As for Dr. Schilling, I am sure that he found everything execrable, and that he felt thoroughly ashamed of having taken the first steps to introduce to Stuttgart a brigand of my species, vehemently suspected of having violated music, and who . . . would make the chaste muse a sort of gipsy, less Esmeralda than Helen MacGregor. . . ."

So the Stuttgart cognoscenti despatched Berlioz with a letter of introduction to the Baron von Billing, counsellor of the Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen, who held his little court at Hechingen, in the Black Forest. The Prince was devoted to music, and kept a small and somewhat doubtful orchestra about him. But Berlioz, gratified by a most cordial reception, put up with the orchestra, arranged his works to its capacity, and when the Prince helped the drummer to count his rests, when all difficult passages in the trumpet parts were cut out, and when the trombone-player was allowed to sound only the notes of which he was sure, the performance went swimmingly, and everybody was pleased.

Returning to Stuttgart, Berlioz went thence to Carlsruhe, where it was not convenient to give a concert, the theatre having been taken by an Italian flautist. So, "full of respect for the flute," the master went on to Mannheim—a "very calm, cold, flat, and square" town, wherein a passion for music was no hindrance to sleep. Here a concert took place, with the "Harold" Symphony in the programme; and then, weary of Mannheim, Berlioz made his way to Weimar through Frankfort, again encountering Guhr. "He recommenced swearing; I quitted him." Weimar, with its recollections of Goethe and Schiller, of Herder and Wieland, suited his poetic temperament, and he wrote to Liszt: "I breathe here." He did more—he flourished at Weimar. His concert, with its Symphonie Fantastique and "Francs Juges" overture, was an immense success; the hall was crowded, the applause long, and royalty sent its high officers charged with compliments. In such a town this success seemed doubly precious.

From Weimar to Leipzig was an easy journey, but Berlioz hesitated to make it because Mendelssohn was musical dictator there, and their artistic paths had diverged so widely since the days when they met at Rome. At length, however, the French composer wrote to his German brother, and received a reply which set all doubts at rest. Mendelssohn's response is worth quoting for its thorough heartiness:—

"My dear Berlioz,—I thank you with all my heart for your nice letter, and because you still preserve a remembrance of our Roman friendship. For myself, I will never forget it while I live, and I am glad to have the prospect of soon telling you this by word of mouth. It will be my pleasure and duty to do all that I can towards making your stay in Leipzig happy and agreeable. I believe I can assure you that you will be satisfied with the town—I mean with the musicians and the public. Before writing, I have taken care to consult several persons who know Leipzig better than myself, and all confirm my opinion that you will have an excellent concert. The expenses of orchestra, hall, placards, &c., will be 110 crowns; the receipts may range between 600 and 800 crowns. You should be here to settle the programme and do all that is necessary at least ten days in advance. Furthermore, the directors of the Subscription Concerts charge me to ask if you will conduct one of your works at the concert to be given on February 22 for the benefit of the poor of the town. I hope you will accept their proposition after the concert you give yourself. I engage you then to come here as soon as you can leave Weimar, and shall be glad to shake you by the hand and say 'Welcome' in Germany. Do not laugh at my bad French as you used to do in Rome, but continue to be my good friend as you were then, and as I shall be always your devoted,—FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY."

Here let us find room for a parenthesis. In 1864 Berlioz read the first volume of Mendelssohn's published letters, and penned the following note concerning his expressions of friendship: "I have just seen in the volume of Felix Mendelssohn's letters, published by his brother, in what consisted his 'Roman friendship' for me. He said to his mother, clearly meaning myself, '— is a true caricature, without a spark of talent, &c., &c. I have sometimes a wish to devour him.' When he wrote that letter Mendelssohn was twenty-one, and did not know a single score of mine. I had then only penned a sketch of my Symphonie Fantastique, which he had not seen, and it was but a few days before he left Rome that I showed him my just-finished overture to 'King Lear.'" Berlioz, however, forgot that he had often offended Mendelssohn's conceit—a quality which that young gentleman nursed very tenderly, and could not bear to have touched. But the Frenchman did not thus act without being provoked. At the first interview of the two composers, for example, Mendelssohn began talking of some parts of Berlioz' cantata, "Sardanapale," and said, when his new acquaintance expressed himself displeased with his own work, "I compliment you—on your taste. I was afraid you would be satisfied with that allegro. Frankly, it is a very miserable thing." This was rude, to say the least; but Mendelssohn was even more offensive the next day, when, hearing Berlioz profess admiration for Gluck, he coolly remarked, "Ah! you love Gluck?" as who should say: "How can a musician like you have ideas sufficiently elevated, and a sentiment of grandeur of style and truth of expression lively enough for the love of Gluck?" Berlioz made no answer at the time, but matured a characteristic scheme for "paying off" his new acquaintance. Knowing that Mendelssohn would visit a common friend at a certain time, he preceded him, and placed on the piano a MS. copy of an air from "Telemaco," one of Gluck's little-known Italian operas: "Mendelssohn came, looked at the music, took it to be part of some modern Italian opera, and began to play it. At the four last bars, the musical accent of which is truly sublime, I stopped him as he was imitating Rubini in a grotesque fashion, and said, with an air of astonishment, 'Ah! you don't like Gluck!' 'Gluck! how Gluck?' 'Alas! my dear fellow, that piece is by him and not by Bellini, as you thought. You see that I know him better than you do, and that I am of your opinion—more than yourself.'" On another occasion when Berlioz was praising the metronome, Mendelssohn said, "What do we want with the metronome? It is a useless instrument. A musician who cannot, on seeing a piece, at once divine its movement is a booby." The next day Berlioz showed his friend the score of the "King Lear" overture. "Give me the time of it," said Mendelssohn, sitting down to play, and was answered, "Wherefore? Did you not say yesterday that a musician who—" &c., &c. Retorts like these grievously offended the young German's self-esteem, but Berlioz confesses that, while "touchy" to the last degree about music, he could bear any amount of contradiction as regards other matters. Looking at all this, the very friendly letter we have quoted was a welcome surprise. "It appeared to show a goodness of soul and an agreeableness of manner which I had not before known in him, and I was not slow to see, on arriving at Leipzig, that these excellent qualities had become his in reality. He had lost nothing at all of the inflexible rigidity of his artistic principles, but he no longer sought violently to impose them. . . . Only he was always a little too fond of the dead."

On reaching Leipzig and driving to the Gewandhaus, Berlioz found Mendelssohn busy rehearsing the "First Walpurgis Night," which was about to be produced. He was deeply impressed with the music, and when all was over hastened in a state of rapture to congratulate the composer. The two men met, with the same sad thought in each mind: "A dozen years have passed since we dreamed together on the plain of Rome!" Presently Berlioz asked his friend to make him a present of the bâton he had been using. "Willingly," replied Mendelssohn, "on condition that you send me yours." The exchange was duly made, and with Berlioz' wooden sceptre went the following letter:—

"To the Chief Mendelssohn.—Great Chief, we have promised to exchange our tomahawks. Behold mine! It is rough: thine is plain; only squaws and pale-faces love decorated arms. Be my brother, and when the Great Spirit shall send us to hunt in the land of souls, may our warriors hang our united tomahawks on the gate of counsel."

With reference to the style of this epistle, there is reason to believe that Berlioz had been reading Fenimore Cooper's "Last of the Mohicans."

Mendelssohn behaved, we are told, "like a brother" in the affair of his friend's concert, and would seem to have had his patience tried, since Berlioz was exigent about the orchestra, and offended some people by what was called his "insolent pretensions." He wanted twenty-four violins, not sixteen only, and three instruments—to wit, a cor anglais, ophicleide, and harp—which practically were not to be found in Leipzig! What next, and next? But it was certainly curious that in musical Leipzig, under the reign of Mendelssohn, the only cor anglais was so bad that Berlioz preferred giving the part to a clarinet; and the so-called ophicleide was a small leathern affair, not at all like the proper thing, while Mendelssohn, when he wanted harps, had to obtain them from Berlin. Berlioz could not do without a harp, and his friend Lepinski sent a M. Richter from Dresden. So far good; but when an instrument had been hunted up in the city and restrung, it was found that Richter, though a capital musician, could only play the arpeggios usually required in theatrical orchestras. The upshot was that the borrowed instrument went back with thanks, and at the performance its music was played on the piano by Mendelssohn himself. In connection with the state of things thus revealed, it should, of course, be borne in mind that harps were not then so freely used in orchestral music as now. The concert went off very well, and the "Symphonie Fantastique," as usual, set the critics by the ears; while, at the succeeding performance for the poor, the Offertoire from Berlioz' "Requiem" stirred even Robert Schumann out of his "habitual mutism," and prompted him to say, "That surpasses all." His Leipzig work done, the master fell ill; recovered, and paid his doctor's account, at the worthy man's request, with an autograph copy of the Offertoire theme. Berlioz was flattered by this incident, but angry with himself for missing a pretty return. He wrote on the manuscript, "A M. le Docteur Clarus." "Carus, not Clarus," said the learned practitioner; on which Berlioz should immediately have written, but did not, "Patientibus Carus sed Clarus inter doctos."

From Leipzig the master went to Dresden, where he met Richard Wagner, then Sub-Chapelmaster under Reissiger. His observations upon the composer of "Rienzi" and the "Flying Dutchman"—both then achieved—show customary discernment and generosity. Berlioz heard only the second part of "Rienzi," which it was then usual to play in two parts, and he hesitated to give an opinion about it. But of the "Flying Dutchman" he said: "The work appears to me remarkable for its sombre colour, and certain stormy effects perfectly indicated by the subject; but I am bound to recognise also an abuse of the tremolo, the more to be regretted as I had already noticed it in 'Rienzi,' and saw that it indicated in the author a certain indolence of spirit, against which he cannot too carefully guard. The sustained tremolo is of all orchestral effects that which soonest tires; besides, it demands no invention from the composer when accompanied neither above nor below by a salient idea. Still, whatever the fact on this point, honour is due to the Royal thought which, in giving (Wagner) complete and active protection, has, so to speak, saved a young artist gifted with precious faculties." After giving two concerts in Dresden, Berlioz returned to Leipzig for the second of his concerts there, subsequently proceeding to Brunswick, at the suggestion of Meyerbeer, and meeting with a success not far short of triumphant. Hamburg having been next visited, with the strange and unexpected result of discovering both an ophicleide and a harpist, the master descended upon the Prussian capital. Here he assisted at a performance of Bach's great "Passion," and was much struck by the "attention, respect, and piety" with which a German audience listens to such a work:—

"Every one followed the words in the book; there was not a movement in the auditory, not a murmur of approval or censure, not a sign of applause; one was at a sermon; hearing the Gospel chanted; assisting in silence, not at a concert, but at a Divine service. It is just in this way that such music ought to be heard. Here Bach is adored and believed in without supposing for an instant that his divinity can be called in question. A heretic would excite horror; it is even forbidden to speak of such a thing. Bach is Bach, as God is God."

Two successful concerts were given by the master in Berlin, after which he visited Hanover, and Darmstadt, and then returned to Paris, with feelings towards Germany which could not be better expressed than in a letter to Mr. G. A. Osborne:—

"Here I am at length, my dear Osborne, at the end of this pilgrimage—the most difficult, perhaps, that a musician has ever undertaken, and the remembrance of which, I feel, ought to predominate during the rest of my life. I have consulted, like the religious men of ancient Greece, the Delphic oracle. Have I well understood the meaning of its response? Am I to believe that of it which appeared favourable to my desires? Are there not deceptive oracles? The future, the future alone, will decide this. Be the result what it may, I must return to France and address finally my farewells to Germany, that noble second mother of all sons of harmony. But where shall I find words equal to my gratitude, my admiration, and my regrets? What hymn can I sing which shall be worthy of her grandeur and of her glory? I only know that, in leaving, I incline myself with respect, and say to her in heartfelt tones, 'Vale, Germania, alma parens!'"

MR. PEPYS THE MUSICIAN.

By FRANCIS HUEFFER.

It remains to say a few final words of a composer who, although little known in the annals of music, is of more than ordinary interest to the Diarist, and, it may be hoped, to the readers of these extracts. It is perhaps scarcely necessary to add that the excellent Mr. Pepys is the composer in question. Mr. Pepys was not a conceited person in the vulgar sense, and, considering how much he did for the furtherance of art and science—not to speak of his official work—he said remarkably little of his own virtues. At the same time he was not without a last debility, and his pride in his musical achievements may perhaps be considered as such. Of his grand ideas for the improvement of musical notation and theory generally we have already heard something. We have also seen him at work busily "pricking" music of his own composition. The question now arises, of what kind were these compositions? and to that question this final article will be devoted.

Neither the number nor the scope of Mr. Pepys's compositions is very imposing. They are, indeed, as far as one can ascertain, essentially limited to three songs, all with very quaint words. The first, and the quaintest as far as its poetry is concerned, is that beginning "Gaze not on swans." As to the chronology of its origin we are well informed. It was on February 11, 1662, that Mr. Pepys went "Home to musique, my mind being full of our alteracons in the garden. At night begun to compose songs, and begin with 'Gaze not on Swans.'" But the course of composition with Mr. Pepys did not run as smooth as might have been desired, and friendly aid had accordingly to be called in. At this time Pepys was the pupil of Mr. Berkenshaw, and according to his own showing an anything but pliable disciple. Mr. Berkenshaw had his own ideas of the theory of music, and, Mr. Pepys being in the same predicament, an occasional clash of opinions was inevitable. Here is an amusing scene of contest between master and pupil:—

"Feb. 27th, 1662. This morning came Mr. Berkenshaw to me, and in our discourse I, finding that he cries up his rules for most perfect (though I do grant them to be very good, and the best I believe that ever yet were made), and that I could not persuade him to grant wherein they were somewhat lame, we fell to angry words, so that in a pet he flung out of my chamber, and I never stopped him, having intended to put him off for to-day, whether this had happened or no, because I think I have all the rules that he hath to give."

Little squabbles of this kind could, however, not permanently shake Mr. Pepys's esteem for Mr. Berkenshaw or his theory; and as late as 1665 we find the Diarist trying to compose ("While I staid for the barber") "a duo of counterpoint, and I think it will do very well, it being by Mr. Berkenshaw's rule."

How seriously Mr. Pepys took the task of learning music generally, and composing the aforesaid song in particular, is apparent from the following amusing extract, dated three days before the formidable battle already referred to:—

"Long with Mr. Berkenshaw in the morning at my musique practice, finishing my song of 'Gaze not on Swans,' in two parts, which pleases me well, and I did give him 5^l. for this month or five weeks that he hath taught me, which is a great deal of money, and troubled me to part with it. Thence to the Paynter's and set again for my picture in little, and thence over the water to Southwarke to Mr. Berkenshaw's house, and there sat with him all the afternoon, he showing me his great card of the body of musiquè, which he cries up for a rare thing, and I do believe it cost him much pains, but it is not so useful as he would have it. Then we sat down and set 'Nulla, nulla sit formido,' and he has set it very finely."

From a subsequent statement in the Diary it would appear as if Mr. Berkenshaw's assistance in the composition of the song had been very considerable; for on March 14 in the same year we find Mr. Pepys "trying over the two songs of 'Nulla, nulla,' etc., and 'Gaze not on Swans,' which Mr. Berkenshaw set for me a little while ago. I find them most incomparable songs as he has set them, of which I am not a little proud, because I am sure none in the world has them but myself, not so much as he himself that set them."

Whether this setting of the words by Berkenshaw was altogether independent of Mr. Pepys's, or only a corrected and developed version of it, is not sufficiently clear.

Another song, and one of more importance, is that commencing "It is decreed." In composing it, Mr. Pepys again went to work with the utmost deliberation. The first reference to it is a statement entered on April 5, 1666, to the effect: "I to the office all the afternoon till late, and so home and late putting notes to 'It is decreed, nor shall thy fate,' etc., and then to bed." But, even before putting pen to paper, Mr. Pepys had been for some days pondering over the tune, or, as he himself puts it (April 18, 1666): "In all my ridings in the coach and intervals my mind has been full these three weeks of setting in musique 'It is decreed.'" But in spite of these strenuous efforts the work proceeded slowly; more important business, perhaps, intervened, and we find that as late as August 22 the song still remains unfinished. At last, however, the great task is accomplished, the egg is perfect, and Mr. Pepys immediately raises a triumphant cackle: "Anon to church," he writes, November 12, 1666, "and after church I to my chamber, and there did finish the putting time to my song of 'It is decreed,' and do please myself at last, and think it will be thought a good song."

No sooner has this happy consummation been arrived at than Mr. Pepys, like other composers, is anxious to hear his new work, and he accordingly hurries to the house of Mrs. Knipp, the pretty actress, gets rid of her objectionable husband in as polite a manner as he can, and takes her home "to some good victuals that we could not put off, that was intended for the great dinner of my Lord Hinchinbroke's if he had come. After dinner I to teach her my new recitative of 'It is decreed,' of which she learnt a good part, and I do well like it, and believe shall be well pleased when she has it all, and that it will be found an agreeable thing."

Mrs. Knipp's professional engagements having probably prevented her doing such justice to "It is decreed," as the composer thought was due to its merits, Mr. Pepys looked for a humbler exponent of his inspiration, and we find him accordingly "teaching my girle Barker part of my song, 'It is decreed,' which she will sing prettily." It seems, indeed, to have been amongst the duties of Mrs. Pepys's maid to learn the famous song, for as late as January, 1668, we find Mercer engaged in studying the same ditty, "and she will do it well." But, in spite of this hopeful prognostication, Mr. Pepys seems to have at last despaired of finding a worthy interpreter amongst the sex, and he accordingly, a few months later, retires "to my chamber to prick out my song, 'It is decreed,' intending to have it ready to give Mr. Harris on Thursday when we meet, for him to sing, believing that he will do it more right than a woman that sings better, unless it were Knipp, which I cannot have opportunity to teach it to." And this is the last we hear of "It is decreed."

But even the glories of this wonderful production must fade before the splendour of another song, Mr. Pepys's opus magnum, "Beauty, retire." To this he recurs again and again with paternal fondness; and in his portrait, by Hales, where he is represented in a gown ("which I hired to be drawn in"), he holds in his hand a roll of music, which by the initiated will be recognised as "Beauty, retire." A photograph of it appears in the third volume of Mr. Mynor Bright's edition. According to the editor's statement it was bought by Mr. Peter Cunningham at the sale of the Pepys-Cockerell collection in 1848, and it was purchased by the trustees of the National Portrait Gallery in 1866. The words are taken from the fourth act of Sir W. Davenant's "Siege of Rhodes," and are to this effect: Solyman being the speaker, and Roxalana the beauty addressed:—

Beauty, retire; thou dost my pity move;
Believe my pity, and then trust my love.
At first I thought her by our prophet sent
As a reward for valour's toiles,
More worth than all my Fa-ther's spoiles;
But now she is become my punishment.
But thou art just, O Pow'r di-vine;
With new and painful arts
Of studied warr, I break the hearts
Of half the world, and she breakes mine,
And shee, and shee, and shee breakes mine.

Of Mr. Pepys's setting it would be unnecessary to speak, as it will shortly be published in THE MUSICAL TIMES from a copy of the original manuscript in the Pepysian library. Only a few remarks as to the genesis of the song may follow here. Like all Mr. Pepys's works, "Beauty, retire" was the result of mature consideration. He carried it in his mind, carefully wrote and rewrote it, and discussed its merits with congenial friends; thus Mr. Hill, whose name the reader will remember, "likes the whole very well, but excepts again two notes in the base." Mr. Pepys's female admirers, Mrs. Colman and Mrs. Knipp, were immediately set to practise it. Mrs. Knipp more especially "sings and makes it go most rarely, and a very fine song it seems to be." The lady indeed seems to have proved a true friend on this occasion; she "spread abroad" the song wherever she went, and soon was able to tell the delighted author that "it is mightily cried up, which I not a little proud of." Equally complacent references to the song might be multiplied, but perhaps by this time the reader has grown weary of Mr. Pepys's harmless prattle, and the best he can do is, like Beauty, to retire.

"LA REGINA DEL NEPAL": OPERA BY G. BOTTESINI.

SIGNOR BOTTESINI has long been prominently before the public in Italy as a double-bass virtuoso without equal, and to his fame in so unique a capacity he has of late years added considerable success in composition. In this field his reputation is founded more especially on his opera "Hero and Leander," which was brought out in Turin, and subsequently performed with success in Milan, Rome, and Naples. The work, moreover, derived special interest from the fact that the libretto was furnished by Arrigo Boito, who originally proposed to set it to music himself, but, unable to complete his task during the vicissitudes of his early career, made it over to Bottesini. If Bottesini thus started with the enormous advantage of having a libretto by so eminent a writer, he was, on the other hand, placed at a disadvantage; for not entirely without truth was it said that if Boito himself had composed the opera, he would have produced a work very superior to that produced by Bottesini. However, "Hero and Leander" as it stands is a charming work, and has earned applause wherever it has been given. Another work which added to Bottesini's reputation as a composer—independently of compositions of minor importance—was a Requiem, or "Missa Solennis," executed for the first time at the Teatro Regio of Turin on Good Friday last year; and if he did not attempt to copy, much less to vie with, Verdi in the rather theatrical effects of the latter's more popular work of the same name, he attested not only his desire, but also his ability, to contribute to the reform of sacred music in Italy. His "Missa Solennis," as pure in style as it is lofty and classical in conception, is vastly superior to the wretched so-called sacred compositions of modern Roman choir-masters, whilst it is free from those sensational aberrations which stamp Verdi's Requiem as a work intended not for the church but for the theatre.

Bottesini's third and most recent work is "La Regina del Nepal." This work constituted one of the novelties of the last winter season in Turin, and had been expected with considerable interest by the composer's friends and supporters, who are perhaps nowhere more numerous than in that city. The opera was put on the stage with excellent effect, and had been carefully rehearsed by Signor Pedrotti, the able and energetic conductor of the Teatro Regio; and yet it cannot be said that it met with anything like an enthusiastic reception. It is true that Italian audiences are extremely capricious, and that an opera which may prove a total failure in Turin may achieve a brilliant success in Milan, or vice versa; as was exemplified in the case of Boito's "Mefistofele," which, though almost universally accepted, is only just beginning to make its way in Milan. But as regards the opera under notice, it is not so much the music as the libretto that caused disappointment. The latter is by Signor Tommassi, and although no libretto has probably ever been got up more elegantly and more lavishly—for even the leading musical subjects are given—it by no means atones for the inherent weakness of the drama or for the absence of poetical merit. The dramatic action, which is spread over a prologue and three, happily short, acts, may be told in a few words.

Giamshid, the King of Nepal, has been defeated in battle by Elbis, the general of the Persian army, and dies in the arms of his daughter Mirtza and his faithful minister Simar, who swear to avenge his defeat and death. Both are led in captivity to Teheran, where they are kindly treated by Nekir, the Queen of Persia, who at the same time rewards Elbis, her general, for his services by making him her husband and king. Faithful to her pledge, Mirtza resolves to stab the vanquisher of her father, but when face to face with him her dagger drops; and in a subsequent moonlight scene in the palace garden at Teheran she confesses her love to him, whilst he, with oriental weakness and treachery, promises to restore her to her father's throne, and to that end heads a conspiracy of the Indians in captivity at Teheran. Simar, however, finding himself deceived by Mirtza, to whose hand he aspired, promptly reveals the plot to the Queen, who surprises the conspirators when on the point of executing their scheme. After the usual exclamations of horror from the populace, and the Queen's reproaches for treachery and ingratitude, Mirtza has nothing better to do than stab herself with the identical dagger which was originally intended for Elbis, whilst this excellent general evidently gets off cheaply, for, as is usual in such cases, the jealous Queen contents herself, apparently, with the death of her rival. "Il faut toujours chercher la femme."

It would be difficult to say of which opera this libretto savours more strongly: of "L'Africaine," of "Aïda," of the "Reine de Saba," or of the "Roi de Lahore"; at all events the conclusion is irresistible that Bottesini might have done better than waste his talent on so hackneyed and worthless a subject. Of course the drama affords ample scope for spectacular display, which on the Italian stage of the day, as elsewhere, is more than ever a source of attraction, and an indispensable requisite of success. However, in the case before us, even this profuse oriental splendour, and such seductive moonlight scenes as that of Mirtza being picturesquely suspended in a modern hammock from the palms in the palace garden at Teheran, do not make up for the dulness of the story or the wretched verse which the author has patched together.

Bottesini is by no means the only composer who has set good music to an inferior libretto; but he might have taken a lesson from similar errors committed by Schumann in his "Genoveva," or, to quote an Italian and even more recent example, by Ponchielli in the case of the "Promessi Sposi." It is the composer and not the author of the libretto who in such cases is invariably held responsible, and often pays dearly for his want of discernment in the choice of a libretto. "La Regina del Nepal" opens with a short prelude, as is usual and, it may be added, necessary in operas written in the first instance for Italian audiences, too impatient and talkative to listen to an instrumental prelude, much less to an overture, however well played. In the first act Mirtza, to whom falls the lion's share of the opera, has a charming air, "Soccorri la figlia captiva dolente," and, farther on, a most original and characteristic "bee" song, called "Canzone dell'Ape"—"Ai primi rai del giorno," with ensemble. The first act, undoubtedly the best of the opera, is brought to a close by a grand finale and ensemble which is highly effective, and shows Bottesini as a master of dramatic composition. In the second act may be mentioned Mirtza's solo, "Ridato già m'area il soglio un nume arcano," which she sings rocking in the hammock, and is followed by Elbis' recitative and solo for tenor, "Una fanciulla figlia di Re," and then by a love duet, remarkable for the swing and beauty of its climax, "Ai tuoi piedi l'umile mio brando io depongo." In the third act are conspicuous the opening scene for mezzo-soprano (the Queen) with female chorus and ballet, the conspiracy scene, and the finale, with Mirtza's air, "Ch'io l'oda ancora quel divino accento."

Bottesini's style, as exemplified both in "Hero and Leander" and "La Regina del Nepal," is that of the rising Italian school. This school, though largely influenced by Gounod and—as regards dramatic continuity, declamation, and treatment of the vocal subjects by the orchestra—by Wagner, yet stands on its own independent ground, for while fully admitting extension of form in harmony and instrumentation, it cultivates and upholds melody as after all the first requisite of opera, and thus the music, instead of becoming a heavy "intellectual tempest," is generally clear and intelligible. For Mirtza, the heroine of his new opera, Bottesini found an excellent and sympathetic exponent in Signorina Turolla, whose one great fault is her vibrato, and who, but for this, gained almost unanimous applause as the heroine of "Hero and Leander," which she sang in Rome during the season before last. The other leading and more or less thankless parts of "La Regina del Nepal" were not rendered equally well, but the ensembles and the orchestra gave proof of excellent training. A first performance is hardly ever a fair test of the success and vitality of an opera in Italy; and already on the second and third nights the new opera met with a much warmer reception, although this was due exclusively to the music, and certainly not to the libretto. Yet it may safely be affirmed that, of the two operas, "La Regina del Nepal" and "Hero and Leander," the latter is not only the most successful, but also the best work Bottesini has so far produced.

At length we have solved the question of which we have latterly heard so much, What is to be done with "street music"? It has been proposed that we should "regulate" it—whatever that may mean—and it has also been suggested that we should abolish it; but the true method of treating it—that of supplanting it—has only just been hit upon. That all the music supplied to the people should be performed under cover is manifestly an absurdity, for assuredly in the summer days and evenings the open air is, at least, infinitely more sympathetic with the requirements of players upon wind instruments, of which our peripatetic bands are usually composed; and many there are who would willingly encourage a short evening concert before their open windows. But then it is obviously a hardship that music should not only be brought to your door when you do not want it, but that those who bring it should insist upon your having it. To remedy this, the "People's Entertainment Society," which has already justified its title by instituting gratuitous concerts for the poorer classes, has made arrangements (with the permission of Her Majesty's First Commissioner of Works) by which a band shall perform between the hours of five and eight p.m., on Mondays in Battersea Park, on Wednesdays in Victoria Park, on Tuesdays and Thursdays in the Regent's Park, and in Hyde Park on Fridays and Saturdays, until the end of August. This is a step in the right direction; and we sincerely hope that, as any lady or gentleman can join the committee on payment of ten pounds, a large number will be found to aid the movement. A first-rate military band is expensive to maintain as a permanence, for really good performers can always command good terms. If only looked upon as a healthy recreation, the establishment of these open-air concerts should be warmly encouraged; but we believe that they will also tend to inculcate a love for good music amongst the masses, and that no fear need be entertained of the behaviour of the crowds they will attract. At all events they will be an important element in popular training; and we have no right to cast opprobrium upon the uneducated classes until we can conscientiously affirm that we have done all in our power to educate them.

A CORRESPONDENT, in a somewhat lengthy communication, draws our attention to a scheme for the encouragement of British composers and performers which, although he may imagine to be a novelty, has been so often proposed as to render its adoption—even in the carefully considered shape now offered—by no means probable. The details are as follow: An association is to be formed "for the promotion of English music," its head quarters being in London. England is to be divided into eight or ten districts, each having some city or large town in its centre, where would sit a sub-committee of local musicians. All compositions would be examined by the sub-committee of the composer's district, and those approved would be sent to the London Committee, who would select the best for performance at the Annual Festival of the Association in London. In the same manner the vocal and instrumental talent of the country might be tested and utilised; and thus in every district there would be a chorus and orchestra drawn from itself, whilst in London we should have a national band of vocalists and instrumentalists performing the works of English composers. We would ask the sanguine framer of this proposition whether he ever heard of the "Society of British Musicians" and the "British Orchestral Society"; and, if so, whether he does not agree with us that the failure of both these institutions does not prove the fact that the concert-going public cares not one bit about the birthplace either of those who compose the music or of those who perform it. Apart, however, from the question as to whether the best method of promoting the art is to form in our metropolis a "Mutual Admiration Society," and to protect ourselves by excluding others, there can be no doubt that even supposing that composers would be satisfied to submit their works to an examining body in London, few would like to have them pronounced upon by the local musicians of the place in which they reside. If English musicians are to occupy a high place in the world of art, our correspondent may rely upon it that it will be by widening, and not by narrowing, their sphere of action.

It is not altogether true that Italian opera has flourished in this country because it has had no rival. Petted by the aristocracy, it became a fashionable pastime, and, as the artistic minority could not support another establishment, gradually it assumed the form of a national institution, so that the few attempts which were made from time to time to perform operas in the language of the country in which they were written seemed actually opposed to the sympathies of the English people. That the rage for lyrical works sung by vocalists of all nations to Italian words has now declined can scarcely admit of a doubt; and, as the first practical proof of this fact, we hail with pleasure the announcement of the advent of a German operatic company. Years ago we remember having heard "Fidelio" represented by German artists who in their own country might have ranked as third-rate, and, although there was not a "star" in the whole company, never shall we forget the effect of the ensemble, not only upon ourselves, but upon the entire audience. The earnestness and genuine pathos thrown into the "Prisoners' Chorus" drew tears from all; and yet, with what is termed a first-rate Italian company, we have often heard this same piece received without the slightest recognition, and on several occasions even with laughter. The "Meiningen Court Company" have shown us how attention to perfection of detail and uniformly good acting can infuse a new life into the drama; and we may hope that the German operatic artists with whom we shall make acquaintance next year will prove to us that something better than well-worn Italian operas, inadequately represented, are ready for us when we require them. There can be no reason why we should not have purely Italian operas sung by Italians, but we also want French operas sung by Frenchmen, and German operas sung by Germans; and if to these we add English operas sung by Englishmen, the taste of the whole art-loving public of this country, instead of that of a small section, will be amply appealed to.

THE mass of correspondence we receive requesting us to answer the most trivial questions in some measure connected with the art to which our journal is devoted, warrants us in believing that a "Musical Notes and Queries" would have a very tolerable chance of success. We are asked the age, and even the height, of celebrated vocalists; whether two well-known singers have ever sung together, and who is the chorus-master at a certain operatic establishment. Then we have also questions which should properly be addressed to a medical paper—as for example, whether smoking is injurious to the health, whether there is any danger of breaking your collar-bone in attempting to reach a high note, and whether it is good for a vocalist to sleep with his window open. A composer, too, wishes to know where he can buy the best music-paper, and another whether it is expected that the author or the publisher shall circulate a song, and also if it is usual to send a copy to professional singers. A recent correspondent asks us to tell him "what is the difference between the words compose and composition," and our last month's series of questions concludes with a request that we will inform our correspondent what is the fee for a year's tuition at some metropolitan college of music, and also whether the students lodge and board at the institution. Now it is obvious that were we to reply to all these queries, we must not only devote a special portion of the paper to such purpose, but employ a special staff of musical enquirers to furnish the information. Therefore do we repeat that there is every room for the journal—for which we have already supplied a title—and if a motto be required, let us suggest one from Shakespeare, "Notes, notes, forsooth, and noting."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE return of Madame Christine Nilsson as the heroine of Gounod's "Faust" attracted a large audience, and may be said to have been the first event of a season remarkable for barrenness of incident. Signor Novara, who made his début as Mephistopheles on the occasion, has a hard bass voice, and his action is stiff and constrained. The re-appearance of Mdlle. Lilli Lehmann in the hackneyed "Traviata," and the fine performances of Madame Marie Roze—especially as Mignon in Ambroise Thomas's Opera, and Pamina in "Il Flauto Magico"—must also be chronicled. Mdlle. Dotti sang much better as Papagena than she sang in any character last season as Mdlle. Louise Swift; but we are still left in wonder as to the reason of her re-engagement. As Filina, in "Mignon," Mdlle. Emma Juch made a very favourable first appearance. She has an agreeable soprano voice, which has evidently been carefully cultivated; and, if she is not tempted to overtax her power, there are many parts in which she may be found highly useful. There has been no novelty at this establishment; but Boito's "Mefistofele," with Madame Christine Nilsson as Margherita and Helen of Troy, and "Carmen," with Mdlle. Minnie Hauk as the heroine, have drawn exceptionally good houses. Signor Campanini, too, who has now joined the company, is unapproachable as Faust, in Boito's Opera.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

MOZART'S Opera "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"—Italianised as "Il Seraglio," and with the conventional Recitatives in place of the German dialogue—was revived on the 9th ult., and with a success which proves that the "music of the future" has not yet supplanted the "music of the past." Originally performed at Vienna when the composer was in love, and full of youthful enthusiasm for his art, the whole work is overflowing with charm of melody, grace of style, and dramatic feeling; and—despite the Opera being modelled upon the Italian School, which ruled the Viennese public at the time of its production—these qualities must ever ensure it a cordial welcome, even with the most critical audience. An obstacle to the frequent representation of this work has undoubtedly been the exceptional compass required by all the principal vocalists, for the soprano music runs up to D in alt, and the bass to D below and E above the staff; and although Madame Sembrich accomplished with ease the excessively difficult passages assigned to Costanza, M. Gailhard, in the part of Osmino, was compelled to omit some of the low notes in the characteristic solo "Ha! wie will ich triumphieren," which somewhat marred the effect intended by the composer. The part of Costanza is so admirably fitted in every respect for Madame Sembrich that her brilliant solos became a series of triumphs, the applause ringing forth at the conclusion of her marvellously executed scale passages in a manner rarely heard at this establishment, the great air in the second act, "Märtern aller Arten," being redemanded with an enthusiasm not to be resisted. The humour of Osmino was excellently displayed by M. Gailhard, who also sang the music well throughout, even the purists freely forgiving him for the omissions to which we have already referred. Mdlle. Valleria's Biondina was, like everything this painstaking vocalist attempts, a thoroughly satisfactory performance, her air at the commencement of the second act being rendered with true artistic feeling, and eliciting genuine applause. M. Vergnet, as Belmonte, improved as the opera progressed; but his intonation was faulty in the opening scenes. M. Soula Croix's Pedrillo was better, on the whole, in the action than in the delivery of the music; but in the duet with M. Gailhard, "Vivat Bacchus," both artists elicited warm and well-deserved applause. Signor Sclara as the Pacha was fairly effective; and the choruses showed that commendable pains had been taken at rehearsal, under the new Conductor, M. Dupont, whose steady and intelligent direction of the Opera contributed materially to its success. With Madame Sembrich and M. Gailhard in the company, it may be hoped that "Il Seraglio" may now frequently be heard at this establishment; for although it has been given at Covent Garden Theatre in English many years ago, in the original by a German company, and also in Italian at Her Majesty's Theatre, when Mdle. Titiens sustained the part of Costanza, it appears now to have obtained a firmer hold of the public than ever.

Herr Anton Rubinstein's Opera "Il Demonio," produced on the 21st ult., was a success which may fairly be termed "sensational"; yet, apart from this record of fact, it remains an open question whether either the subscribers or the general public will clamorously demand its frequent repetition when the excitement of the first night and the presence of the composer at the conductor's desk has calmed down. The reason of this is not far to seek, for although Herr Rubinstein may be looked upon as a representative pianist of the modern German school, his Opera seems modelled upon no school at all, although it must be conceded that, as abstract music, there is much, very much, in the work to elicit that genuine applause which was so freely bestowed during its progress as to convince the composer of the impressionable nature of an English audience. Briefly, it may be stated that the story, founded upon the epic of the Russian poet, Lermontoff, relates to the persistent endeavours of the Demon to obtain possession of Tamara, whose betrothed, the Prince of Sinodal, he causes to be slain by Tartars in the forest, on his journey to claim his bride. Now it is difficult to imagine that a Demon, who begins by cursing the world in the first scene, should afterwards come out as the conventional baffled villain of the Opera, and fall so desperately in love with a young girl as to bring himself at once amongst the human characters of the work, retaining only his universally accepted characteristics when he is required to be invisible, and to sing on a rock in the background. Then the "Angel of Light," who appears at brief intervals, is a mere nonentity, and only introduced as a foil to the Evil Spirit, who might reasonably be supposed to progress too rapidly in his suit were such antagonistic influence removed. The great merit which must be freely assigned to Herr Rubinstein in setting this libretto is the fidelity with which he has reflected its incidents in his music. Many portions of the Opera are, indeed, remarkable for unexaggerated dramatic expression, and the Eastern colouring which so decisively predominates is never obtruded at the expense of propriety. In the chorus for female voices in the first act—woven with which are some brilliant solo passages for Tamara—there is a lovely melodic phrase; and the long solo in which the Demon, unseen, expresses his passion for Tamara, contains some skilful and effective writing, both for the voice and orchestra. The tenor of the opera, Prince Sinodal, appears only in the scene amongst the rocky mountains, where he is killed by the Tartars; but he makes the most of his time by singing a long solo—with viola obbligato, charmingly played by Mr. Burnett—which is extremely vocal, but deficient in melodic grace. In this scene must also be mentioned a characteristic chorus of the Prince's attendants, excellently written and extremely effective. In the next act the clever ballet music which accompanies a series of dances must be alluded to in terms of the highest admiration, for it is not only striking in melody and varied in character, but instrumented with a skill which materially enhances its intrinsic beauty. We cannot say that the appearance of the body of the murdered Prince, which is brought in and remains almost throughout the act, is a particularly agreeable object for the eye to rest upon amidst the splendour which surrounds it; but the incident gives opportunity for Tamara to sing some highly impassioned music over the remains. The solo for the Demon and his duet with Tamara contain some dramatic writing of a high character, and the spirited chorus at the end of the act created a marked effect, although the sudden resolution of Prince Gudal to avenge the death of his daughter's betrothed seems somewhat patched on to the previous action in order to bring down the curtain with a sensation. The last act is mainly occupied with an elaborate duet between the Demon and Tamara, many portions of which are extremely good. In this scene we have the conflict between Good and Evil to which operatic audiences are now becoming—perhaps too much—accustomed; and the Opera ends with the death of Tamara, and the conventional ascent into heaven, the Demon of course yielding to the superior influence exercised by the "Angel of Light." No praise can be too great for the manner in which the Opera was rendered. Madame Albani, as Tamara, realised the character to perfection, and gave the whole of her music with a dramatic power and finish which must have delighted the composer; and M. Lassalle, as the Demon, proved himself one of the greatest artists on the lyric stage by his delivery of the declamatory as well as the more melodious passages assigned to him. Signor Marini sang his music well, but appeared not deeply enamoured of his part; Madame Trebelli, as the "Angel of Light," we need scarcely say was admirable; Signor de Reszké was an efficient Prince Gudal; Mdle. Ghiotti was satisfactory in the small part of the Governess; and the characters of the old servant of Prince Sinodal and the Messenger were well filled respectively by Signor Silvestri and Signor Sabater. The composer, who conducted the Opera, was called on the stage, and vigorously applauded at the end of each act, an honour in which all the principal characters shared.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE close of this Society's first season in St. James's Hall was made interesting by the revival of Sir Julius Benedict's Cantata, "St. Cecilia," a work first heard at the Norwich Festival of 1866. For reasons which doubtless appear to it sufficient, the Society does not lavish favour upon the productions of contemporary men, but "St. Cecilia" received at its hands unusually prompt recognition, and was produced in Exeter Hall not long after the Norwich performance. A good many years have elapsed since then, and when arrangements were making for the late series of concerts, it was seen that the time had come to revive a Cantata considered on all hands as deserving a better fate than oblivion. The resolution to produce "St. Cecilia" turned out to be an act of wisdom; considerable interest being excited, and a large audience drawn together, by whom the music was received with evident favour. We need not enter upon a discussion of this work, inasmuch as its merits and defects are generally known to amateurs. The test of time, however, justifies us in saying that its merits predominate to an extent sufficient for the continued regard which, in all such cases, is the source of continued life. There are numbers in "St. Cecilia" which, perhaps, Sir Julius Benedict would now replace by others if that were convenient; but there are many more which public opinion would not suffer him to replace even if he could, and so desired. Among these the final scene stands pre-eminent for beauty, but mention should also be made of the fine anthem "God is our hope and strength," of the lovely contralto air, "Father, Whose blessing," of the no less attractive tenor song, "A wondrous change," and of the trio, so full of pathos, "Farewell but for a while." These are examples of art both pure and high, and, if only for the sake of these, it is well that the Cantata should be kept within the range of public notice. The performance, conducted by Sir Julius in person, was in many respects very successful. To this rule the solos presented scarcely an exception, as may be imagined of any solos when in the hands of Mrs. Osgood, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Generally speaking the choruses were given with effect, and at the close a loud call for the composer demonstrated that the supreme good of a satisfied audience had been secured.

Sir Michael Costa having resumed his bâton, "St. Cecilia" was followed by a capital performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater," with which ended the Society's campaign under the new conditions forced upon it by circumstances. The season, we believe, has, on the whole, given encouragement to the managers, and, we trust, will have the result of stimulating them further in the work of placing the Society abreast of the times.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE musical interest at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere has during the past month centred in one person—Rubinstein, the composer, conductor, and pianist. In that triune capacity he appeared at the final supplementary Crystal Palace Concert on Saturday, the 11th ult., and the audience, which filled the vast concert-room in all its parts, testified to the great artist's undiminished popularity. Herr Rubinstein in the first part of the Concert gave a truly admirable performance of Schumann's Piano-forte Concerto, the slow movement especially being played with a delicacy of touch which was in excellent contrast with the fiery and brilliant passages of the first and final allegros. Of Rubinstein the pianist we speak at length in another column, and therefore turn at once to the composer. Two works of a very different type here demand our attention. The first, a Concerto for the violin and orchestra, in G (Op. 46), is well-known to musicians, although it has for some reason never been played in this country. As the opus number indicates, the work is by no means of recent date, and shows Rubinstein still under the influence of Mendelssohn and Schumann, the general impression of the music being that of charm rather than of depth or originality. Herr Auer, the well-known violinist, had undertaken to introduce the work, and made his first appearance at the Crystal Palace on the same occasion. His tone, although of agreeable quality, was not able to battle with the impediments of a large hall and a very powerful accompaniment—for both in Schumann's and in Rubinstein's concerti (the former conducted by Mr. Manns, the latter by the composer) the orchestra was occasionally wanting in discretion. A work of infinitely higher importance formed the second part of the concert. Herr Rubinstein's Sacred Drama ("Mystery" would perhaps be a more appropriate name), "The Tower of Babel," is essentially founded on Scripture, although Herr Rodenberg, the librettist, has not strictly adhered to sacred chronology. In order to supply a representative of the true religion (or was it the tenor that was wanted?) he introduces Abraham, who with patriarchal bluntness blames King Nimrod for his pride in erecting the tower, and is thrown into a fiery furnace for his pains, Divine Providence having to rescue him from painful death by means of a miracle. Nimrod (who, in accordance with his ferocious character, is a bass) and an Overseer (like most officials, a basso profundo) make up the list of dramatis personæ, Herr Rubinstein having dispensed with the female solo voice altogether. He, indeed, was evidently not bent on pleasing the public by dulcet strains—not at least in the first part, which is of a sombre and severe character. The songs of the masons and bricklayers exhorting each other to work, and finally engaging in an animated religious quarrel, are relieved (if relief it may be called) only by exulting boasts of Nimrod, the harsh commands of the Overseer (made harsher still by Mr. Cross's voice and manner of singing), and the stern remonstrance of Abraham, who all speak in the same declamatory style, without much individual difference. We do not reproach Herr Rubinstein with adopting such a style; nobody can expect barbaric potentates or their slave-drivers to indulge in pretty tunes. At the same time the declamatory style should be (and is, for example, in Wagner) always supported by an undercurrent of melodic inspiration; and this undercurrent was not often perceptible in the early portions of the Oratorio. The destruction of the tower by lightning is, on the other hand, rendered by the orchestra in a truly masterly manner; and it is here that the composer, for the first time, seems to rise to the height of the dramatic situation. From that height he soon descends, but this time, fortunately, to a smiling valley of melodious streams; for the second part of the Oratorio is as pleasing as the first was sombre and monotonous. The three great races of the world—Shemites, Hamites, and Japhetites—successively leave the scene of the disaster, and as they depart they each sing a choral song characteristic of their national type. Rubinstein is here in his true element, and his skill in turning popular suggestions to artistic account is shown in its most brilliant light. The song of the Shemites, founded on an Eastern scale, is especially of the most striking effect. Abraham contributes a flowing tenor air, and even Nimrod, who has recognised the evil of his ways, chimes in harmoniously. "The Tower of Babel," although not a masterpiece, must be accepted as an interesting contribution to the modern oratorio, which, with the exception of Liszt, has at present not a single man of real genius amongst its representatives in Germany. The performance of the work at the Crystal Palace was greatly wanting in accuracy and refinement, especially as far as the choral singing was concerned. The tenor part was somewhat overpowering to Mr. Barton McGuckin's voice, but Signor Foli was a very dramatic Nimrod. That the composer was rewarded by enthusiastic applause it is unnecessary to add in Rubinstein's case.

A performance of the "Martyr of Antioch," also given at the Crystal Palace during last month, was without remarkable features of any kind.

BACH CHOIR.

A FEW lines will suffice to record the performance on the 1st ult.—deferred from an earlier date—of Bach's great Mass in B minor. The work is rightly brought forward every season, and has now become so familiar to amateurs that few of its merits remain unappreciated. It should be said, however, that as the executants become more familiar with the difficulties they have to encounter, the more complete is their mastery over them, and, by consequence, the more full the revelation of Bach's genius as here exemplified. Assuredly those who heard the Mass at its latest performance were better favoured than those who listened to its first, if not so fortunate as others who, by attending on each occasion, have seen the great work come forth gradually into the strong light that now beats upon it. It may be that no measure of excellence in rendering or familiarity with detail will make the airs of the Mass popular. The fashion of them is dead and gone, never to be revived. But the gigantic choral numbers will live and retain their impressiveness for all time, and it is because of these that the Bach Society has established a claim upon universal respect and gratitude. If the Society be remembered for nothing else, it will have in the recollection of the Mass in B minor a monument worth the labour of all the years of life. Upon the performance we need not dwell. Conducted by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, as usual, and sustained by the soloists, band, and chorus engaged on former occasions, it gave general satisfaction, and brought the season to a noble end.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE fact is undeniable that public interest in these Concerts abated after the first two or three of the present season had been given. We can say this without committing ourselves to its justice or injustice, although we should not hesitate to declare, if called upon, that nothing in the assumed cause could, on general grounds, warrant complaint. It has been urged that the directors of the Richter Concerts have erred by considering themselves called upon to produce the works of young men just coming into notice, or of others as yet unfamiliar to English amateurs. In this, per se, nothing objectionable can be found. Rather is it a course incessantly advocated, and impressed upon musical institutions as necessary to public favour. "You must enlarge our knowledge," exclaim our connoisseurs in a chorus unanimous and prolonged, "and you must lend a helping hand to struggling talent." Very good; but this is just what the Richter Concerts have to some extent been doing, to their unquestionable damage. How shall we explain the anomaly? Only by pointing out that the Concerts were founded not for a general, but a special purpose. They are expected to limit themselves to the highest works of art, or at farthest to those which come recommended by the most illustrious names. It was the misfortune of the directors that they did not fully estimate the strength of this feeling. With the best intentions in the world they disregarded it, and the result was seen in empty seats, and heard in the murmurs, amounting to veiled threats, of subscribers. Happily the managers were wise in time, and so promptly "put the ship about" that a good part of the seventh programme was thrown over to make room for works more in harmony with general desire. The mistake, we believe, is not likely to recur.

At the seventh Concert (the 13th ult.) Beethoven, Weber, and Wagner were the only composers drawn upon, the first-named being nobly represented by his "Egmont" overture and Seventh Symphony. In both Herr Richter secured the most splendid results. Seldom have the grandeur and pathos of the overture—grandeur how lofty! pathos how profound!—been more fully shown, while each movement of the Symphony proved that the orchestra was in the hands of a man who not only knew every detail of the work, but the relation of all to the general scheme. The wonderful Allegretto, and the Scherzo with its trio of heavenly beauty, were heard as though they amounted to a revelation, which, in fact, they did, because each hearing of such music, when adequately performed, reveals new beauties. In fine, the rendering of the Beethoven works was a triumph for Herr Richter and his faithful followers. The Weber selection consisted of the Concertstück for piano and orchestra, with Mr. G. F. Hatton at the solo instrument. Mr. Hatton was well received, for the sake of the veteran musician his father, and to some extent perhaps because he had, with all an Englishman's disadvantages in Germany, gained an appointment as pianist to the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, not to mention that Dr. Von Bülow had trained him, and, presumably, being in London, sanctioned his appearance. Thus trebly recommended, Mr. Hatton had great advantages. Yet the result was a disappointment. He should not, perhaps, be held responsible for alterations in the text, since Dr. Von Bülow may have counselled them; but he cannot be acquitted of playing with more boldness than precision—with more showiness than skill. The young artist has, so far, taken kindly to his master's faults; now let him copy his virtues, and, by labouring in patience with a modest spirit, he will presently become that which we shall rejoice to see—a good artist. Wagner was represented at this concert by a selection from "Die Walküre," including Wotan's "Abschied" and "Feuerzauber," Herr Henschel being the vocalist, and making his first appearance since returning from America. The chief interest of this music, we need not say, is orchestral, and right well was it brought out and sustained under Herr Richter's bâton. That the "Feuerzauber" charmed all present by its glowing beauty those who know it will assume.

At the eighth Concert (the 20th ult.) Weber made no sign, and Beethoven and Wagner had the field to themselves; the older master contributing his overture to "Coriolan" and "Eroica" Symphony; the younger the overture and Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser," and Pogner's address from "Die Meistersinger." This was a programme after the hearts of those who support the Concerts, so that the attendance was large and the enjoyment complete. We can only say, once more, with reference to the execution of Beethoven's works, that which we said in connection with the previous Concert. The whole was magisterial—the fullest development of the interpretative faculty. All felt this in the "Eroica," especially when the Funeral March was given with so much solemnity, earnestness, and power. Not less remarkable, however, was the rendering of the Scherzo, with its truly characteristic transitions and Beethovenish waywardness, and that of the Finale, which we are sometimes told is so out of keeping. The "Tannhäuser" Overture and Venusberg music made their usual sensation, and found a happy foil in the repose of the extract from "Die Meistersinger," the vocal part of which was sung by Herr Henschel.

The ninth and last Concert of the subscription series was exclusively devoted to Beethoven's great Mass in D—the most stupendous of all offerings at the shrine of sacred music. How eagerly amateurs had anticipated the performance of this masterpiece is not difficult to imagine, considering its character, and the fact that it had only been heard in London twice during the present generation; once under Mr. Barnby—a fine and memorable performance—and once under Sir M. Costa at a Concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society. It was also given, it will be in recollection, at the last Gloucester Musical Festival; but apart from these occasions, the work has remained sealed save to score-readers of exceptional ability. No wonder, therefore, at the crowd which filled St. James's Hall, or at the avidity with which an audience of amateurs and connoisseurs listened to every bar. After the long and able analysis of the Mass which appeared in our columns a short time since, there is no need to descant upon its extraordinary structure and its wealth of idea. Our business lies exclusively with the performance, and that was, bearing difficulties in mind, surprisingly good. The choir, patiently trained by Herr Frantzen, knew its work well, and should not be blamed for any want of physical power. Some such choristers are needed for this Mass as the strong-lunged, deep-chested men and women who triennially astound musical visitors to Leeds. But as we cannot have them, let us be thankful for the zeal and skill which carried Herr Frantzen's people through an almost superhuman task with praiseworthy success. The solos were sung both correctly and in good taste by Mdlle. Pyk, Miss Orridge, Mr. W. Shakespeare, and Herr Henschel; and the orchestra never seemed to be at fault. A profound impression was made by the work—so profound that the audience largely refrained from applause at the end, and went away silently, as though from a place of worship. The performance was repeated on the following Monday.

HERR RUBINSTEIN'S RECITALS.

AFTER passing through some of our counties and exciting unbounded astonishment by those personal qualities which make him a wonder wherever he goes, Herr Rubinstein came to London and, on the 2nd ult., began a series of Pianoforte Recitals in St. James's Hall. On the first occasion the room was not crowded. Herr Rubinstein had been absent four years, and the great mass of the public—those, we mean, who follow popular ideas and movements as sheep follow a leader—soon forget. When, however, the press had trumpeted forth the fact that a great man was amongst us, St. James's Hall became too strait for the numbers who crowded into it. Herr Rubinstein is now "the rage." Society recognises it as a duty to hear and see him, and at each performance the receipts, we are told, exceeded £600. That all this is due to Herr Rubinstein's pianoforte-playing simply we must decline to believe. The Russian artist is a very remarkable and, in some respects, a unique performer, but he is also a "personage," and a social curiosity none the less sought after on account of a credited report that he dislikes exhibiting himself, and entertains no special regard for those who run after him. But with Herr Rubinstein as a "personage" and a social curiosity we here have nothing to do. Let us deal with him only as a pianist. In that capacity he has not changed since 1877. His defects then are his defects now; and the merits of the past are equally the merits of the present. It would, of course, be absurd for us to discuss Herr Rubinstein's pianoforte-playing as though it were a new thing under the sun. We have heard it at intervals in this country during many years, and as the artist plays the same pieces now which were his favourites at the outset, there is actually no scope for varied observation. A propos, it is somewhat remarkable that Herr Rubinstein preserves such a limited and unchanging repertory. A few Sonatas of Beethoven, one or two examples of Bach and Mozart, the greater works of Schumann, some light specimens of Schubert, Liszt's Transcriptions, Chopin's Nocturnes, &c., and his own compositions—these make up our artist's stock in trade. It may be asked why he should add to or change them, since they serve his purpose. The answer is in a parable—Man doth not live by bread alone.

At his first Recital Herr Rubinstein played Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Mozart's Fantasia in C minor; Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 53); Schumann's Fantasia, dedicated to Liszt, five pieces by Chopin, and three compositions from his own pen. This was clearly enough even for such prodigious powers as those which distinguish him, and the selection served to show alike the weakness and strength of his artistic nature. We scarcely expect to be called upon for a definition of Herr Rubinstein's weakness, although it is of a quality which adds to his attraction, and might be taken for power. As all amateurs know, the great pianist has passionate feelings easily stirred by music, and he lacks self-control. Place him en rapport with a work of enormous difficulty or intense expression, and he is like a high-mettled horse with the bit between his teeth. He becomes a pianist "on the rampage," and storms about the keyboard, bent rather upon given vent to his own emotions than upon interpreting the master whose music is in hand. It is for this reason that the stamp of Rubinstein's individuality is so impressed upon all he does as to obliterate everything else; and whether he play Beethoven or Schumann, Schubert or Chopin, we are conscious before all of himself. That this adds to his personal popularity is perfectly true—at the same time it is not exactly as art-lovers would have it. An executant should possess individuality, but not in such an overwhelming degree as that nothing else can be seen. Happily, the objection just raised does not apply when Herr Rubinstein is engaged upon music of a peaceful or distinct from a stormy character. At such times he remains within himself, his own master, and perfectly able to use his great resources for the best ends. At such times, moreover, he is perfect. The pianoforte speaks with the most persuasive eloquence; the whole poetry of the theme is brought out with the sympathy of a reader who is himself a poet, and the listener remains wrapt in "measureless content." But while we thus point to lights and shades in this artistic nature, we do not ignore the fact of its rare and commanding distinction. Herr Rubinstein is a landmark of the age in every musician's eye. We shall probably not look upon his like again, and it behoves us to improve his presence here, and to do him honour, while guarding—the more carefully because of his high position—against the influence of that in him which is faulty. It would serve no purpose were we to notice in detail the four Recitals as yet given, and to specify the works played at each. Enough that Herr Rubinstein has been himself on each occasion, and that his programmes have not departed from their extremely familiar type.

MR. GANZ'S ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

THE month just passed saw the end of Mr. Ganz's season as of so many others; the third Concert taking place on May 28; the fourth on the 11th ult.; the fifth and last on the 25th ult. At the first of these a new pianist appeared and excited some interest, which would no doubt have been greater but for the fact that nearly all the masters of the keyboard have this year met in London. M. Ernst Loewenberg is a pupil of Rubinstein, and he elected to play his teacher's Concerto in D minor (Op. 70) and a new Fantasia by Liszt on Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens." That he will grow into another Rubinstein we scarcely expect, and are not quite sure that the thing is to be desired; we do expect, however, that when his experience has increased and his faculties have ripened, he will take a very prominent place in the world of music. Already his executive skill is remarkable, and, on the occasion now referred to, met with appreciation more than sufficient for encouragement to visit us again, at a time when there may be a clearer field for his energies. Another distinct attraction of the Concert was a large part of Berlioz' "Roméo et Juliette," fairly, though by no means adequately performed and received with respect, if not with the enthusiasm which might have resulted earlier in the season. The overtures were Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" and Rossini's "Guillaume Tell"; the vocalists Miss Orridge and Mr. Faulkner Leigh.

At the fourth Concert, Mr. Ganz, bent as ever upon unfamiliar things, brought forward Gluck's "Orpheus," with Madame Patey in the title-character, Miss Carlotta Elliot as Eurydice, and Miss Agnes Larkcom as Love. The selection of this often-named, but rarely heard work seemed to be very popular, the hall filling completely, and echoing with frequent applause. Is it then time to rehabilitate Gluck? Whether it be or no, many a worse thing might happen to our lyric stage than the revival of a master who knew how to be dramatic without turgidity, and expressive without sacrificing the chief and essential beauty of pure vocal melody. "Orpheus," we need not say, suffered by transference to a concert-room, where it could appeal to only one sense; but so vividly does Gluck, even with simple means, suggest the emotions and situations of the story, that the drama kept fast hold upon attention till the end. Some of the numbers were exceedingly well received, and not a few were rendered with adequate power. In this category we may place all Madame Patey's airs, the familiar "Che farò" at their head. Our popular contralto never sang with more earnest feeling. The music suited her; she seemed to revel in it, and the result was great success. Miss Elliot, as Eurydice, made a very favourable impression. The young Scotchwoman, with her pure voice and delicate sensitive style, fitted her part exactly, and produced an effect that will hereafter serve her in good stead. Miss Larkcom also gave able assistance, and, as the band and chorus were equal to their work, the revival of "Orpheus" deserves to rank among the distinctive events of the season. The complement of the programme included Schubert's Symphonic Fragment in B minor, the Overture to "Le Domino Noir," and some songs sung by Mdle. Eveline Syrid, a débutante with pleasing qualities of voice and style.

At the final Concert, on Saturday last, the chief features were Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, played by Madame Sophie Menter, Beethoven's Symphony in A (No. 7), Benedict's Festival Overture, and two Intermezzi (composed expressly for this Concert) from Miss Alice Mary Smith's "Masque of Pandora." Of these, time does not allow more than simple mention.

MADAME MENTER'S RECITAL.

ALTHOUGH Madame Sophie Menter had been heard at Mr. Ganz's Concerts, at the Crystal Palace, and under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, there was need for her to encounter the supreme ordeal of a "Recital," and she did not shrink from it. It is a very common thing now for pianists, even those not in the very front rank, to assume the responsibility of calling amateurs together, with themselves as the sole attraction and unique object of criticism. Madame Menter's step, therefore, was not one of much hardihood, especially as few, if any, of her rivals are better qualified to take it with absolute certainty of success. Her invitation did not find a large number of acceptances, but if the hearers were comparatively few the astonishment and admiration called forth were unbounded. Madame Menter is certainly a most remarkable performer. As an executant her powers are wonderful—unsurpassed, we should say, by any other even in this age of virtuosity. She attempts the most astounding tours de force, and, what is far more, achieves them without a mistake. Other artists of her rank have long been in the habit of playing wrong notes and finding toleration for them, on the plea that, under the circumstances, no skill or care can guard against them—that they must be taken as an inevitable alloy in the metal. Madame Menter finally sets this argument aside. Her metal knows no alloy. The flying fingers, which seem to be all over the keyboard at once in works like Liszt's Fantasia on "Les Huguenots," never fall but where they should. Of some other pianists we may say, with a change in the words of the French general at Balaclava, "C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la musique"; but in the case of this lady the negative must be taken out. Her playing is magnificent, and it is music to boot. The programme of the Recital contained Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 109; two pieces by Scarlatti; Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques; transcriptions by Liszt of Schubert's "Hark, the lark," &c.; half-a-dozen works by Chopin, and Rubinstein's Valse Caprice. Remarkable in all, Madame Menter was not uniformly successful from an artistic point of view. We could not approve, for example, of her exaggerated style in the variations of Beethoven's Sonata; while her rendering of the Valse Caprice could hardly have satisfied the composer, who was present. On the other hand, in Scarlatti's delicate music, in the Schubert transcriptions, and in some of the excerpts from Chopin, nothing was left to desire. Taste and executive power were equally displayed. Altogether the Recital proved to be a notable thing, and we are glad that Madame Menter has undertaken to give another before bidding us adieu.

MR. HALLÉ'S RECITALS.

On the 24th ult. Mr. Charles Hallé finished the great task he had set himself, and played, in St. James's Hall, the last four of Beethoven's Sonatas, and the last six of Bach's Preludes and Fugues. With regard to the artistic value of this eminent pianist's labours during the present season, we can add nothing to the remarks made in our columns last month. We then said that they "afforded an educational privilege almost unique in its nature," and by those words we stand, albeit since then "lion" pianists have made a greater sensation, and the cream of the world's musical art has tempted the palates of London amateurs. In the midst of the hurly-burly of an unexampled time, Mr. Hallé has met his faithful followers week by week, and revealed to them, with the precision, fullness, and absence of distraction which is his special gift, the masterpieces of Bach and Beethoven. That his admirable efforts have not been wasted we rejoice to know. In the minds of hundreds of earnest students there is now a clearer conception of those exalted works; and especially may this be said of Bach's Preludes and Fugues, the full charm of which many who think themselves connoisseurs do not yet perceive. The tradition of "dryness" clings even to such wonderful examples of combined learning and expression, and in so far as Mr. Hallé has shown its wrongfulness—has proved how much of beauty a fugue can possess when a great master writes it—he has done very well. All who are jealous for the supreme good of our art owe thanks to Mr. Hallé because of his unostentatious and valuable efforts. He cannot do better than repeat the programme next year.

MUSICAL UNION.

Two of the Concerts given by the Musical Union during June may be taken as fairly representative of its work since our last notice. We refer to those of the 14th and 21st. At both a pianist of exceptional ability appeared in the person of Herr Carl Heymann, who, it will be remembered, made his début at the Crystal Palace on May 14 last, and impressed connoisseurs with a sense of rare power and refinement. Herr Heymann made his entry under M. Lasserre's auspices in Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, the violinist being Herr Leopold Auer. His success was complete, because the music enabled him to display his strongest points. He can make as great a noise upon the pianoforte as any one and does so sometimes in order, perhaps, to meet popular expectations, but his real charm lies in the most precise, delicate, and refined execution of music that demands such treatment. It may be supposed, therefore, that in the variations of the "Kreutzer" he was quite at home and made his mark; but, indeed, the whole work received justice at his hands. Herr Heymann subsequently played a Nocturne by Chopin, a Rhapsody by Liszt, and his own "Fairy Revels"—a piece written with a view to its composer's spécialité. These delighted the audience, and established the artist as a Musical Union favourite. Herr Auer played neatly and well in the Sonata, besides leading Beethoven's Quartet in B flat (Op. 18), and Schubert's Quintet in C (Op. 163), with MM. Wiener, Waefelghem, Lasserre, and Ernest Vieuxtemps as his associates.

The Concert given on the 21st offered a well-recognised attraction in Beethoven's Septet, played by MM. Auer, Waefelghem, Lasserre, Snelling (clarinet), Van Haute (horn), Wootton (bassoon), and White (double-bass). To this, as though doubtful whether it would satisfy, or perhaps wishing to present an embarras de richesses, the Director added Hummel's Septet, with MM. Heymann (piano), Brossa (flute), Malsch (oboe), Waefelghem, Van Haute, Lasserre, and White as executants. Two works such as these make up a programme of themselves; and had the Septets stood alone no one would have gone away in other than a mood of content. Remarks upon either are superfluous. Models of perfect form, fine ideas, and charming expression, they have long been the common property of all who make the least pretensions to rank as amateurs. Their performance was careful and good. Herr Heymann again delighted the audience with his refined solo playing, especially in Rubinstein's Barcarole; and Herr Auer was heard to advantage in a Mélodie by the same composer, as well as in a Mazurka by Wieniawski. It will be seen from the above that the Musical Union, under its new management, is keeping up a character for eclecticism and enterprise.

CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

A FESTIVAL in aid of this Society was held in Bristol on Thursday, the 23rd ult., consisting of a special Choral Service in the Cathedral in the afternoon, and a Concert in the Colston Hall in the evening. The musical portion of the service comprised the Cantate Domino and Deus miseratur, Attwood in D—verses by Master Burn, Messrs. Jones and Morgan (Bristol), and Mr. R. De Lacy—and four anthems: "I saw the Lord" (Stainer), "The Wilderness" (Wesley), "Hosanna" (Gibbons), and Handel's Coronation Anthem, "The King shall rejoice." The verses in the first were rendered by Master Hodsdon (Westminster), Mr. Cooke, Mr. Evans (Gloucester), and Mr. Kempton (St. Paul's); and those in "The Wilderness" were given by Masters Ould and Hodsdon, Messrs. Schartau and Dalzell (Westminster), and Mr. Winn (St. Paul's), the exquisite singing in the final quartet deserving special commendation. An excellent sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry White, and the prayers were intoned by the Rev. Precentor Hey. Mr. G. Riseley presided at the organ throughout the Service with great skill. Notwithstanding the fact that the Cathedral was filled by a congregation numbering at least 3,000, we regret to state that the collection amounted to very little over £47. In the evening a Concert was given in the Colston Hall, but, owing probably to the fineness of the weather, the audience was by no means so numerous as might have been desired. An admirable programme of glees, madrigals, and ballads was provided; and the part-music received full justice from the choir of sixty trained voices, conducted by Mr. Winn, Faning's "Song of the Vikings" and Jackson's glee, "The Sisters of the Sea," being, perhaps, most worthy of note. Songs were successfully contributed by Miss Annie Marriott, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. Edward Dalzell, Mr. De Lacy, and Mr. Kempton; and the members of the Worcester and Bristol Choirs, respectively, made a special mark in "Come, gentle zephyr" (Horsley) and "Queen of the Valley" (Callcott). We should also mention that the three-part song, "O'er the starlit waters," sung by seven choirboys from Westminster Abbey, was received with much favour. A most valuable contribution to the programme were the Organ Solos by Mr. Riseley, whose efforts were justly rewarded with enthusiastic applause.

On the following afternoon a Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms, Bath, where the success of the Festival held two years since no doubt contributed to ensure a much larger attendance than that at Bristol. With some few exceptions the same programme was gone through, and with a similar result. Mr. Merrick sang "Non più andrai," and Mr. W. Mann Dyson (Worcester) made a special effect in Ascher's "Alice, where art thou?" Mr. Winn again conducted with much ability, and the accompaniments were tastefully played by Mr. Riseley, the absence of an organ preventing him, however, from contributing his admirable solos to the programme—an omission much regretted. Although the financial result of the Festival is, we understand, not so satisfactory as on many other occasions, we do not think the Society will have cause to regret the visit to Bristol; and a future Festival, at a more favourable time of the year, would doubtless realise a better result.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

HERR RUBINSTEIN gave a third Pianoforte Recital in the Free Trade Hall on May 31. His programme included the overture to "Egmont," a Rondo by Mozart, a Gigue by Handel, Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 101, three of Mendelssohn's "Lieder ohne worte," the same composer's Wedding March, and selections from the works of Schumann, Chopin, and Rubinstein. Two items in the above programme are open to objection on the ground that they do not belong to the category of pianoforte music; but, in the case of Beethoven's overture, the wonderful reproduction of the score and orchestral effects silences adverse criticism. In the Wedding March, however, which as played ought to be considered from an athletic rather than a musical point of view, the legitimacy of the performance was certainly open to question.

The Rondo by Mozart and the Gigue by Handel deserve special notice on account of the skill with which they were played and their comparative novelty. The selection from Schumann's works was most exquisitely performed, as were also four pieces by Chopin, one of which, a Berceuse, was given with unsurpassable delicacy. Of Herr Rubinstein's own compositions the Scherzo, which contains some charmingly original passages, was the gem of a selection which also included the Barcarole in F minor and the Valse Caprice. The audience was again very large and enthusiastic.

HENRI VIEUXTEMPS.

WE have to record the death, in Algiers, on the 6th ult., of this eminent violinist. Henri Vieuxtemps was born at Verviers, February 17, 1820, and showed at a very early age a strong predilection for music, it being even said that when two years old he would spend hours in drawing a bow across the strings of a little violin. Observing the bent of the child's nature, an amateur placed him under one M. Lecloux, a professor of the instrument, and so rapid was his progress, that he made an artistic tour through Belgium at the age of eight. Later on the boy received gratuitous lessons from De Beriot, and in 1833 commenced his first tour through Germany. Two years afterwards he was in Paris, where he took lessons in composition from Reicha, the result being that he played his own music through Holland in 1836, and soon began to publish a variety of pieces. The life of Vieuxtemps thenceforward was devoted to travel from country to country with his violin, and to composition. We need not remind our readers that he several times visited England, obtaining here full recognition of the talent which gave him so eminent a place in the hierarchy of his art. Vieuxtemps was a somewhat prolific author. He wrote several concertos for his instrument, and a large number of fantasias, studies, and other pieces adapted for concert use. At least one or two of the concertos have been recognised as possessing remarkable merit, the enemies of the composer going so far as to say that he never wrote them. A few years ago M. Vieuxtemps was stricken down by paralysis and deprived of the use of his right arm. With this, of course, his career as a violinist ended; but he continued to compose till within a short time of the event we now regretfully chronicle.

THE Summer Term at Oxford just concluded has been, as usual, the occasion of many Concerts, and the programmes have been distinguished by the high class of music they have included. The two large musical societies of the city have each given a performance in the Sheldonian Theatre: the Choral Society performing "Solomon" on May 11, and the Philharmonic "Acis and Galatea" on the 20th ult., both, on the whole, good concerts; in fact the "passions" chain of choruses deserved a special word of praise. The musical feature of the term, however, has been the manner in which the College musical societies and clubs have endeavoured to interest their auditors by rendering some cantata at their concerts. No fewer than six cantatas were thus given in the latter part of the term. Worcester led the way on May 20, with Romberg's "Lay of the Bell"; on the 25th Exeter followed with Gadsby's new Cantata, "Columbus"; while St. John's finished the month by performing Alice Mary Smith's "Ode to the North-east Wind" and Gade's "Spring's Message" on the 31st. This last, by the way, was repeated at Wadham on the 20th ult. After a short interval Keble gave "The Ancient Mariner" on the 16th ult., and New College "The May Queen" on the 21st ult. The excellence of performance varied, of course, considerably, but on some occasions the rendering was very meritorious. At Worcester the general finish of the chorus attracted attention, and Mr. Maybery sang the Master's music with effect. Few amateur tenors would have essayed Mr. Peacock's task of singing the arduous solo work in "Columbus," and fewer still have carried it through with such success. Much of the choral portion of "The Ancient Mariner" was very well sung, Mr. Brown and Mr. Shadwell being also very satisfactory in the solo music; while the chorus in "The May Queen" was really first-rate. Colleges which adhered to the old style of programme were anxious to give some definite character to their performances. At both Pembroke and Magdalen English music was the idea of the evening. For instance, at the former, on the 16th ult., Mr. Tuckwell sang, and sang well, Purcell's little-known song, "Æolus, you must appear," and at the latter the Concert (on the 22nd ult.) mainly consisted of madrigals of the Elizabethan school, and glees by composers such as Arne and Callcott. This epitome, which might easily be three times as long, will give some idea of the progress of music at the older university. It is true a good deal remains to be done. Selections from "Norma," arranged for violin, cornet, and piano, should not be placed by the side of such music as that just enumerated. The golden rule set by New College, of allowing no encores, might well be followed elsewhere. The perfection of the part-singing at Magdalen was such as to reduce criticism to absolute silence, but why should four encores have been allowed to spoil the effect? Again, most musicians would rather have a great soprano scena omitted than hear an attempt made to sing it two tones lower. Still, with all these and such-like deductions, a musician on a holiday might easily find places where there would be less to interest and amuse him than in Oxford during a Summer Term.

A VERY interesting Concert was given at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the 22nd ult., by the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, established at Upper Norwood. That the above Institution is doing thorough and invaluable work in ameliorating the condition of the blind, and making them self-sustaining, was most practically shown on the occasion in question, for not only was the general performance so good that it would have done credit to any body of musicians, but, taking into consideration the difficulties under which the executants labour, the result may be regarded as little short of marvellous. A capital programme, consisting entirely of high-class music, had every justice shown to it. It is perhaps unnecessary to mention individually all who appeared, and it must suffice to quote only those brought to the fore. Miss Maggie Reece might be named as deserving warm praise for her singing of Leslie's "O Babe, my Son, my Saviour," and also Miss Amelia Campbell for her capable voice and intelligent phrasing—indeed, her delivery of "Rejoice greatly" was far above the average. Miss Carson appeared to advantage in Barnett's "Golden Gate," but she would do well to observe shades of tone and variety of expression a little more closely. A word of recognition should also be tendered to Mr. J. West for his dramatic rendering of the air, "Is not His word like a fire." Turning to the instrumentalists, mention should first be made of Master Alfred Hollins. Although quite a boy, he displayed the grasp and power over the pianoforte that can only be gained by long and arduous labour. Indeed, his playing of an Etude of Chopin was most brilliant, and deserving of the encore awarded it. The future of this youthful musician will be watched with interest. Mr. Samuel Allen performed Bach's Fugue in A minor very fairly, and the choir must be congratulated on their excellent part-singing. The Professors of the Institution, Messrs. Cummings, Hartvigson, and Hopkins, deserve the warmest acknowledgements for the able manner in which they have discharged their duties as musical instructors. An appeal for help is made by the Committee, as there is still room in the College for sixty more pupils, who cannot be received for want of means. It is to be hoped that the necessary funds will shortly be forthcoming, in order that this good Institution may be able to increase its usefulness, and further carry out its truly benevolent work.

THE third performance of the fifth season of Chamber Concerts given by Messrs. J. Ludwig and H. Daubert took place on Thursday evening, the 16th ult., at the Royal Academy Rooms, Hanover Square, when a programme of more than average interest was presented to an audience who, although not so large in numbers as might have been wished, were certainly thoroughly appreciative. That these concerts are most acceptable during the summer months, by supplying a want felt by lovers of chamber music, there can be but little doubt, and the concert-givers therefore should certainly be encouraged to still persevere in carrying out such an excellent scheme. The quartets selected for performance were Schubert's Op. 161, in D minor, and Beethoven's Op. 130, in A minor. Regarding the execution of the first much can be said in praise, Herr Ludwig playing most admirably, with pure tone and charming phrasing; and he also led with ready perception of the innermost thoughts and intentions of the composer. If any fault might be found with the performance as a whole, it was that the second violin and viola were often too much in the background, the first violin being at times a little too prominent. The lovely second movement of Schubert's Quartet, however, was played well-nigh to perfection; at its close the performers were heartily and deservedly applauded. Herr Ludwig contributed two solos: a. Nocturne in E major (Ernst), b. Variations in A minor (Paganini), in the first of which he appeared to greater advantage than in the second, where he somewhat failed to make the rapid and difficult passages quite clear; and the intonation at times was slightly faulty. Herr Ludwig, without doubt, excels rather in slow movements than in those requiring greater execution. Mdle. Rosenthal displayed a fine robust voice, but a rather defective style, in an Air from Handel's "Semele." Mr. J. B. Zerbini accompanied.

MR. W. HENRY THOMAS'S annual Concert, given at the Athenæum, Camden Road, on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult., attracted a large and select audience, drawn together not only by the personal popularity and musical attainments of the concert-giver, but by the announcement that the following eminent artists would assist: Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Misses Hoare, Price, Etta Poole, and Madame Enriquez; Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Abercrombie, Maybrick, Lewis Thomas, and Lazarus. With such well-known names it would be superfluous to dilate upon each item of the well-chosen programme; it will be sufficient to note the chief successes of the evening. Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, in excellent voice, delighted all hearers in Taubert's "Woodland Song." Responding to an encore, she gave Molloy's "Kerry Dance"; and was again heard in association with Madame Enriquez in Rubinstein's charming duet, "Song of the Summer Birds." The last-mentioned vocalist was likewise very favourably received, being called upon to repeat both her songs. A word of praise must also be given to Miss Hoare for her finished vocalization in Rossini's "Bel raggio"; and Mr. Rigby, in a new song by W. Carter entitled "The Vision," appeared in his best form. Mr. Abercrombie, in Handel's "Where'er you walk," and Mr. Maybrick in "The Warrior bold," were recipients of well-earned encores; and Mr. Lewis Thomas, in the "Midshipmite" (accompanied by the composer), secured plaudits that led to a repetition of the popular song. The concert-giver's share in the programme comprised the solos: a. Interlaken (Jaell), b. "Faust" (Jaell), and the Scherzo in B flat minor (Chopin). In each he asserted complete mastery over the key-board, and showed sound judgment with good taste. Mr. Lazarus played in Gade's "Fantasie-stück for piano and clarinet," the veteran clarinettist phrasing like the true artist he is.

In our April number we gave a list of the principal compositions to be performed at the Norwich Musical Festival, but were then only enabled to say that "new works" would be produced by Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. F. H. Cowen, and Mr. J. F. Barnett. We are now informed that Sir Julius Benedict's contribution is a Dramatic Cantata called "Graziella" (the words by Henry Hersee); Mr. Barnett's a Symphonic Poem, in four parts, called "The Harvest Festival" (with chorus and organ ad lib.); and Mr. Cowen's a Sacred Cantata called "St. Ursula" (the poem, founded on the old legend, by R. E. Francillon); all of which will be conducted by their respective composers. A Musical Ode called "The Sun Worshipers," by Arthur Goring Thomas (the words from the French of Casimir Delavigne, by Charles Scott); an Overture to Shakespeare's play "King Henry V.," by Walter Macfarren; and an Orchestral Suite by Mr. Eugene D'Albert, will also be given for the first time. In addition to the works named in our former notice Mendelssohn's music to "Athalie," J. S. Bach's Motett, "Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks," an Organ Concerto by Mr. E. Prout (to be performed by Dr. Bunnett), and Professor Macfarren's Overture to "St. John the Baptist" will be included in the programme. So excellent a selection of music—and more especially one so representative of British composers—has rarely been submitted to the audiences of any of our English Festivals; and Signor Randegger has every reason to be proud of his appointment as Conductor of so important a meeting. The Festival is announced to commence on Tuesday, October 11.

AN evening Concert was given on Tuesday, May 31, at St. James's Hall, by Mr. Santley, who was assisted by a number of eminent vocalists: Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Santley, Madame Patey, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Herbert Reeves, and Maybrick. Mr. Sims Reeves had intended to appear, but was unfortunately prevented from so doing by indisposition. The programme consisted mainly of popular ballads, and the pleased audience lost no opportunity of redemanding their favourite ditties, Madame Lemmens-Sherrington being obliged to repeat the "Kerry Dance," and Miss Santley the song by Miss M. V. White entitled "Es tanto lo que ti quiero." Madame Patey, as usual, made a great effect in Beethoven's "Creation" Hymn, and in the second part an equal success in "The Laird o' Cockpen," when as an encore she substituted for it "Auld Robin Gray." Mr. Lloyd was also encored in both his songs—"Sweethearts" and "Sally in our Alley." In each case he repeated the last verse. Mr. Herbert Reeves only contributed one song to the programme, Blumenthal's "My Queen," for which he was deservedly recalled. Mr. Maybrick, no less successful, repeated both his vocal efforts; and last, but not least, the concert-giver was compelled to yield to the applause of his admirers and appear again and again—indeed, besides giving three ballads he, in the place of Mr. Sims Reeves, indulged the auditors with their favourite old ditty, "Tom Bowling." The London Vocal Union added to the general interest of the Concert. Messrs. Sidney Naylor and Zerbini were most efficient Conductors.

THE Western Madrigal Society held their yearly dinner and gathering of friends on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult., on which occasion a large number of members and guests, including many well-known members of the musical profession, sat down to dinner in the large hall of the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen Street, and afterwards joined in the performance of the following specimens of the madrigal school, to which it is the rule of the Society closely to adhere on all occasions: "Die not, fond man," J. Ward, 1660; "If love be blind," T. Bateson, 1604; "Fair Oriana," J. Hilton, 1601; "When April decked," L. Marenzio, 1580; "Flora gave me," J. Wilbye, 1598; "Dainty fine bird," O. Gibbons, 1612; "Smile not, fair Amaryliss," G. Pizzoni, 1580; "Take heed, ye shepherd swains," Pearsall, 1847; "The nymphs and shepherds," G. Marson, 1598; "When Chloris heard," J. Wilbye, 1598; "Lady, see on every side," L. Marenzio, 1570; "Sweet Philomel," J. Ward, 1613; "Lo, where with flow'ry head," T. Morley, 1597; "While the bright sun," W. Byrd, 1580; "All creatures now are merry," J. Benet, 1598; "The Waits," J. Saville, 1667. The treble parts were sustained by boys from the choirs of the Chapel Royal and St. Peter's, Eaton Square; the Conductor being Dr. J. F. Bridge.

A MEETING of the Council of Trinity College, London, which has just been reincorporated with extended powers under the Companies Acts, was held on the 17th ult. at the College, Mandeville Place, when the following gentlemen were elected members of the Council and Corporation: Sir Julius Benedict, Mr. J. B. Calkin, Rev. Gordon Calthrop, Mr. F. H. Cowen, Mr. W. G. Cusins, Sir George Elvey, Dr. Hueffer, Mr. Warwick Jordan, Mr. George Mount, Sir Herbert Oakeley, Mr. Hubert Parry, Mr. Maybrick, Dr. W. H. Stone, and Mr. Radcliff. It was stated at the meeting that the number of candidates entered for the local examinations in elementary musical knowledge, being held on the same day (June 17), amounted to 3,831, exclusive of the returns from the colonial centres; and that, in addition to these, nearly 1,200 candidates had been separately examined in practical music during the past twelve months.

A CONCERT was given by Mr. Robert Beringer on Wednesday evening, the 8th ult., at the Royal Crystal Palace Hotel, in aid of the Norwood Cottage Hospital, which was a great success. The programme, opened with a selection from the Trio in E flat major (Op. 40), Brahms, by Mr. Robert Beringer (pianoforte), Mr. Manns (violin), and Mr. Wendtland (horn), the rendering of which was simply perfect. This was followed by the solo, quartet and chorus, "The Post Horn," composed by the concert-giver, sung by the German chorus of male voices, "Liederklänge," and very warmly received. Mr. Herbert Reeves gave an excellent rendering of Blumenthal's song, "The Requital," and "Trust as far as you can see," composed expressly for him by Mr. George Fox. Mr. Oscar Beringer contributed Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor (Op. 31), for which he was much applauded; and Mr. Manns was highly successful in his violin solo, "Meditation on Bach's Prelude" (No. 1 in C major), Gounod. Part II. consisted of Abt's Operetta, "Cinderella," the solos in which were well sung by Miss Annie Powell, Miss Eleanor Burnett, Miss Workman, the Misses F. Rothwell and M. Pottinger. Mr. Robert Beringer conducted, and Miss Pottinger, Mr. Alfred J. Eyre, and Herr G. Müller were the accompanists.

MR. CHARLES GARDNER gave his sixteenth annual Matinée Musicale at the Marlborough Rooms, Regent Street, on Tuesday, the 14th ult. It speaks well for Mr. Gardner's steady qualities as a professor of music that his annual gathering of pupils and friends should have been maintained through such a considerable period of time; and, judging by the assembly on the 14th, there is every likelihood of the custom continuing for years to come. Mr. Gardner chose for solos: a. "Rondo Piacerevole" (W. S. Bennett), b. Aria and Scherzo (R. Schumann), c. Etude, "Am Giessbach" (J. Raff), each of which he gave with the style of one who had taken every care to be thoroughly conversant with his subject, and certainly he appeared quite intent upon giving a thoughtful and well-mapped-out reading of the several pieces. In conjunction with MM. Ludwig and Albert he performed in a trio from his own pen. The vocalists were Mesdames Leonora Braham, Marian McKenzie, and Signor Gustave Garcia. Mr. Fountain Meen conducted.

ONE of the best Concerts yet given by the Hampstead Choral Society took place at the New Vestry Hall on May 27, under the able conductorship of Mr. Willem Coenen. The programme comprised Gounod's "Gallia," Macfarren's "May Day," Mozart's "Ave Verum," a soprano solo, with chorus, "Song of the Wind," (the solo excellently sung by Mrs. George Gill), composed expressly for the Society by Gertrude Hine, and deservedly applauded; a choral composition, with alto, tenor, and bass solos, called "Lazarus," by Mr. Coenen (the solos carefully rendered by Miss L. G. Browne, Mr. W. Egerton Hine, and Mr. T. J. Grylls)—which created a marked effect with the audience—and Romberg's Toy Symphony. The solo vocalist in the "May Day" was Miss H. Sinclair, who was highly successful in the song with a burden, "Beautiful May." The accompaniments were, as usual, extremely well played by Miss Amy Gill at the pianoforte, and Mr. H. M. Higgs at the harmonium. It is announced that the Society will commence its fourth season in October next.

A FESTIVAL will be held at the Church of St. Peter, Eaton Square, on Wednesday next, the 6th inst., at five p.m. There will be a full orchestra and augmented choir, Dr. Bridge presiding at the organ, and Mr. W. de M. Sergison, Organist of the church, acting as Conductor. Before the commencement of Service the slow movement from Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor will be played by the orchestra; and the anthem, which is to be Spohr's "God, Thou art great," will be preceded by Mendelssohn's Overture to "Athalia," in which the orchestra will be strengthened by the addition of a harp. We must not omit to mention that the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, composed by Mr. C. Harford Lloyd for last year's Three Choirs' Festival at Gloucester, and then performed in MS., will on this occasion be heard for the first time in London, and, indeed, for the first time, we believe, since the occasion for which it was written, it having only just been published.

THE disappointment of the public in not hearing Mr. Sims Reeves at the Concert advertised for the 15th ult., and again at that of the 22nd, was, we are convinced, fully shared by the vocalist himself, who has always made the most strenuous efforts to appear when announced. The "Messiah" and "Elijah"—the two works prepared for the Concerts named—are about the greatest popular favourites; and had Mr. Reeves not had a relapse which prevented the possibility of his keeping his engagement, notwithstanding the operation which he has undergone, we are certain that he would have sung all the music set down for him. The Oratorios have taken place as advertised, Mr. E. Lloyd and Mr. W. H. Cummings supplying the place of Mr. Reeves; and the announcement of the resumption of these farewell performances "at a later period" will doubtless be received with unmixed pleasure.

ON the evening of Ascension Day a Special Choral Service was celebrated in St. Sepulchre's Church. An augmented choir of upwards of fifty voices rendered the music in an excellent manner. The Service commenced with an introductory voluntary. The Rev. T. Pugh, M.A., Curate, intoned the prayers. The proper psalms were sung to single chants by Cooke, Ouseley, and Rimbault; and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was the setting in A by Dr. Stainer. A feature of the Service was the sacred cantata composed by Mr. J. Loaring, F.C.O., as an exercise for the degree of Mus. Bac. The performance of this work, which consists of eight movements, was especially good, and evidenced careful rehearsal. The solo parts were sung by members of the church choir. After the Service Mr. Loaring performed several selections on the grand organ.

HERR RICHTER has already announced that next season he will give nine Concerts at St. James's Hall, and that for the proper rendering of the Wagner compositions the solo singers and chorus of the German Opera will be secured. The programmes will include Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, Brahms's "Deutsches Requiem," Liszt's "Granter Messe," and selections from Wagner's "Rheingold," "Walküre," "Siegfried" and "Götterdämmerung." The Concerts will be given in May and June, 1882; and, with such exceptionally interesting programmes, there can be little doubt of their success. We understand that the Richter Concert Provincial Tour, with an orchestra of 100 performers, will take place during the months of October and November of the present year; Herr Richter Conductor, and Herr Hermann Franke Director.

THE Second Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music in the University of Oxford will commence on Tuesday, October 11, at ten a.m., in the Schools. In addition to the usual subjects, there will be required a critical knowledge of the full scores of—1. Mendelssohn's "Athalia"; 2. Handel's "Alexander's Feast." Candidates are required to bring the scores with them. The Examination for the degree of Doctor in Music will commence at the same time and place. Each of the above Examinations will occupy at least two days. Candidates whose exercises have been approved, and who propose to offer themselves for either of these Examinations, are required to give in their names to Mr. George Parker, the Clerk of the Schools, on or before October 8, to pay the statutable fee of £2, and to exhibit their "testamur" of having passed the previous Examination.

ON Tuesday, the 7th ult., Mr. A. Orlando Steed read his paper "On Beauty of Touch and Tone, in relation to the Piano and Organ," at the College of Organists. The paper read before the Musical Association on the 7th of February last was given with additional observations, all of which were marked by much thought and sound judgment. Mr. James Higgs ably occupied the chair, and after the lecture made some excellent remarks, and joined the lecturer, Messrs. C. Pearce, Wells, and C. Herbert in a discussion upon the paper.

MR. J. H. A. HICKS has recently been presented by the Rev. J. O. Fellowes with a handsome gold watch "as a token of esteem, and as a recognition of valuable services rendered by presiding gratuitously at the harmonium, at Trinity Chapel, John Street, Edgware Road."

HERR MARCEL HERWEGH, a young violinist from Stuttgart, gave an evening Concert at Steinway Hall on Saturday, the 11th ult. Herr Herwegh appeared at his best in his solos, especially in the first Concerto of Paganini; but we should have been pleased to see more care bestowed on the first and last numbers of the programme, viz., Trio by Dvorák, and Fantasia on the opera "Ilka," by Bülow and Singer. In both cases Herr Laistner, a pianist of the modern German school, played the pianoforte part in a highly artistic and brilliant manner. Special features of the programme were the arias and songs given by Madame Ilma di Murska, and other vocal pieces by Madame Vogri and Miss Arnim. Herr Carl Weber acted as Conductor in his usual efficient manner.

A CONCERT was given at the Royal Academy Rooms, Hanover Square, on Thursday evening, the 23rd ult., by Herr Heino Hugo. The attendance was unfortunately very scanty, but those present, however, appeared in a mood to enjoy what was presented to them. If we mistake not Herr Hugo is new to London audiences, and it cannot but be a matter for regret that this gentleman should have put off his coming amongst us until his voice had lost much of the freshness of youth. Amongst other songs Herr Hugo essayed "Non più andrai," but failed in a sensible degree to catch the spirit of the buffa aria. The following artists assisted the bénéficiaire: Mdles. Liebhards, Dukas-Van Noorden, Carlotta Wilmers, MM. Ludwig, Ch. Davison, and Bonawitz.

A FESTIVAL Service was held at the Church of SS. Augustine and Faith, Watling Street, E.C., on Thursday evening, the 2nd ult. The choir of the church received valuable assistance from the boys of St. Paul's Cathedral, who, before the commencement of Divine Service, sang the three-part chorus for treble voices, "He in tears that soweth," from Hiller's "Song of Victory." The setting chosen for the Canticles was that in B flat by Henry Smart (composed for the Sons of the Clergy Festival in 1870), and the anthems were Handel's "Lift up your heads" after the third collect, and Spohr's "God, Thou art great" at the conclusion of the Service, each of which was efficiently rendered.

MISS HELEN HOPEKIRK, the rising Scotch pianist who has appeared so successfully at the Crystal Palace and elsewhere, gave a morning Concert at 22, Park Square, Regent's Park, on Wednesday, the 15th ult., by kind permission of the Misses Gerstenberg. Miss Hopekirk played the Symphonische Etuden by Schumann, and other pieces by Liszt, Chopin, Rubinstein, &c., her style and execution being alike excellent, and was effectively assisted, in a Sonata for violin and piano by Beethoven, by Herr Gompertz, who also won great applause in his solo. Mdle. Friedländer, Madame Marie Klauwell, and Mr. Thorndike shared the appreciation of the numerous audience in their respective vocal pieces.

At the annual Commemoration Festival held at St. Mary's Church, Hornsey Rise, on Monday evening, the 20th ult., a selection from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was performed by the Church choir, augmented by the choir of Christ Church, Crouch End. The soprano solos were excellently rendered by Miss Drew and Mrs. Miller, and the choruses were given with precision and effect by the united choirs. Hopkins's Evening Service in F was also sung, and Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus closed the Service. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Gordon Calthrop, Vicar of St. Augustine's, Highbury, and the music was under the direction of Mr. T. H. Bunbury, Organist of the Church.

THE North London Philharmonic Society gave its final Concert of the season on Monday evening, the 20th ult., at the Athenæum, Camden Road, N. The programme included J. F. Barnett's Cantata "The Ancient Mariner," Prout's "Hail to the Chief," and Eaton Faning's "Song of the Vikings." Solos were given by Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Amy Dickson, R.A.M., Mr. George Knight, and Mr. R. J. Charles Davis. Mr. H. Rea was leader of the orchestra, and Messrs. A. A. Yeatman and J. Tunstall presided respectively at the pianoforte and harmonium. Mr. Henry J. B. Dart was, as usual, the Conductor. The hall was well filled.

THE "Jubilee Service" in celebration of the fiftieth year of the work of King's College, London, was held at Westminster Abbey on Tuesday evening, the 21st ult., in the presence of a very large congregation. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to the setting by J. C. Bridge, the Anthem being Bach's "Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks." The "Hallelujah" Chorus was sung after the sermon. The choir consisted of 150 voices, and was conducted by Professor W. H. Monk, Dr. Bridge acting as Organist, and the Precentor (the Rev. S. Flood Jones) intoning the Service. The Bishop of Durham preached the sermon.

THE death of Mr. Thomas Bedmore, on the 9th ult., at the early age of 48, renders the organistship of Lichfield Cathedral vacant. The deceased gentleman was formerly a chorister in Lichfield Cathedral, afterwards Assistant Organist there, and was ultimately appointed Organist in 1864. Possessed of much energy, he well maintained the efficiency of the Lichfield services. He was an excellent organ-player, and had written several effective compositions for the Church service; he was also intimately connected with the great Lichfield festivals, and was a Conductor of much practice. He was buried on the 13th ult. in the Cathedral-yard.

MISS ANNIE MATTHEWS (formerly a pupil of Madame Worrell) gave her second Concert on Tuesday evening, May 31, at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, before a tolerably numerous audience. The bénéficiaire's contributions were praiseworthy given, and elicited warm manifestations of approval. The remaining vocalists were Madame Adeline Paget, Misses Annie Sinclair, Maud Longhurst, and Edith Daniel; Messrs. J. D. Henderson, H. Horscroft, and A. Caink. Flute and pianoforte soli were respectively contributed by Mr. C. Spencer West and Mr. Turle Lee.

At the anniversary meeting of the London Society for Teaching the Blind to Read, held at Willis's Rooms on May 27 (Octavius E. Coope, Esq., M.P., in the chair), an excellent selection of music was performed, under the able direction of Mr. Edwin Barnes, the Society's Conductor. The pianoforte performance was especially good; and the choir, which was small, owing to so many of the pupils having left for good appointments, evidenced the effect of careful and judicious training.

THE annual distribution of awards to students of the South-east District College, Kennington Park, was held at Hawkstone Hall on Thursday evening, the 23rd ult. Commendable proficiency in part-singing and pianoforte-playing was displayed, and several certificates were given for knowledge of musical theory, reflecting credit upon the teaching of Mr. W. H. Holmes, Organist of All Saints', South Lambeth, who has succeeded Dr. Bradford as Professor of Music at this institution.

WE have much pleasure in calling attention to the "Practical Tone Ladder," invented by the Rev. C. S. Bere, which appears to us admirably suited for its purpose—that of adapting the immovable Doh to the movable Tonic. There can be little doubt that the inventor of this contrivance will be amply rewarded for his trouble by the extensive sale of his ingeniously constructed little card, which has already received the approbation of many eminent musicians.

A MILITARY Service was held, under the auspices of the Guild of the Holy Standard, at St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 15th ult. The music was entirely Gregorian, and the effect of the vast body of voices, in the hymns especially, was very striking. The Glorias, Magnificat, and Te Deum produced a great effect, these parts of the Service being accompanied by drums, in addition to the organ. The Service was very successful throughout.

ON Hospital Sunday the "Messiah" was performed at Brompton Church, under the direction of Mr. Theodore Drew, who presided at the organ. The soloists were the Viscountess Folkestone, Miss Vansenden, Miss Coward, Mr. Redfern Hollins, and Mr. R. Coward; and the choruses were given with much effect by Mr. Drew's choir. After the Oratorio a collection was made for the Hospital Sunday Fund.

MISS ADA TOLKIEN gave her first Concert at the Holborn Town Hall on the 23rd ult., assisted by Miss José Sherrington, Miss P. Featherby, Messrs. H. Guy, Thurley Beale, and H. Horscroft (vocalists), and Mr. Howard Reynolds (solo cornet). The concert-giver was very successful in her selections, a new song, "Elsie," by Gabriel Davis, being encored. Mr. Turle Lee and Mr. A. Tolkien officiated as Conductors.

THE Annual Festival Service in connection with the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel was held in Westminster Abbey on Thursday evening, the 23rd ult. The music, which was undertaken by the Choir of the Lay Helpers' Association, included C. E. Miller's Evening Service in A, and Dr. Stainer's Anthem "O clap your hands." The Bishop of Durham was the preacher, Dr. Bridge the Organist, and Mr. W. S. Hoyte the Conductor.

THE closing Concert of the Paddington Chapel Choral Union took place on Tuesday, May 31. The first part of the programme comprised Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day," and the second was miscellaneous. The Conductor was Mr. J. H. Moon, and Mr. H. G. Holmes accompanied. Mr. Windeyer Clark gave a pianoforte solo, which was well received.

MR. J. G. CALLCOTT has resigned the post of Organist of St. Stephen's Church, Westminster, which he has held for over thirty years, having been the only organist appointed since the founding of the church by the Baroness Burdett-Coutts. Mr. Callcott has just been awarded a medal for services rendered as accompanist to Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir during its visit to Paris in 1878.

THE Midsummer Examinations for Associateship and Fellowship of the College of Organists take place on Wednesday and Thursday next, the 6th and 7th inst., commencing at ten a.m. each day. Full particulars may be obtained from the hon. secretary, at the College, 95, Great Russell Street, W.C.

MR. EDWARD FOSKETT's new poem, "Harold Glynde," which has been set to music as a Cantata by several well-known composers, will be performed at the Crystal Palace on the 12th inst. The Rev. Canon Fleming, B.D., has consented to give the readings on the occasion.

A NEW Cantata, entitled "Ruth," has been specially written by Mr. A. R. Gaul for the Festival Choir of the Birmingham Sunday-School Union, and will be first performed at the next annual gathering of the Choir at the Town Hall, Birmingham.

MR. A. C. MACKENZIE'S "Burns" was played at Zurich on May 29, under the direction of F. Hegar, and again at Magdeburg during the past month, each time with much success.

WE understand that the select choir of the South London Choral Association has already been engaged by Mr. Boosey for the next series of Ballad Concerts at St. James's Hall.

MR. WILLIAM LEMARE announces a fourth series of Organ Recitals at the Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on Saturday evenings from October to Christmas.

REVIEWS.

Il Melodramma in Italia, dal 1600 sino ai nostri giorni. Di Pietro Raffaelli. [Florence: G. G. Guidi, 1881.]

THE critical views entertained by an accomplished Italian letterato concerning the rise and progress of the melodrama of his native country will command, à priori, the attention of all interested in the general historical aspects of the art. The above volume represents in a collective form a series of articles originally published in L'Armonia (a music journal founded in 1856 at Florence for the purpose of aiding a desired musical reform in Italy); and Signor Guidi, the editor, has acted judiciously in thus rescuing from comparative oblivion an interesting contribution to the history of a subject which has been, as yet, but imperfectly ventilated. We should add at once that the term melodramma, as here employed, signifies the drama intended for musical composition, i.e., the libretto; but the latter expression being of comparatively modern adoption, the author, taking his starting-point from the origin of opera, viz., the Dramma per musica, is perfectly justified in making use of the former more comprehensive and, let us add, more dignified title. While passing cursorily, yet systematically, over the vast field of his chosen investigation—fixing and grouping around the heads of representative librettists the various phases of development, decadence, and resuscitation of an art but imperfectly practised at the best of times—Signor Raffaelli displays both excellent literary judgment and an intimate acquaintance with the more prominent dramatic productions of his country which have formed the vehicle for musical illustration, from the time when Ottavio Rinuccini wrote his "Dafne," set to music by Jacobo Peri, and produced in 1594 at Rome, to within two decades of the present era. The volume is divided into ten chapters, headed respectively: "Dal Rinuccini allo Stampiglia," "Apostolo Zeno e Metastasio," "Frugoni," "Parini, Coltellini, Calsabigi e Monti," "Goldoni," "Giambattista Casti e altri scrittori," "Tottola e Berio," "Felice Romani," "Salvatore Cammarano," "Andrea Maffei, Bidera, Solera, Piave." In the four last-mentioned libretto-writers, among whom will be noticed the author of "Rigoletto" and "Traviata," Signor Raffaelli discerns (and we entirely agree with him) the certain signs of corruption and decadence of the art of the musical playwright in Italy; Bidera (who wrote "La Gemma di Vergy" for Donizetti) being contemptuously styled "un certo Signor Bidera." Felice Romani, the prolific author of "Norma," "La Sonnambula," "L'Elisire d'Amore," and some 170 other libretti, on the other hand, obtains his share, and more than his share, of praise, by being enthusiastically called, "Il Metastasio dei nostri tempi." It would lead us too far were we to enter here into the merits of this and other questions raised by the perusal of these interesting pages. We will only add that, apart from his immediate subject, the author does not display any very conspicuous acquaintance with specifically musical history. Thus, on page 2, he still designates Guido d'Arezzo as the inventor of the present (mensurale) system of notation—an assertion the fallacy of which modern research has long since demonstrated, the invention in question having, in fact, been made about a century later. Again, in severely blaming Calsabigi for having in his "Orfeo" (written at Vienna for Gluck) done violence to Greek mythology by calling Amor to the rescue in order to avert the tragic conclusion of the drama; the author overlooks the fact that such a concession was due to the prevailing taste of those days, when all opera was expected to end happily. Not the least interesting portion of these historical studies are the extracts given from the more prominent libretti of which mention is made, and the critical analyses to which they are subjected. That the writer can be outspoken enough when occasion serves may be inferred from his comment following upon the quotation of some absurd lines occurring in the libretto of Rossini's "Mosè," where he exclaims, "These cannot possibly be called verses, and he who has written this assuredly possessed the ears of an ass." We might quote a multiplicity of examples from other well-known libretti to which a similar remark might not inaptly be applied. We must not forget, however, that in judging the poetical or dramatic value of any given melodramma, in the sense in which Signor Raffaelli employs the term, at least as much responsibility ought to attach to the composer who chose it for musical illustration as to the dramatist who wrote it. And, indeed, in view of the comparative indifference with which not a few of the Italian maestri have regarded the work of the latter, and the domineering way in which, especially in the past century, they were wont to treat the poor playwright, we can sympathise with the words which Casti, in his burlesca entitled "Prima la musica e poi le parole," causes a distracted poet to exclaim:—

Meglio è far il Pulci nella
Che il poeta di teatro!

An indication of the historical data attaching to the different chapters would have been desirable, but these may be easily supplied by the reader by referring to the existing dictionaries of the art.

All' Ombra de' Palmizi. Bozzetto orientale per orchestra. Di Vincelsao Fumi. [Florence: G. G. Guidi, 1881.]

WE have more than once drawn attention in these columns to the series of cheap and handy editions of works by old and modern Italian composers issued by the enterprising Florence firm, and including in their number, inter alia, those rare and interesting early music-dramas, viz., the "Euridice" both of Jacopo Peri and Giulio Caccini (two settings of the same poem by Rinuccini), in the reproduction of which Signor Guidi has rendered a special service to all students of art-history. Vincelsao Fumi's oriental sketch, "All' Ombra de' Palmizi," forms the latest addition to this collection, a work which met with a very good reception on the occasion of its first performance by the Società Orchestrale Fiorentina, the composer having already previously become favourably known by his orchestral fantasia entitled "Il Sogno di Gretchen," and other pieces. The present composition, although not exhibiting any very novel or striking feature, is a pleasant and melodious movement, scarcely suggestive, however, of the oriental character to which it lays claim, unless this should be looked for in the frequent and effective introduction of passages for the harp. It is, moreover, well scored for an orchestra of moderate dimensions, and as such recommends itself for performance in the concert-room, where it cannot fail to be appreciated. The almost microscopically small print of these score-editions might, we should think, have been avoided at a trifling increase in the cost, but cannot now, for the sake of uniformity, be remedied in the future volumes to be added to this otherwise most excellent series.

The Human Voice and Connected Parts. A practical book for Orators, Clergymen, Vocalists, and others. By Dr. J. Farrar, L.R.C.P., Edin., &c. [Marshall, Japp, and Co.]

THE larger portion of this book appeals perhaps more to the reviewing department of a medical, than a musical, journal; but there is very much to interest all who study not only to train the voice, but to keep it in perfect order when it is trained; for when, even by following the rules laid down, disease cannot be warded off, we are here told the proper course to follow, and the very best remedies to apply. In his preface the author says: "To public speakers, vocalists, &c., much pains have been taken to make the book a kind of medical guide, or companion—a sort of vocal vade mecum, to which reference may be made for information relating to the minor troubles, and some of the graver diseases to which the vocal organs are liable, as well as the treatment of the more common ailments." No doubt there are many works of the same kind; but we are bound to say that we have never met with one where the descriptions of the whole vocal apparatus are treated in so popular a manner. The chapter devoted to the explanation of the voices and their compass contains some very good hints as to the management of the various parts concerned in vocalisation: "Over-fatigue of the muscles of the larynx," we are told, "as by excessive and prolonged talking, public speaking, singing, shouting, &c., is a common cause of voice weakness. It is not so much the exercise of the muscles, as the length of time they are continuously under it, that produces the mischief. The strength of a horse becomes best developed, not by putting the animal to a work of one unvarying strain, but to up-hill and down hill labour—that is, by great exertion relieved by complete rest. And the muscles of the larynx obey the same laws that govern any other muscle, wherever situated. Over-use, moreover, produces a congested condition of the lining membrane of the vocal apparatus, a state of matters which generally requires the application of special means for its removal, in addition to complete rest of the larynx." Few persons are, we believe, aware how very important it is for the preservation of the health that exercise of the respiratory organs should be constantly practised; and Dr. Farrar tells us that by well-directed singing exercise, or by blowing upon some wind instrument, the "vital capacity" may not only be kept up to the average, but may be actually increased. And respecting this "blowing upon wind instruments," we have so many erroneous ideas that we cannot resist quoting from the book of Dr. Burg (an extract from which is given in the volume before us), a French physician, who is a most ardent advocate for this kind of exercise: "Many philanthropists, on seeing our young military musicians wield enormous wind instruments, have sorrowed over the few years the poor fellows would have to live. Well, they are mistaken. All the men whose business it is to try the wind instruments made at the various factories, before sending them off for sale, are, without exception, free from pulmonary affections. I have known many who on entering upon this calling were very delicate, and who, nevertheless, though their duty obliged them to blow for hours together, enjoyed perfect health after a certain time. I am myself," he continues, "an instance of this. My mother died of consumption; eight children of hers fell victims to the same disease, and only three of us survive, and we all three play wind instruments." Amongst the subjects treated of in Dr. Farrar's volume, the subject of tight-lacing receives a fair share of attention; and as this is a very important matter to those who aspire to become vocalists, we recommend it to their serious attention. Assuredly the two illustrations in this book—one representing the natural figure, and the other the artificial one, produced by the pernicious habit alluded to—needs no further comment to ensure conviction in the mind of any reasoning being. We may add that the work contains thirty-nine illustrations, all of which are executed with the utmost accuracy, and that in every respect no pains have been spared to realise the author's desire that it should be made "a really practical and serviceable book."

How faithful are thy branches (The Hemlock Tree). Song. Words by Longfellow. Music by R. O'Leary Vinning. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE composer of this song adheres to her plan of helping to form a new market, rather than of writing for a market already formed. True it is that very many specimens are now to be found of the genuine artistic workmanship which distinguishes all her vocal works, but they are the exception rather than the rule; and we are glad therefore to welcome any song which may be accepted as a protest against the "prettiness" of the day. The refined and sympathetic setting of Longfellow's words assigned to the vocalist is so materially aided by the pianoforte part that the two must become inseparable in performance; and we therefore counsel all young ladies who are trained to consider the accompanist as a servile slave, instead of an artistic companion, to avoid attempting a composition which we assure them will demand qualities which they have not yet cultivated. Amongst the many striking points in this song we may particularly mention the treatment of the phrase commencing "The meadow brook," where the semiquavers appear for the first time in the accompaniment; and must especially commend the manner in which the temptation is resisted of imitating the nightingale when the name of a bird so fatally suggestive to immature composers first occurs. In the opening bar of the symphony it would be better, we think, that the quaver should precede the two crotchet rests, and also that the grouping of the notes should decisively indicate a broken bar in 3-4 time; we have known even experienced vocalists puzzled where the quantity, rather than the rhythm, is presented to the eye.

Cross and Crown. Sacred Song. With Pianoforte Accompaniment (Organ or Harmonium ad lib.). Words by Edward Oxenford. Composed by A. C. Mackenzie. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE so constantly receive songs termed "sacred" merely from the character of the words, that it is a pleasure to meet with one where the religious feeling of the text is sympathetically reflected in the music. Mr. Mackenzie is rapidly earning his fame in secular works, which have received recognition abroad as well as at home; and, if we may judge from the composition before us, we confidently predict that in the setting of sacred text—a much severer test, by the way—he will materially add to his reputation. "Cross and Crown" is a well-considered song throughout; and, although extremely effective, does not appear written for effect. The triplet accompaniment, against the even notes in the voice part, commencing with the words "For though thy cross a burden be," gives much eloquence to the phrase; and the lengthening of the final line, which expresses the leading feeling of the song, with the appropriate variations of harmony, may also be warmly commended. The organ or harmonium accompaniment will materially aid the effect of the composition; and as the latter instrument is now to be found in many drawing-rooms, we predict for this latest song of one of the most promising composers of the day a large sale and correspondingly wide appreciation.

My Darling's Home. A Mother's Story. Song. Written and composed by Michael Watson.

[Marriott and Williams.]

THE many "darlings" who bring light and love into the homes of English mothers are always pleased to read in the healthy domestic literature of the time those records of childish days indelibly associated with the parental abode—the little world in which, almost unconsciously, they are trained for the larger world outside. But if by chance, they should hear this "Mother's Story," they will find that in music it has become the custom to glorify rather the death than the life of children, and may rest assured that when they hear of a boy with "curls of gold," they will, as in the song before us, assuredly find that he will be "laid low," to an appropriately deep note, and "rest with the angels," surrounded by chords in arpeggio. This is scarcely a method of attracting young people towards vocal music, and we should be sorry to believe that even their elders would like to sing such morbidly pathetic lucubrations in the presence of those whom they love. Yet there must be a market for these songs; and we can only presume that as those artists paint empty cots and empty chairs who cannot paint full ones, so do many vocalists select songs which speak directly to the feelings of an audience without the aid either of music or poetry. Compositions of this kind will, therefore, doubtless continue to be published; but they appeal not to the notice of an artistic journal.

FOREIGN NOTES.

WE have received the annual official Report of the progress of choral singing in the municipal schools of Turin, the only town in Italy, it appears, where vocal teaching occupies a recognised and organised position in elementary classes. Under the zealous and experienced guidance of Signor Giulio Roberti most satisfactory results have, within the space of a few years, been achieved in this direction, as was shown by a special public performance given on the 19th ult. at the Vittorio Emanuele Theatre of Turin. Our correspondent describes the interesting festivity in the following words: "On Sunday (June 19) the pit of the Vittorio Theatre was filled with school-children of both sexes to the number of 2,200, while the remainder of the building, consisting of two spacious galleries, was occupied by their friends and relatives; the Sindaco, with the other members of the municipal council, being seated on the stage, together with the invited guests. It was a pretty sight to see the eager young faces watching the wand of the conductor, Cav. G. Roberti, evidently enjoying their 'first appearance in public,' and singing with might and main. Kücken's song 'The young recruit' appeared to be a great favourite with them, and, having to repeat it, they did so with great gusto; but on the part of the audience the palm was given to the last number in the programme, a choral piece entitled 'Il canto del giovane ginnastico,' by G. Roberti, accompanied by the civic band. All the children present, it should be added, had written out their own vocal parts from the dictation of their respective teachers. The proceedings closed with an appropriate speech of the Sindaco, which was received with great applause, and will, I hope, be remembered, for it is high time that singing should be popularised among the youth of this country." We, on our part, congratulate Signor Roberti upon the success with which his untiring efforts in the direction of reform of this and other branches of music-culture in Turin have so far been attended, and which—as we gather from an article contained in a leading music journal recently forwarded to us from Germany—are also meeting with due recognition outside the boundaries of his native Italy.

Arrigo Boito's "Mefistofele" was recently again produced at the theatre La Scala of Milan, where some thirteen years ago the work had made a complete fiasco. Since that time the opera has been revised and abridged by the composer, and in this form is making the round of Europe. No wonder, then, that the Milanese are now, as we are told, enraptured with it, and that the maestro met with a most enthusiastic reception on the occasion referred to. The same composer's new opera, "Nerone," is to be performed, likewise at La Scala, during the Carnival season next year.

A series of historical concerts, in connection with the Music Exhibition now being held at Milan, was contemplated by the Conservatorio of that town; but, although the programmes had already been published, the interesting scheme had to be abandoned, in consequence of the Municipal Council refusing to grant the necessary funds.

The new opera, "Stella," by Auteri-Manzocchi, the production of which in Florence was noticed in our last number, has achieved a great success at Milan.

The annual meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein took place between the 9th and 12th ult., at Magdeburg. We append (in the usual column) the programmes of the Concerts given in connection with the event which are chiefly interesting as consisting, for the greater part, of compositions by the younger generation of musicians, not, as will be seen, of Germany alone. Franz Liszt took part in the proceedings.

The Berlin "Nibelungen" performances concluded with the fourth representation of the entire tetralogy, on May 29, amidst unabated enthusiasm on the part of a crowded audience, the poet-composer being again present on this occasion. There can be no doubt that the introduction into the capital, albeit through private enterprise, of Wagner's gigantic work has made a distinct mark upon Berlin musical life, the effects of which cannot fail to influence the future répertoire of the Royal Opera with regard to the recognition of the reformer's latest music dramas. At the latter establishment permission was granted to Herr Angelo Neumann to give a performance with his company of "Lohengrin," which took place on the 2nd ult. In connection with the Berlin performances of the tetralogy an amusing pamphlet has been published at the office of "Kladderadatsch," from the pen of Alex. Moszkowski, in which those well-known typical personages, "Schulze und Müller," convey their Philistine impressions of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" to their numerous acquaintance.

The State subvention granted by the French Chambers for the year 1882 amounts to 800,000 francs for the Grand-Opéra and 300,000 francs for the Opéra-Comique. The total receipts of the Grand-Opéra during last year were over 4,000,000 francs, which, however, failed to cover expenses. Under M. Vaucorbeil's (the present director) régime four operatic works have so far been added to the répertoire of the latter establishment, viz., "Aïda" (233,000 francs), "Comte Ory" (23,000 francs), "La Corrigane" (73,000 francs), and "Le Tribut de Zamora" (270,000 francs). The sums appended to each of these works represent the expenditure incurred in their mounting, and may in part explain the existing deficit, although, it should be added, in the result of the past year M. Halanzier, the former director, is still jointly responsible with his successor.

There is every probability of the Théâtre Lyrique being revived in the coming winter, under the auspices of M. Lamoureux, the former chef d'orchestre at the Grand-Opéra. The Lyrique will be entitled to a subvention of 250,000 francs, and will, it is supposed, devote itself in part to the bringing out of new operatic works by living French composers, of which there is an abundance in readiness.

A petition, signed by M. Camille Saint-Saëns and other influential musicians of Paris, has been presented to the French Government, advocating the introduction of obligatory musical instruction in the elementary schools of France.

Festive musical performances in honour of Franz Liszt were held on May 25 at Antwerp, under the direction of Pierre Benoit, and on May 29 at Bruxelles, under that of F. Servais. The programme on each occasion consisted almost exclusively of compositions by the honoured maestro; and the enthusiastic demonstrations, of which, during the last few months he has been the object in various continental towns, are said to have here reached their climax.

The town of Barcelona, as the readers of "Foreign Notes" are aware, has recently erected a handsome building intended for concert performances, chiefly orchestral, and which it honoured by the name of "Beethoven Hall." It might have been inferred from this that the profound orchestral works of the great master had obtained a certain popularity even among the light-hearted Spaniards. It is therefore somewhat disappointing to read in one of the local papers the following critical observations on the Eroica Symphony: "Here then we had the 'Heroic Symphony' of Beethoven, consisting of an allegro absolutely devoid of gaiety, a 'Funeral March'—and a veritable funeral march it is, capable of conducting you to the cemetery!—a scherzo, which has the merit of preceding the finale, and a finale, indeed, to which there seems to be no ending. Total, fifty-five minutes, watch in hand! Upon our honour, at that moment we could have wished it had been the Symphony in C minor, which at least would have terminated twenty minutes sooner. Listening to this 'sublime' composition, we have asked ourselves why it had been baptised 'Eroica.' Is it because a certain heroism be required to hear it out to the very end? In that case, the title would be plainly justified." While reproducing this amusing effusion of the Barcelona critic we cannot help, however, being reminded of that English one who—some fifty years ago, it is true—also sat "watch in hand" measuring the time occupied in the performance of the Ninth Symphony, and arriving at the conclusion that if "the repetitions be omitted and the chorus removed altogether" the symphony in question would have acquired a "produceable form."

A great Music-Festival was held at New York, extending from the 3rd to the 7th of May last, during which period Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum," Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," Berlioz's Requiem, Handel's "Messiah," fragments from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, and numerous other works, both ancient and modern, obtained a hearing under the direction of Dr. Leopold Damrosch, and with the co-operation of 1,200 vocalists and 250 orchestral members. Some ten thousand listeners, on an average, attended each of the performances, which are spoken of by competent critics as having been excellent in the highest degree. The members of the Oratorio Society of New York have since presented their able conductor with some valuable tokens of their esteem, and in commemoration of the event.

Professor Hubert, of the Moscow Conservatoire, has been elected to the post of director of that institution, lately vacated by the death of Nicolai Rubinstein.

The death is announced, at Paris, of M. Savard, professor at the Conservatoire, and author of several manuals of the theory of music much used in France.

CORRESPONDENCE.

GOVERNMENT GRANTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Kindly allow me a small space in your correspondence columns to answer the question of Mr. C. L. Williams, Organist of Llandaff Cathedral, which appeared in your last issue.

The Government professes to give a grant for the teaching of singing in elementary schools, and this so-called grant amounts, as Mr. Williams has heard, to over £100,000 per annum; but then it is paid for the instruction of over two millions of children, for whom it only provides one shilling a head, which is probably considerably less than Mr. Williams receives for teaching the "sons of gentlemen" with whose efficiency as choirboys he seems anxious to compare them.

There is, however, in reality no grant whatever for teaching music in elementary schools, the money which receives the name of the "Music Grant" being a part of the six shillings Average Attendance Grant, the amount of which has never varied for the last twenty years. Ten years ago the Government instituted a fine of one shilling a head on the average attendance for the neglect of music in elementary schools; and, when an outcry was raised against the invidious impost, the fine was abolished (!), and a shilling was taken from the long-established Average Attendance Grant and called a Grant for Music—a remarkably fine distinction without the slightest difference, for to all intents and purposes the music fine still exists.

Of course the teachers and managers of elementary schools were greatly to blame for allowing this piece of sharp practice to be played off upon them without making an emphatic protest against it; but there was not so much unity among them in those days as there is now, and what was everybody's business became nobody's; besides, the requirements were not excessive (only the singing of a few school-songs by ear), and the administration mild and lenient (principally on account of the inability of the inspectors to judge of the results); and as very few were in danger of losing the grant, the subject was allowed to drop.

Mr. Williams will see from this that the National School children he speaks of were quite up to the requirement of the Education Code in being able to sing by ear; and that they were even beyond it in their ability to sing in two parts. He will also see that the sum of money popularly supposed to be paid annually for this accomplishment, though great in the aggregate, is very small individually, and is thoroughly well earned by the teacher, even when the results are as small as those which came under his notice.

To the honour of the teaching profession, however, it must be said that the attainments of children in elementary schools are in this respect frequently very much in excess of the requirement, and where this is the case the work is done irrespective of any pecuniary considerations. All elementary teachers are not musicians in the scientific sense of the word, nor can it be expected that they should be so, since music is an art-science depending greatly for its development on natural capacity, and has always been an optional subject in schools of every grade; but they are all more or less trained to the appreciation of music, and are capable of teaching singing by ear, which, notwithstanding the opinion of Mr. Williams, is a very good way to foster the love of music in children; besides providing excellent training for voice and ear, and being to some extent a necessary preliminary to further progress. It is also a valuable aid to discipline, and a great relief from the ordinary school duties.

I am afraid Mr. Williams is guilty of the sin of ingratitude. It seems to me that he is under an obligation to the National School for supplying in some degree substitutes for his "sons of gentlemen" when off for their holidays. If he filled their places from another cathedral choir he would doubtless, even then, consider the substitutes far inferior to his own prodigies; and no wonder, when his experience with them leads him to the conclusion that "children will and can learn to read from notes easily and quickly on almost any system." In that case, however, politeness, and respect for the fraternity to which he belongs, together with a view to future favours, would probably have induced him to keep his opinion to himself; but, as it is only the National School children and their teachers who are in question, these considerations do not weigh with him.

It is to be hoped, from the account Mr. Williams gives, that the Llandaff Cathedral School differs from the generality of such institutions, in which, if report speaks truly, the character of the general education provided is scarcely such as to draw the "sons of gentlemen" to them, and would disgrace even a National School except in the one subject of vocal music.—Yours faithfully,
Elmhurst. W. W. PEARSON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Your correspondent Mr. Williams asks for information respecting the musical knowledge of National School children, and, as a schoolmaster and organist, perhaps I may throw a little light upon the subject.

It is too true that as a general rule they possess little or no knowledge of music; but it is not absolutely correct that a large sum of money is paid as a grant on behalf of those children who have "passed in vocal music." The fact is that a grant is paid on the average attendance, and this grant was originally given whether the children pretended to sing or not; but to encourage singing the Education Department now deducts one shilling for each child in average attendance if eight songs have not been learnt. They need not be "two-part ditties," for one part is quite as agreeable to the Department.

Now many schoolmasters are both able and willing to teach music, but they receive no real encouragement from the Department, which, rightly or wrongly, regards reading, writing, and arithmetic as the necessities of life, and music as one of its luxuries. Parents are anxious that their children should pass the examination, to qualify them for work, and, as no knowledge of music is required, they too regard it as an accomplishment which can be dispensed with. A woman in our parish was prosecuted for not sending her son to school, and she informed the magistrate that she objected to do so "because there was too much 'song-singing.'" Yet the time my pupils are engaged in "song-singing" does not exceed one hour per week! Very recently another woman, a member of the Salvation Army, wrote, asking me to excuse her child from the singing-lesson "because his conscience told him that he was offending his Heavenly Father by singing anything but sacred music." It is needless to say that such an absurd request was not granted.

It is a well-known fact that many Inspectors of Schools know little or nothing of music. As far as I can judge, my scholars have always satisfied our Inspector, but it is in vain that I look for one word of praise or blame in the last six annual reports. Is it then surprising that music is neglected?

Drawing is now taught in most elementary schools because the teacher is encouraged by grants, and the pupils by prizes and certificates from South Kensington; the chief condition being that the teacher must have obtained a second-grade certificate in the subject which he teaches. When music receives such a stimulus we shall find children ready to compete for prizes, and schoolmasters ready to teach them.—Yours, &c.,

ORGAN PEDALS ATTACHED TO PIANOFORTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In your issue for this month you publish a letter from a "Parish Organist" on the above subject. In reply I beg to inform him that I have a set of radiating concave pedals (CC to F) attached to a cottage pianoforte, which I find extremely useful, without damaging the instrument in the least. The price I paid for them (new), including fixing, &c., was £6 10s., and I may state that they are honestly worth £10. The action (which does not in the least disfigure the instrument) is that generally known as the "roller board" action, and has no gut or twine about it.

If your correspondent would like to write me on the subject he is at liberty to do so, and can obtain my address for the purpose on applying to you.—Yours truly,
VILLAGE ORGANIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In answer to your correspondent "Parish Church Organist," I have tried the cheap pedals advertised, and made them answer by using gut instead of twine, and substituting small brass pulleys for the eyes. With the pulleys there is hardly any friction. I could not obtain any small enough in London, but procured them from Birmingham. If they cannot be easily adapted to the first row under the keys, large eyes could be used there, the friction being chiefly in the other row. The gut should be thin, and can occasionally be oiled. I use them constantly, and find them answer perfectly.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

AUCKLAND, N. Z.—Mr. Gordon Gooch gave a Concert on Monday, March 28, at the Choral Hall, under the patronage of His Worship the Mayor and Councillors, and the musical elite of Auckland. An excellent programme was provided, including part-songs and choruses, capitally sung by the members of Mr. Gordon Gooch's advanced singing class, under his conductorship. Vocal solos were contributed by Miss May Hastings, Mrs. Revitt, the Misses Lodder, Mrs. Stainer, Mr. Edmonson, and Mr. Wilson. In the second part of the programme Mr. Angelo Forrest played some pianoforte solos, and Mr. Slater, Organist of St. Mary's, was the accompanist. Mr. Gordon Gooch was highly successful in all his songs.

BARBADOS.—The new organ at St. Mary's Church was dedicated on Thursday, May 19, with a special Service, at which His Lordship the Bishop, the Rector of the parish, and several of the clergy, with a crowded congregation, were present. After an address by the Bishop there were Organ Recitals by Mr. Hoad, the Organist; Mr. Doorley, Organist of St. Leonard's; Mr. Bowen, Organist of St. Ambrose; and Mr. Cummings, Organist of the Cathedral. The organ is by Messrs. Hill and Son, London, and is pronounced by competent judges to be the best on the island; the case is of pitch-pine, varnished; the front pipes, which are handsomely decorated, are after the pattern of those on the organ at Keble College, Oxford; and it has two manuals, with eighteen stops and five composition pedals.

BEVERLEY.—One of the lancets in the north aisle of the choir at the Minster has just been filled with some very beautiful stained glass as a memorial to George Lambert and his son, the late G. J. Lambert, who were successively organists for a joint period of nearly a hundred years. The subject chosen is the "Te Deum," which is illustrated by three distinct groups, forming, however, one harmonious whole. In the upper portion is a seated figure of our Blessed Lord, surrounded by a choir of angels, in the centre are two angels playing on ancient organ-like instruments, and on either side are figures of Moses and the prophets, &c. The lower portion represents more especially the "Noble Army of Martyrs," bearing among them a scroll with the words "Holy, holy, holy." To the left in this lower group is a figure of St. Ambrose, who is traditionally said to have composed the "Te Deum" at the baptism of St. Augustine. The colours are rich and the drawing is extremely good, the whole work reflecting great credit on the artists employed, Messrs. Ward and Hughes, of London. The window being some sixteen feet from the floor, a brass plate, on a level with the eye, and bearing the following inscription, is fixed to the wall: "The window above is dedicated to the glory of God, and in loving memory of George Lambert, who died July 15, 1818, aged 68; also of George Jackson Lambert, his son, who died January 24, 1880, aged 85. They were successively Organists of the Minster, the former forty-one, the latter fifty-seven years."

BIDEFORD.—The members of the Amateur Musical Society, under the leadership of Mr. C. Smale, gave a Concert in aid of the Bideford Public Free Library in the Music Hall on Monday evening, May 30. The programme included secular and sacred compositions, and was most efficiently carried out. Mrs. C. Smale was the accompanist. The singing of Miss Willis was very effective, and a piano and violin duet, by Mr. Wickham (Mayor of Bideford) and Miss Wickham, also elicited hearty applause. The rendering of the choruses, more especially Handel's "O Father, whose almighty power" (Judas Maccabeus), showed the choir and orchestra to be well trained, and reflected credit on all concerned. Mendelssohn's 2nd Psalm formed an important part of the programme, the soprano solos and recitatives being taken by Miss Willis.

BIRMINGHAM.—Miss Clara Lilwall, a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music, gave a Concert at the Assembly Room, Royal Hotel, on Wednesday, the 1st ult. The first part consisted chiefly of pianoforte pieces, and was very diversified in character, including Bennett's Sonata, "The Maid of Orleans," Sydney Smith's "Ripples on the Lake," and fantasias on national airs. In the vocal portion Miss Lilwall was assisted by Mr. H. R. Bickley and Mr. Frank Duggan. Mr. Arthur Trickett was an able accompanist, and played with much effect in two duets with the concert-giver. On the 2nd ult., Mr. D. Firench Davis gave his annual Harp Festival. In addition to the band of thirty harps, played by amateurs, the executive comprised Madame Nouver, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Herbert Reeves (in place of Mr. Sims Reeves, indisposed), as vocalists; Mr. F. Ward, violin; Mr. Troman, mustel-organ; Miss Firench Davis, pianoforte; Mr. Sidney Naylor, accompanist; and Mr. J. C. Stevens, Conductor. The programme was of a popular character, and included several compositions by Mr. Davis for the band of harps, and a Trio for violin, harmonium, and harp. There was a good attendance, and the Concert passed off very successfully.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—A Concert was given on the 14th ult. at the Athenæum Hall by Mr. Roberts, assisted by the Misses Carreras, Earée, Borrow and Mr. Tietkins as vocalists, all of whom were very successful in their songs. Two pianoforte solos were contributed by Messrs. Coles and Sydenham, the latter being recalled for his performance of Liszt's "March from Tannhäuser." On the 16th ult. a very successful Concert was given by the Philharmonic Society. The band (under the leadership of Mr. Pratt, of Ipswich) was very efficient, Mozart's Symphony in D being admirably rendered. Mr. T. B. Richardson conducted with his usual skill and judgment, and Mrs. Ford presided at the pianoforte. The vocalists were Miss Challis and Mr. Frederic Pattle.

CHELMSFORD.—The third annual Festival in connection with the Association for the Improvement of Church Music was celebrated at St. Mary's Church on the 16th ult., in the presence of a crowded congregation. Mr. G. C. Martin, Mus. Bac., Oxon., of St. Paul's Cathedral, the Choirmaster of the Association, conducted the musical part of the service. Mr. F. R. Frye, Organist of St. Mary's, ably officiated at the organ, and played a few effective voluntaries before the service, the order of which was very much the same as at last year's festival, with the addition of the Te Deum, arranged to Gregorian melodies by Dr. Stainer. The accompaniments were reinforced by trumpets and trombones from the band of the Grenadier Guards. The processional hymn, in which the instrumentalists rendered good service in sustaining the pitch of the choir, was Laudes Domine—"When morning gilds the skies" (Barbary). The preces and responses were by Tallis, the proper psalms being sung to chants by Boyton Smith, Dr. Alcock, and Sir George Elvey. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to effective music by Dr. Stainer, and the anthem was Haydn's chorus from The Creation, "The heavens are telling." The hymn before the sermon was the fine old Austrian national hymn by Haydn, "Praise the Lord, ye heavens adore Him," and after the sermon Gounod's "On the Fount of Life eternal," which was sung with good effect. From a musical point of view the service was a decided advance on the Festival of last year, the singing, especially in the anthem, being alike praiseworthy for its precision and force, and the blending of the voices showing that very great pains had been taken in the preliminary practices and rehearsals both by the choir and the Choirmaster. Prayers were intoned by the Rev. T. J. Hearn, Precursor of the Association, the lessons being read by Canon Carey and the Rev. A. Pearson. The preacher was the Ven. Archdeacon Blomfield. The Benediction was pronounced by the Bishop of St. Albans. The offertory, in aid of the funds of the Association, amounted to £19 8s.

CROYDON.—The Croydon Church Choirs Union annual Festival was held on the 21st ult. The services consisted of a choral celebration at St. Saviour's Church at seven o'clock in the morning, and full choral evensong at the Parish Church at eight p.m. The music performed was, at the Morning Service, Office of the Holy Communion in C, by F. Cambridge, Organist of the Parish Church; and at the Evening Service, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Gadsby) in C; Anthem, the tenor solo, "In splendour bright," well sung by Mr. Hunt (in the absence of Mr. Shakespeare), the chorus, "The heavens are telling" (from The Creation), and the "Hallelujah" Chorus (from The Messiah). The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Nisbet, Canon of Norwich. The united choirs mustered about 250 voices, conducted by Mr. Cambridge. Mr. Balfour officiated at the organ. The entire arrangements of the Festival reflected great credit on the Conductor, Organist, and the energetic Secretary, Mr. Fred White, Choirmaster of St. Peter's Church.

EASINGWOLD.—The members of the Easingwold Choral Society gave a very satisfactory performance of Samson in the Public Hall on Friday, May 27. Miss Johnson presided at the piano. The Society's soloists were Miss Hicks, Miss Mullens, Dr. Witz, and Mr. J. E. Bannister, ably assisted by Mr. McCall and Mr. Macdonald, from York, and Miss Riley, all of whom were highly appreciated. The choruses on the whole went well, especially "Awake the trumpet's joyful sound," "Then round about the starry throne," "Fixed in His everlasting seat," and "Let their celestial concerts." Mr. Bensley conducted.

EASTBOURNE.—On Thursday evening, the 16th ult., the Eastbourne Musical Society concluded the season by a capital performance of Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah, before a large and attentive audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Penna, Miss Chatterton, Mr. Carter, and Mr. Bevan, assisted in the double quartet, "For He shall give His angels," by Mrs. Easter, Miss Ailchin, Mr. Easter, and Mr. C. Roper. The unaccompanied trio, "Lift thine eyes," was excellently rendered by Miss Penna, Mrs. Easter, and Miss Chatterton. The choruses were well sung, and the orchestra played the overture and accompaniments most effectively. Miss Roper contributed very efficient help at the piano, and Mr. Stephen Sangster at the harmonium. Dr. Sangster conducted.

ERDINGTON.—On Wednesday, the 15th ult., the members of the Mutual Improvement Society gave their annual Concert at the Public Hall before a large audience. The programme included some well-known songs. Among those who took prominent parts were Miss Sincok, Miss Houlston, Miss Hateley, Mr. Hateley, Mr. Martin, Mr. Houlston, and Mr. T. J. Cox. The latter gentleman deserves special mention for his fine rendering of Gounod's "Maid of Athens," which was encored. Miss Hateley presided at the pianoforte.

EXETER.—An excellent performance of Handel's Oratorio Jephtha was given on Tuesday evening, May 31, at the Victoria Hall, to inaugurate the first subscription performance for the present year by the members of the Exeter Oratorio Society. In addition to an able and highly trained orchestra (led by Mr. Barré Bayly) and a powerful chorus, the following soloists took part, viz., Miss Jessie Royd, Miss E. Dones, Mr. Bernard Lane, and Mr. Thurlay Beale. Mr. G. W. Lyon conducted.

HALIFAX.—On Wednesday, the 15th ult., the Oratorio Hagar, composed by the Rev. Sir F. A. G. Ouseley, Bart., was performed in the Parish Church by a full band and chorus of 200 performers. The band consisted of some of the principal members of Mr. Charles Hallé's orchestra and that of Mr. De Jong. The principal vocalists were Miss Tomlinson, Mrs. Carter, Master H. Hainsworth, Miss Brook, Mr. Verney Binns, and Mr. Nutton, of Durham Cathedral. Mr. George Haddock was the leader of the band, Dr. Creser presided at the organ, and Dr. Roberts was the Conductor. The church was crowded, and there were present many of the leading musicians of the county. The Oratorio was well received and admirably rendered, Dr. Roberts being warmly congratulated by many eminent musicians on the manner in which the work had been performed.

HANDSWORTH, NEAR BIRMINGHAM.—On Wednesday, the 1st ult., a very successful Service of Sacred Music was given at Aston Villa Wesleyan Chapel by the choir, the solos being ably rendered by Miss Lizzie Oakes, Miss Jeffery, and Mr. A. R. Hulme. Mr. C. W. Perkins presided at the organ, and played several pieces during the evening in excellent style. Mr. J. F. Thomason, Mus. Bac., Oxon., the Organist and Choirmaster, conducted the choral music, which was given with great precision and vigour. The collection was in aid of the choir funds.

KINGSTOWN.—The eighth season of the Kingstown Philharmonic Society was brought to a most successful termination at the third evening Concert, which was given in the new Town Hall on Friday, the 10th ult. There was a large and appreciative audience. The programme included Romberg's Lay of the Bell and Gade's Erk King's Daughter, which were admirably rendered. The solos were effectively sung by two pupils of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, Miss Connell and Mr. Albert Christian. A new song, "The Suit of Russet Brown," by Dr. József (sung by Miss Connell), was enthusiastically encored, as was also a quartet for male voices of a humorous character, composed by Mr. Edgar Little, a clever member of the Society. Dr. József conducted with his accustomed skill; Mr. Gater, Mus. Bac., was at the harmonium; and Mr. James E. Dowdell led the orchestra.

KINGTON, RADNOR.—On Wednesday, the 15th ult., a Festival of Parish Choirs in connection with the South Shropshire Choral Union was held in St. Edward's Church. There were about eighty voices. The Rev. W. Rayson, Choirmaster of the Union, and Minor Canon of Worcester Cathedral, conducted. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Barnby in E, and the anthem was Ouseley's "From the rising of the sun." The whole Service was very well rendered. Miss Woodward, the Organist of the church, accompanied with her well-known ability.

LAUNCESTON.—The Launceston District Association of Church Choirs held its tenth annual Festival on Tuesday, May 31, in the Church of St. Mary Magdalene. Fourteen choirs were represented on the occasion, numbering about 230 voices. The Old Hundredth, sung to its grand old tune, was the processional. Tallis's Festival Responses were finely rendered. The special psalms, 46, 98, 145, were sung to single Anglican chants by Godwin, Smart, and Dr. Garrett, and as pointed in "Chants: Ancient and Modern." The Canticles, Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, to a setting in G by the Organist and Choirmaster (Mr. Dalby), made a most favourable impression. The anthem, "In Jewry is God known" (Dr. Clarke-Whitfield), deserves especial mention for the precision and brilliancy with which it was rendered. The hymns were carefully sung, the attention to all marks of expression being thoroughly well observed. The success of the Festival was due to the great pains taken by the various local choirtrainers, acting under the careful direction and supervision of the Choirmaster. The chorus from Handel's Messiah, "Lift up your heads," played as a voluntary, brought to a close the most successful Festival the Association has ever held.

MODBURY.—The sixth annual Festival of the Choirs of the Plympton Deanery Choral Union took place in St. George's Church on Wednesday, the 22nd ult. The proceedings of the day began with a choral celebration of the Holy Communion at 11 a.m. The music of the Communion Service was B. Tours in F; Introit, "Like as the hart" (V. Novello); Offertory Sentences (Barnby); Benedictus and Agnus Dei (Monk); Ave Verum (Mozart); Pater noster (Roylands Smith); post-communion hymn, "Jesu, gentlest Saviour." The evening Service commenced at six o'clock; in ten choirs took part, viz., Avonwick, Cornwood, Ivybridge, Modbury, Plympton St. Mary, Plympton St. Maurice, Sparkwell, Ugborough, Loddiswell, and Salcombe. They were supposed to number 250, there being about 200 or more in surplices. The Proper Psalms were Psalms xxix, xlv., and cxxv., which were sung to double Anglican chants by Monk, Attwood, and Smart. The Canticles were by Turle in D, and the Anthem, "O praise the Lord" (Goss). An impressive sermon was preached by the Rev. S. W. E. Bird Vicar of Launceston. The whole of the music was rendered without a single hitch, and reflects great credit on all the choirs, and on the Conductor, Mr. T. Roylands Smith. The fine organ was well played by Mr. Alfred Davis, the Organist of the Church.

PLYMOUTH.—The 16th ult. being the anniversary of the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament there was a High Celebration at All Saints' at eleven o'clock. The Service opened with the March from Elis, during which the clergy and choir took their places in the chancel. A procession was then formed and went round the church singing Hymn 309, "Ancient and Modern," preceded by two trumpets. The Introit was then sung according to the office of the Confraternity, followed by the Kyrie eleison from Schubert's Mass in G, Master White, who has a really good voice, taking the solo. The sub-deacon sang the Epistle, and the deacon the Gospel, between which a Gradual and Sequence hymn were performed. The Gloria before and after the Gospel was by Haynes; then followed the Credo (Schubert). The sermon was preached by the Rev. A. G. Stallard, of Lower Brixham. After the offertory Gounod's "Ave Verum" was performed, and was succeeded by the "Pilgrims' March," from Mendelssohn's Symphony, as a voluntary. The Sursum corda was sung, followed by the Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei. The solos were taken by Master White, Mr. Moreton, and Mr. Jarvis. The Laudate Dominum followed the blessing, and as the clergy and choir returned the March from Le Prophète was played as a voluntary. There was a full band, led by Mr. F. Parden. Mr. W. H. Hannaford, sen., conducted, and Mr. W. H. Hannaford, jun. (the Organist), presided at the organ.

SALISBURY.—The second of a series of popular Concerts was given in the Assembly Rooms on Monday, May 30, and was in every respect a great success. The vocalists were Miss Greenly, Dr. Hannan, and Mr. Gostage. A capital orchestra of thirty performers played, among other things, the Overture to Crown Diamonds (Auber), the Farewell Symphony (Haydn), Ballet music (Délibes), "L'Ingénue," Gavotte (Arditi), and Benedict's March from Undine. Mr. C. J. Read (M.R.A.M.) was the solo pianist, and played a Barcarole of Rubinstein's and a Notturmo of Henselt's (encored); and Mr. A. Foley was also very successful in his violin solos, "Pastorale" (Earl of Dunmore) and "Air Varié" for four string (Paganini). Mr. Augustus Aylward (Organist of St. Thomas's) conducted.

SHERBORNE.—The last Concert of the sixth season of the Musical Union was given at the Digby Hotel Assembly-room on Monday, May 30, before a large audience. The solo vocalists were Miss Jessie Jones, Miss Dones, Mr. Brutton Rowe, and Mr. Goldsmith. Miss R. Curme presided at the piano, Mrs. Tait at the harmonium, and Mr. Louis Parker conducted. Rossini's Stabat Mater occupied the first part of the programme, and the second, which was miscellaneous, included Mendelssohn's unfinished Opera, Loreley, the part of Leonora being taken by Miss Jones. The choruses were well rendered, showing that great pains had been taken by the Conductor.

SOUTHERNHAY.—Mr. W. H. Richmond, of St. Paul's Cathedral, Dundee, gave an Organ Performance on Monday, May 30, at the Congregational Church. There was a large attendance. Mr. Richmond played in excellent style selections from the works of Dr. Wesley, Handel, Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Sullivan, &c., and a Triumphant March of his own composition.

STANNINGLEY.—The successful competitors in the Annual Prize Musical Competition are as follows: Mr. J. Newsome, Ravenshorpe, first prize; Mr. P. A. Strickland, Organist and Choirmaster, Stanningley, second prize; Mr. P. Blakeley, Organist, Batley, third in merit. The compositions which obtained these prizes were sung by most of the Sunday Schools in the neighbourhood of Leeds, Bradford, &c., on Whit-Monday. Mr. J. V. Roberts, Mus. Doc. Oxon, Organist of Halifax Parish Church, was the examiner.

TAMWORTH.—A Concert was given on Tuesday, May 31, in aid of the Catholic School, St. John's Place, which was well attended. Mr. McGowan, under whose able management the choir and band have been trained, was prevented by indisposition from attending, and his duty as Conductor devolved upon Mr. A. G. Rowley. The programme was well rendered on the whole. Mr. Rowley's flute solo was brilliantly executed, and songs were contributed by Miss J. Rose and Messrs. Grayston and Tulke. Mr. R. Jones was encored in a violin solo. Miss Emery accompanied.

YEovil.—Mr. Harry A. Bullock gave an Organ Recital at the Parish Church on Thursday morning, May 26, before a large audience. The programme included compositions by Sir S. Bennett, Chopin, Mendelssohn, and Handel. Mrs. T. E. Whitby sang two solos with excellent effect.—Special Musical Services were held in the Parish Church on the 2nd ult., at which Mendelssohn's motett, Hear my Prayer, and a selection from the Creation were performed. Miss Julia Jones was the soloist. Mr. Joseph Whitby presided at the organ, and Mr. Harry A. Bullock, Organist of the church, conducted. The choir, assisted by some amateur ladies, numbered eighty voices. The Service in the evening was intoned by the Rev. Canon Manning, Precentor of Wells Cathedral.

The Violin and its Music

GEORGE HART

(Author of "The Violin and its Famous Makers")

WITH SEVERAL ENGRAVED PORTRAITS ON STEEL OF EMINENT VIOLINISTS,

WHOSE STYLE, BOTH IN PLAYING AND IN COMPOSITION, MAY BE REGARDED AS REPRESENTATIVE.

"There is nothing in which the power of art is shown so much as in playing the Fiddle. In all other things we can do something at first; any man will forge a bar of iron if you give him a hammer; not so well as a smith, but tolerably; and make a box, though a clumsy one; but give him a fiddle and a fiddlestick, and he can do nothing."—Dr. Johnson.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S MUSIC PRIMERS

EDITED BY

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

CHALLEN & SON

HAVE BEEN ADJUDGED THE

FIRST PRIZE

FOR UPRIGHT IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

MELBOURNE, March, 1881.

We, the undersigned Jurors for Musical Instruments at the Melbourne International Exhibition, have no hesitation in certifying that Messrs. Challen & Son, of London, have obtained the highest number of points for Cottage Pianos, in the British Court.

The award was based on the excellence of the quality, combined with the cheapness and solidity of the instruments exhibited, which we consider to be well adapted to the requirements of the Colonies.

HOPKINSON'S PIANOFORTES.

PARIS EXHIBITION, 1878,

the highest distinction was conferred upon Messrs. HOPKINSON by the Musical Jurors—viz., the only Gold Medal awarded to any British Manufacturer.

MESSRS. HOPKINSON, therefore, feel fairly entitled to repeat the opinions expressed in the year 1845, by the most celebrated Pianists and Musicians then living—viz., THALBERG, Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, Madame DULCKEN, Sir HENRY BISHOP, and others, as still being correct—that their Pianofortes are "unsurpassed in tone and touch by those of any other maker."

Since these opinions were expressed, the leading musical judges in all parts of the world have confirmed them.

Messrs. H. having also, after carefully conducted experiments, introduced improvements of great value, with confidence invite the Trade, Professors, and the Musical Public, specially to inspect and judge of their Metal-framed Grand and Cottage Pianofortes, which they believe to deserve the eulogium passed upon them by the President of the Musical Jurors at Paris, 1878, that—

"THEY ARE FAULTLESS."

THE LONDON MUSICAL SEASON.

BY HENRY C. LUNN.

If it were necessary to strengthen our oft-repeated assertion that the days of Italian Opera in this country are numbered, we might point to the fact that the companies assembled at our lyrical establishments do not now contain vocalists at all competent to sing pure Italian music as it should be sung. In the palmy days of opera at the Haymarket, and even later, when a large number of the vocalists were transferred to Covent Garden, the works, whatever may have been thought of their abstract merits, were rendered, mainly by Italians, in a style which gave a factitious importance to the music; and many persons, therefore, would flock to the theatre to hear the singers who cared but little for what they sang. We have now, however, passed from Italian Opera to Opera in Italian; and this in England becomes an absurdity so evident to all thinking persons that the only wonder is how a sufficient number of fashionable people still come forward to support it. It has been said that it generally takes the same time for an undertaking to die out as it did to establish it. If this be really true, let us be thankful that a short period sufficed for Italian Opera to take firm root in this country, for just as long may we fervently hope that it will take to decline.

The season at the Royal Italian Opera has thoroughly confirmed the truth of the foregoing remarks. Rubinstein's "Il Demonio" is essentially a German opera; and Mozart's "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," with the Italian recitatives in place of the original dialogue, is a complete burlesque upon the composer's design, the exquisite music, however, making it welcome even in so absurd a disguise. The prospectus promised us these two works, and the promise has been faithfully kept. Criticisms upon both these operas have appeared in our columns; but in this summary of the season we cannot refrain from again bearing testimony to the admirable singing of Madame Albani and M. Lassalle in Rubinstein's work, and of Madame Sembrich in that of Mozart. More artistic performances than these have rarely been heard on the lyric stage, and it is gratifying to find that, even by the proverbially cold audiences at this establishment, they have been thoroughly appreciated. Boito's "Mefistofele," we were told, would be produced "if time should permit"; and as we presume that it was absolutely necessary—for the vocalists, if not for the audience—to play the usual round of hackneyed operas, we may, of course, conclude that "time would not permit." Madame Fursch-Madier, Signor Mierzwinsky, Signor Sante Athos, and M. Soula Croix are the only newcomers who have retained their places during the season; but the lady has the highest claims to our regard, and we may probably find that she will be included in the company next year. Madame Sembrich has fairly established herself as a prima donna of the true school of vocalisation; and as Mesdames Adelina Patti, Albani, and Trebelli have also appeared in their favourite parts, it will be seen that the company has been unusually strong in the female department. The new Conductor, M. Dupont, has proved himself thoroughly efficient, many of the works under his direction, indeed, being given with more certainty and precision than usual at this establishment; and his duties have been shared by Signor Bevignani, whose zeal and steadiness are too well known to need our commendation.

At Her Majesty's Theatre the only novelty of the season was given on the last night of the subscription; but, considering the weakness of the work, it may be that this was a cunning device of the lessee to cover its inevitable failure. We can scarcely believe that "Il Rinnegato" was selected as a representative opera of the day, and must imagine, therefore, that there are other reasons why it was performed. That these reasons have nothing whatever to do with art is, we think, too obvious to be doubted; and we have only to hope, therefore, that the Baron Bódog D'Orczy, Mr. Mapleson, and the subscribers to the Opera season are satisfied. The promise in the prospectus that Madame Christine Nilsson would undertake the character of Semiramide, in Rossini's opera, was, we are happy to say, not fulfilled; for, considering the number of parts with which this excellent artist is now identified, we should be extremely sorry to find that she had made even a comparative failure. Mdlle. Adalgisa Gabbi scarcely produced the effect evidently expected by the lessee; and the main attraction of the season has therefore been Madame Nilsson, who, especially in Boito's "Mefistofele," has materially advanced her high reputation both as a singer and an actress. Madame Tremelli, too, is gradually gaining ground in public estimation, and Mdle. Anna de Belocca, Mdle. Minnie Hauk, and Madame Ilma di Murska have also been instrumental in helping the lessee through a most uneventful season. A good word must, however, be said for Mdle. Emma Juch, who, although inexperienced on the stage, sings well, and is extremely painstaking. Signor Novara, who made his début as Mephistopheles, in Gounod's "Faust," gave much of his music with good effect, but his acting of the part, though original in conception, was scarcely to the taste of the audience. Signor Faccio, who was mentioned in the prospectus as joint conductor with Signor Ardit, has not made his appearance, and the arduous duties of the season have been entirely sustained by the last-named artist with much credit to himself and benefit to the establishment.

Grateful for past favours, if not for those lately received, all music lovers looked on with sorrow at the recent dissensions in the councils of the Philharmonic Society; and the resignation of many of the Directors, and even of the Treasurer and Secretary, seemed at one time to threaten the extinction of an institution which in the early days of musical art in this country was mainly instrumental in nursing it into healthy life. Clearly it was necessary that numerous reforms should be instituted; and when the prospectus was issued with new names in the management, it was at once seen that some departure from the old lines was decided upon. Six concerts, instead of eight, were announced, and there were to be two rehearsals for each performance, although it had been formerly declared, in reply to numerous critical remarks, that no more than one could possibly be obtained. This was a step in the right direction; and when it was likewise found that some compositions but little known in England—Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony amongst the number—were to be included in the programme of the season, and also works by British composers, there seemed to be some hope of the commencement of a new lease of existence for the Society. The result has been most encouraging. The majority of the performances, although still leaving much to be desired, have been far superior to anything heard at these Concerts for some years, and great credit is due for the untiring zeal displayed by Mr. Cusins, the Conductor, in the endeavour to secure a worthy rendering of Berlioz' difficult Symphony. Next year we hope to record further progress; for so many rivals are now in the field that activity in the management, even of so old an institution as the Philharmonic Society, can alone protect it from decay.

The Crystal Palace Concerts have thoroughly sustained their high position during the season, and although the supply of modern German music may be thought by many to be slightly in excess of the demand, there can be little doubt that compensation has at least been partially made by the exceptionally fine performance of compositions which everybody must welcome with pleasure. It is difficult to bear success, and we must not be surprised, therefore, that in consequence of the popularity of the Saturday Winter Concerts, the Crystal Palace authorities also instituted a series for the summer; but we much question whether this is a wise step. The performances were especially intended to attract an audience to the concert-room at Sydenham at a time when outdoor pleasures were undesirable; but when the Crystal Palace becomes a blaze of floral beauty, and the temptation of walking in the grounds is really almost too much to resist, whatever music is given should be of a lighter character, and we shall scarcely be surprised, therefore, if the experiment of presenting important works at this time of the year were not to be repeated.

The series of Richter Concerts have again been one of the important features of the season, more especially when—in consequence of the falling off in the attendances, if not of the friendly advice of musical critics—the Director resolved to make his programmes more generally interesting. Before Herr Richter came to this country we were accustomed to hear thoroughly satisfactory performances of the standard works; and, knowing the reputation of the German Conductor for expounding the subtleties of the modern compositions of his most gifted countrymen, we naturally expected that his programmes would include many of these, and thus have a special character to distinguish them from the ordinary orchestral concerts of the metropolis. Gradually this truth has been perceived and acted upon; and not only have several of the compositions of the great operatic reformer, Wagner, been given, but next year the solo singers and chorus of the German Opera are promised, in order that the true effect of the Wagnerian selections may be more fully realised. This is as it should be; and we are quite certain that, with such excellent materials, the Richter Concerts must command a large and influential patronage.

The Concerts given during the season by M. Lamoureux, Conductor of the Grand-Opéra, Paris, were interesting as showing what "Young France" is now doing in musical composition; and, although many could not but be struck with the conviction that "Old France" has set a pattern which scarcely seems worthily followed, many works were given at least worthy of a hearing. All these were noticed by us at the time of their performance; and we have now only to add an expression of hope that M. Lamoureux will again pay us a visit next year with some works which may fairly be considered as representative of the genius of his countrymen.

Apart from the Pianoforte Recitals of Mr. Charles Hallé—which included the whole of Beethoven's Sonatas and Bach's forty-eight Preludes and Fugues

—we have to thank him for continuing his revival of Berlioz' works by producing "L'Enfance du Christ," with a thoroughly efficient orchestra, chorus, and solo singers. There is no doubt a "fashion" in music, for during much of the season Berlioz became the rage—even the usually steady-going Philharmonic Society performing his "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony—but we can scarcely imagine that this will last more than any other fashion; and it becomes a question whether even next season there will be any earnest demand for his music. Meantime every credit is due to Mr. Hallé, who has spared no trouble to bring to the front an artist who, although almost initiating what is often termed the "music of the future," has hitherto been so neglected as to be scarcely known even to those who frantically uphold the works of Wagner and his disciples.

That the support accorded to musical performances depends upon their intrinsic quality, and not upon the locality in which they are given, has been evidenced by the success of the Sacred Harmonic Society's concerts this season at St. James's Hall. So firmly had Exeter Hall been associated with this Society that there were not wanting persons who—with ominous predictions of certain failure if the same artists sang in any other room—anticipated with satisfaction the dissolution of the Society, in order that their rigid notion of the "fitness of things" might not be disturbed. But the migration took place, and Sir Michael Costa, loyally retaining his post as Conductor, at once proceeded with the necessary task of adapting his orchestra and chorus to the new hall; and urged, or at least yielded to the desire for, the occasional introduction of less familiar works into the programmes. So far from diminishing the effect of the concerts by lessening the amount of physical force displayed by vocalists and instrumentalists at Exeter Hall, we are inclined to believe that the alteration was a distinct improvement; and even if a return to the old locality should ever be made, there can be little doubt that quality, instead of quantity, will now be the principal thought in engaging the executants. Accident, rather than design, has effected a very desirable reform in this time-honoured Society; and all who desire the healthy progress of music in this country will join with us in hoping that time will but strengthen an institution which has already done so much to spread a knowledge of the standard oratorios of the great masters.

There is not the slightest sign of any decline either in the attendance or the quality of the performances at the Monday Popular Concerts. Formed for the special purpose of presenting high-class chamber compositions, with the best executants procurable, they have steadily preserved their character; and, although presenting but little novelty, there can be no doubt that they are annually looked forward to with much interest by the fast-increasing audiences who really love music for its own sake.

The Bach Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, maintains its high reputation, and attracts large and appreciative audiences, not only on account of the excellence of its performances, but because it does not limit its programmes to the works of the one great artist whose Mass in B minor called the Society into existence. The Musical Union, despite the retirement of Mr. Ella, continues to assemble select audiences to hear the best specimens of Chamber Music, and the new Director, M. Lasserre, still preserves the character of an association which has always prided itself upon appealing rather to an exclusive circle of amateurs than to the general music-loving public. The London Musical Society, although an amateur institution, has done much service in bringing forward works but little known; and as its object is fame and not profit, there can be no doubt of its continuing its career of usefulness. The Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, the rehearsals and performances of which are entirely under the able conductorship of Mr. Barnby; the Borough of Hackney Choral Association (which, aided by the zealous exertions of its Conductor, Mr. Ebenezer Prout, still advances in public estimation); the Hampstead Choral Society, so excellently directed by its founder, Mr. Willem Coenen; the Highbury Philharmonic Society, which, since Dr. Bridge's appointment as Conductor, has made remarkable progress; and other Societies too numerous to mention, have fairly earned the good opinion of all who believe with us that the musical education of the people is best effected by constantly placing before them those works which have raised the art to its present high position.

Mention must also be made of the excellent Orchestral Concerts of Mr. Ganz, who seems resolved to make a name as a conductor of high-class music, to whatever school it may belong. Amongst the unfamiliar works included in his programmes was Gluck's "Orpheus," the many beauties of which, even in a concert-room, appealed with irresistible force to a large and deeply interested audience.

Everybody will join with us in sincerely regretting that Mr. Sims Reeves's Farewell Oratorio performances were partially shorn of their interest by the non-appearance of the retiring tenor at some of the most popular of the concerts. That his absence was caused by circumstances utterly beyond his control, we need scarcely say; for, even after the operation he was compelled to undergo, he had firmly resolved to fulfil his engagement, and nothing but a relapse which incapacitated him from singing kept him away. That we shall again hear him in some of the Oratorios which he has rendered doubly attractive by his exquisite vocalisation may however be confidently relied upon; and we earnestly hope not only that he will be enabled to enter with renewed vigour upon the series of concerts which he announces at some future period, but that he may be induced to reconsider his determination of taking farewell of a public over which he still exercises so powerful an artistic influence.

Douglas Jerrold, in describing the "lion" of a certain coterie who had unexpectedly been supplanted by a rival, tells us that "his mane came out by handfuls." We do not say that any such catastrophe can have occurred to Dr. Von Bülow, but certainly Rubinstein has been the hero of the season, in spite of the Doctor's presence amongst us. Whatever may critically be said of Rubinstein's pianoforte performances, there can be no doubt of his power to impress an audience with the distinct individuality of his readings; and the remarkable success of his Recitals may be accepted as a proof that English people are not so apathetic as some impressionable Germans have accused them of being. In an account of the Pianoforte Recitals given in the metropolis, however, it must not be forgotten that other less sensational artists—Mr. Charles Hallé (already mentioned), Miss Agnes Zimmermann, and Madame Sophie Menter amongst the number—have most eloquently expounded the works of the great composers of the world, and that their position before the public seems in no respect diminished by the advent of the disciples of what may be termed the "impulsive school." If indeed it is admitted that a pianist must have advanced to a "high development" who can fully comprehend and display his composer, then we can only assume that he believes he has advanced to a "higher development" when he soars beyond his composer and displays himself.

The obituary of the year includes three names of eminence in the art—Offenbach, the composer; Henri Vieuxtemps, the violinist and composer; and M. Lemmens, the well known organist and contributor to the repertory of the organ and the church. Offenbach had no doubt already written his best, although his operas continued to appeal to those who were carried away by catching tunes and lively choruses; Vieuxtemps had long before his decease been disabled from playing, but he has produced many works for his instrument which are much cherished by violinists; and M. Lemmens, although a good organist, may probably be more remembered as a composer than an executant.

The movement for providing good concerts for the people at a merely nominal rate of admission still progresses, and we are glad to find that many persons of wealth and position are energetically aiding the good cause. The "Twopenny Concerts," under the direction of Mr. Ridley Prentice, have been successful far beyond the most sanguine anticipations of their promoters, and, considering the high-class music given, few will, we imagine, be now inclined to doubt the truth of the theory steadily advocated in these columns, that the taste of the general public has been, as a rule, invariably underrated whenever popular musical entertainments have been instituted.

Amongst the events of the season may be mentioned the inauguration of examinations by the Royal Academy of Music, the results of which have been most successful. Both in the metropolis and in the provinces the high standing of the old-established institution seems to have been thoroughly appreciated; and the prestige of passing an examination by its professors has stimulated many students to submit to a severer test than has hitherto been instituted for the general public.

The appointment of Dr. Stainer as Principal of the National Training School for Music at South Kensington, on the resignation of Mr. Arthur Sullivan, must give the utmost satisfaction both to the students and the authorities of the institution, not only on account of his high position in the profession, but because he had for some time previously so ably carried on the duties of the office during Mr. Sullivan's absence.

If we would judge dispassionately of the artistic results of the last season it must be remembered that the mixture of styles, whether of composers or executants, placed before our audiences during that period attracts a larger number of listeners than could possibly be appealed to were our programmes more cut to a pattern, however admirable that pattern may be. Persons thus learn to discriminate between good and bad; and although it may be true that at some performances many who come to applaud remain to scoff, it is also true that many who come to scoff remain to applaud. We could cite innumerable instances where talent has been expected but not found, and as many where it has been found, but not expected; the moral to be deduced being that the more liberally our musical institutions are conducted the more is our chance increased of truly gauging the amount of musical power existing around us. On the whole, then, we are content with the progress the art is making in England, and sincerely believe that music, although many years ago regarded as an exotic in this country, has now taken root here so vigorously as to defy the effects of the few excrescences which from time to time grow around it.

III.

MAROT appears to have spent about three months in Savoy, and arrived at Geneva towards the end of November, 1542. Here he found his thirty psalms already employed in the service of the Church, but with a text which Calvin then, no doubt for the first time, discovered to be spurious. Proposals were soon made to the poet to continue his translations, and even King Francis seems to have intimated his wishes to Marot to the same effect.* The work was accordingly commenced, and in August, 1543, Marot published his "Cinquante Pseaumes," containing—with an epistle to the ladies of France, and another to the King—a revised edition of the thirty psalms, twenty new ones (of which the Song of Simeon was counted as one), the Commandments, the Articles of Faith, the Lord's Prayer, the Salutation of the Virgin, and Prayers before and after meat. The new psalms were 18, 23, 25, 33, 36, 43, 45, 46, 50, 72, 79, 86, 91, 101, 107, 110, 118, 128, and 138, which with the Song of Simeon make up the number of fifty. It will be observed that the five psalms translated by Calvin in 1539 (25, 36, 46, 91, and 138) are here replaced by new versions, and now disappear from the Genevan psalter, although they were retained in a new edition of the Strasburg psalter, published in 1545. No edition of the psalms with music, printed in 1543, or the three following years, is known to exist. We first find the melodies of the new psalms in the harmonized psalter published by Bourgeois in 1547, but it is perfectly certain that they were in use for some time before, and were no doubt selected and arranged soon after the completion of Marot's translations.

Of Marot's intercourse with Calvin during his stay at Geneva almost nothing is known. Neither in his writings ever speaks of the other,† and even in the preface to the psalter Calvin makes no allusion to Marot. Nor is this surprising. Except in their adherence to the reformed doctrines the two men had nothing in common. Autocratic by nature, Calvin tolerated no dissent either in faith or discipline. Unbending in his logic and confident in the absolute truth of his premises, he pushed his conclusions to their extreme limits, without regard to their practical results; and, consistent in his own asceticism, had no sympathy for the contradictions, still less for the weaknesses, of human nature. To Marot, outspoken, genial, and tolerant, the iron fetters which then bound Geneva must have been unendurable; his relations with Calvin could never have been cordial, and his associates were chiefly among those to whom the tyranny of the reformer and the Council were odious. One of these friends was cited before the Council in December, on a charge of having, in his own house, played at dice with Marot. The dice, it turned out, were used for a game of backgammon. About two months before this, Calvin, who was anxious that the translation of the whole Psalter should be completed, applied to the Council to give Marot an engagement for the purpose, but that parsimonious body refused to grant the necessary remuneration. In such an atmosphere Marot could not live, and soon afterwards returned to Savoy. A short poem, addressed to the King, which he then wrote, and in which he expressed his opinion that Geneva was exactly the reverse of Paradise, must have been highly displeasing to Calvin and the fanatical party who looked on their city as a foretaste of the New Jerusalem. Accordingly, Marot's character has suffered equally at the hands of his friends and his foes. "Beza," says Mr. Morley,* "spoke afterwards quite honestly and truly the voice of the church of Calvin on this subject. 'Clément Marot,' he says, 'after his return from Italy to the Court, was very much hated by the Sorbonne for translating very happily thirty psalms of David into the French tongue, which are dedicated to the King, who thought them worthy to be printed. But he was forced to make his escape, and retreated to Geneva, where he translated twenty more of them. He had always been bred up in a very bad school, and could not live in subjection to the reformation of the Gospel, and therefore he went and spent the rest of his days in Piedmont, which was then in the possession of the King, where he lived in some security under the favour of the governor.' Beza,"† Mr. Morley adds, "is quite right; Marot had sought a reformation in the spirit of the Church, and an abatement of its fleshly corruptions; but he could not live in subjection to a reformation of the Gospel." On the other hand, the more widely spread the influence of Marot's psalms became, the more bitter grew the enmity of the opposite party to his memory, but the assertion of Cajet, fifty years after Marot's death, that he had suffered corporal punishment at Geneva for immoral conduct, has been completely refuted by M. Douen, and must be classed with the still later inventions of Lenglet-Dufresnoy.

Marot's career was now drawing to a close. He seems to have abandoned all hope of obtaining permission to return to France, a favour which he could only have purchased by the sacrifice of his principles. While at Chambéry he produced a few poetical pieces, including one on the birth of the Dauphin's eldest son, afterwards Francis II., another on the victory gained by the French at Cériseles in April, 1544. He then removed to Turin, where he died after a short illness, in the month of August following. His remains were interred in the church of St. John, with every mark of respect from the members of the French government then established at Turin, and a poetical epitaph, written by his friend Lyon Jamet, was placed over the spot where at last he found repose.

The death of Marot left the psalter unfinished, and several versifiers soon attempted to supplement his work, but with small success. The translations of Aurigny, Brinzel, and others, completing the psalter, were published in 1550, those of Poictevin and others in 1557; whence misconceptions have arisen respecting the date at which the genuine Genevan psalter was finished. These versions, however, failed to secure acceptance by the Church, and we may pass them by without further notice. From the loss of most of the early editions of the Genevan psalter, it is difficult to follow its bibliography with precision; but one, if not two, editions containing Calvin's enlarged preface, dated June 10, were certainly published in 1543, before the appearance of the "Cinquante Pseaumes" in the month of August. Bovet supposes that these editions contained the whole number of fifty psalms, but Douen gives reasons which seem to us probable, though not, perhaps, quite conclusive, for thinking that they were but reprints of the psalms already in use.‡ However this may be, there can be no doubt that some months later an edition of the fifty psalms appeared, with melodies prefixed, and we can only hope that a copy of it may yet come to light.

* Clément Marot, II., 62.

† Beza, it will be noticed, did not arrive in Geneva for five years after Marot had left it and consequently had no personal knowledge of him.

‡ Possibly, however, with the revised text. May we even venture to suspect that, although the "Cinquante Pseaumes" did not appear until August, 1543, some of the new psalms may be found in these June editions, if a copy of either of them is ever discovered?

* The King appears to have still maintained some friendly intercourse with Marot.

† Calvin barely mentions Marot twice in his letters.

The psalter published at Strasburg in 1545, of which we have already spoken, was an enlarged edition of the pseudo-Roman psalter of 1542. As it does not directly belong to the Genevan series we need only add that it contains ten of Marot's new psalms, with tunes attached, and that, of its forty-eight melodies, twenty, including the ten set to the new psalms, are said by those who have seen them to resemble the tunes of Geneva. At the end of the volume is a "Salutation à Jésus Christ" commencing "Je te salue, mon certain Redempteur." This hymn,* which has been sometimes ascribed to Calvin, but is not in his manner, is supposed by M. Douen to be possibly by Jean Garnier, then minister of the French congregation at Strasburg, by whom the psalter of 1545 was doubtless edited. Returning to the Genevan psalter, we find that the earliest edition now known to us, containing the fifty psalms with music, is that published by Louis Bourgeois in 1547, in which the tunes are harmonized in four parts. We will notice this work more fully hereafter, and, omitting any further reference to editions of Marot's psalms containing the words only, we may close our review of the publications of this period with the "Pseaumes cinquante de David, mis en vers françois par Clément Marot." Lyon, 1549. This edition—the only one belonging to the regular series of Genevan psalters with music, published between 1542 and 1554, that has come down to us—discloses the fact that the tunes had undergone considerable modifications between 1543 and 1549. In seventeen instances they are more or less altered, while six new melodies appear, superseding those of 1542.

As regards the psalms it contained, the Geneva psalter remained for six years exactly as Marot left it in 1543. However desirous Calvin may have been to see the work completed, he does not seem to have found among the productions of Marot's successors anything to satisfy his judgment until Théodore de Bèze, or Beza, arrived in Geneva on October 24, 1548. This eminent man, who was afterwards to succeed Calvin as head of the Reformed Church, was born at Vezelay in Burgundy, on June 24, 1519. After receiving a liberal education under the celebrated Wolmar, he was destined by his father to the profession of law, but, as Marot had done before him, soon abandoned his studies for lighter forms of literature, and plunged into all the dissipations that characterized the society of the time. At last a severe illness, which nearly proved fatal, effected a complete revolution in his mind, and at the age of twenty-nine he embraced the reformed tenets, the principles of which he had in early life imbibed from Wolmar. He then at once left France for Geneva. On his arrival at the Protestant capital Beza at first projected the establishment there of a printing-office, in partnership with his friend Jean Crespin, but in the following year, at the request of Calvin, accepted the chair of Greek in the University of Lausanne. Before, however, Beza left Geneva to enter on his new duties, Calvin, who happened one day to enter his room during his absence from home, saw lying upon the table a sheet of paper containing a translation of the sixteenth psalm.† Taking this away without the author's knowledge, Calvin showed it to his friends, and at once urged Beza to undertake the completion of the French psalter. Beza acceded to this request, and commenced the work on his arrival at Lausanne. It progressed, however, but slowly; and in June, 1551, Calvin wrote to Viret to ask Beza to send to him immediately whatever psalms had been then completed. Beza complied, and in the course of the year there appeared "Trente-quatre pseumes de David, nouvellement mis en rime francoise au plus pres de l'hebreu, par Th. de Besze de Vezelay en Bourgogne. Geneue, Jehan Crespin." The psalms contained in this volume are 16, 17, 20, 21, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 34, 35, 39, 40, 41, 42, 44, 47, 73, 90, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 129, 131, 132, 133, and 134. A few months previously, in March, 1551, Beza had applied to the Council of Geneva for permission to print his psalms,* as well as for the exclusive privilege of selling them. The minute in the register of the Council says:—

Le Seigneur de Besse a présenté vne supplication requerant par icelle luy permettre faire imprimer le reste des Seaulmes de David, et les a fait mettre en notes de musique; aussi qui nulz en puissent vendre que luy. . . . Arrêté que luy soit outroyée sa dicte requeste pour la terme de troys ans prochains des auiorduy.

The expression "le reste" seems to imply that Beza then contemplated an early completion of his work, which, however, was not brought to a close for ten years later. The statement that the new psalms were already set to music is explained by an important minute of Council of July 28, 1552, which M. Douen has published for the first time.‡ From this minute it appears that Guillaume Franc was then engaged in preparing a psalter for use at Lausanne, of which we will speak hereafter. In 1552 the thirty-four psalms of Beza were added to the forty-nine of Marot, and published under the title of the "Pseumes octante-trois."† No musical edition of the psalter of this year has survived, but it is certain that tunes were adapted at Geneva to the new psalms immediately after their publication. The earliest edition of the eighty-three psalms with tunes that has come down to us is dated 1554, and at the end of the volume six more psalms by Beza are added, being 52, 57, 63, 64, 65, and 111. Of these the first four are without tunes, the last two are adapted to the melodies of psalms 72 and 24 respectively.§ The next edition is without date, but may be assigned with probability to the year 1555. It contains one additional psalm, 67; the 63rd is adapted to the tune of the 17th, the 64th to that of the 5th, the new psalm (the 67th) to that of the 33rd, and the 52nd and 57th alone remained unprovided with a melody until 1562.

The progress of the psalter was again suspended during several years. New editions of the ninety psalms issued from the press, but it was not until after Beza's return from Lausanne in 1558 that the work was finished, nor until 1562, just twenty years from the appearance of the first edition, that the complete psalter was published at Geneva.||

The psalms now added were the sixty which until then remained untranslated. To thirty-eight of these (48, 49, 54, 55, 56, 58, 59, 60, 61, 74, 75, 80, 81, 83, 84, 85, 87, 88, 89, 92, 93, 94, 96, 97, 99, 102, 105, 106, 112, 135, 136, 141, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150) proper tunes were assigned, while the remainder were directed to be sung to the tunes of other psalms, viz., 53 to the tune of 14, 62 to 24, 66 to 118, 68 to 36, 69 to 51, 70 to 17, 71 to 31, 76 to 30, 77 to 86, 78 to 90, 82 to 46, 95 to 24, 98 to 118, 100 to 131, 108 to 60, 109 to 28, 116 to 74, 117 to 127, 139 to 30, 140 to the Commandments tune, 142 to 131, and 144 to 18. 52 and 57 were also now fitted with tunes, and thus we find the psalms, together with the Commandments and the Song of Simeon, sung to 125 distinct melodies.

Douen quotes no less than twenty-three other editions printed in the same year, at other presses, for Antoine Vincent. The date of one of these, attached to a Bible, is however, doubtful. Eight were printed at Geneva, three at Lyon, five at Paris, one at Saint-Lô, one at Caen, and five without name of place. Of the above, two (besides the one already noticed) are attached to Bibles, two to New Testaments, and one is in tablature for the lute. All with tunes. We may also add the harmonized psalms of Jambe-de-Fer, and the sixteen psalms published by Goudimel in four parts. These two editions will be noticed hereafter. The total number of recorded editions, of one sort or another, published in 1562, is twenty-six.

The history of these melodies was a matter of small interest to the reformers of the time, but afterwards, when the Genevan psalms had attained a wide popularity, writers began to enquire into the origin and authorship of the tunes to which they were sung.* Facts being wanting, conjecture took their place, and these tunes were assigned to various musicians of the time, several of whom had published harmonized editions of the Genevan psalter. Among these editions that of Goudimel held the foremost place; and this fact, coupled with the belief that his death in the massacres of 1572 was attributable to the assistance his musical ability had given to the Protestant cause, led many writers to believe him the author of all, or of some at least, of the melodies which he harmonized. Florimond de Rémond, himself a member of the Reformed Church up to 1566, speaks of Goudimel and Bourgeois as the musicians whom Calvin employed as the musical editors of his psalter; others assign the melodies to Claudin Le Jeune, others to Guillaume Franc. The claim set up for Goudimel, adopted though it has been by so many authorities, is easily refuted, even without reference to the facts ascertained by recent investigations. Goudimel did not join the reformers until after the eighty-three psalms were published in 1551; he never visited Geneva, nor is there the slightest trace of any communication having ever passed between him and Calvin. Claudin Le Jeune was but a child when the early editions of the Genevan psalter appeared, and thus the only pretensions that remain for consideration are those of Bourgeois and Franc.

If it be asked how it came to pass that such uncertainty should exist respecting the musical history of the Genevan psalter, it is not difficult to find an answer. Curiosity on the subject was aroused only at a later time, when the facts had become obscured. Even an account given by Beza is manifestly inaccurate. To Calvin and his Church the tunes were merely vehicles for the expression of the psalms, while the musician by whom they were arranged would never think that his professional reputation was much interested in work of such a nature.† His duty consisted in supplying each psalm with a fitting tune, and he took his materials from any source that best suited his purpose. A composer of that time concerned himself little with the production of original melodies, in the modern sense of the word; to him harmony was everything, and the tune but a theme on which he might expend his science and invention. Hence, when the Genevan tunes became popular, we find a number of musicians displaying their learning and taste by harmonizing them either in simple counterpoint or as motets. In Germany, in the case of the early chorales, the same course was pursued by a long line of composers, culminating in Johann Sebastian Bach; but one important point of difference between the Lutheran and Calvinistic churches must never be lost sight of. While Germany was constantly increasing her stock of hymns and chorales, and in the course of time‡ admitted the use of harmony in public worship, France and Switzerland firmly rejected any addition to the simple melody, and adhered exclusively to the metrical psalter with its tunes as finally settled in 1562. The tunes themselves, a few excepted, cannot be regarded as original. Some, no doubt of German descent, were adopted from the Strasburg psalter of 1539, some can be traced to popular melodies still preserved in old collections of national songs, and some seem to have been constructed by ringing the changes on a few simple musical phrases. Of this practice the tune of the 134th Psalm, known in England as the "Old Hundreth," is a good example. Its component parts are found over and over again in various combinations, and, while one of the most effective, it is also perhaps one of the least original tunes in the Genevan psalter.

We have now to consider the claims of Bourgeois and Franc to the editorship of this work, and the reasons assigned by M. Douen for giving judgment in favour of the former.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

BERLIOZ had not long returned to Paris before he was requested by M. Pillet, director of the Grand-Opéra, to assist him in placing Weber's "Der Freischütz" on that world-famous stage. It was of course necessary to set the dialogue of the German work in recitative, and this particular task Berlioz accepted, after some hesitation caused by his pronounced reverence for an author's design. We have a part, at least, of the conversation between composer and impresario with reference to the subject:—

"B. I am not sure that one ought to add to 'Freischütz' the recitatives you ask of me, but as that is a condition without which it cannot be represented at the Opéra, and as, if I do not write them you will confide the task to some one else, less familiar, perhaps, with Weber than I am, and certainly less devoted than myself to the glorification of his masterpiece, I accept your offer on one condition: that 'Freischütz' shall be played just as it is, with nothing changed either in drama or music.

"P. That is precisely my intention. Do you think me capable of renewing the scandals of 'Robin des Bois'?"

"B. Very good: in that case I will set about the work. How do you intend to distribute the parts?"

"P. I shall give Agatha to Madame Stoltz, Annette to Mdlle. Dobré, and Duprez will take Max.

"B. I say 'No.'

"P. Why not?"

"B. You will know soon.

"P. Bouché will make an excellent Caspar.

"B. And whom have you for the Hermit?"

"P. Oh! that's a useless part, which only adds to the length of the work. I intend to take it away altogether.

"B. Only that? It is thus that you mean to respect 'Freischütz,' and not to imitate M. Castil-Blaze! We are far from being agreed. Allow me to retire; I cannot possibly mix myself up with this new correction.

"P. Mon Dieu! You are thorough in your opinions. Well, we will keep the Hermit—we will keep everything, I give you my word."

Berlioz found his extreme reverence for the original somewhat inconvenient, since the "uncut" dialogue, put into recitative, stretched out to an enormous length; and, as usual, he had great difficulty in making the leading artists show any respect whatever to the composer. Duprez insisted upon such extraordinary transpositions that the part was taken away from him, and Madame Stoltz injured Agatha's second air by singing it in F instead of A flat. "There is," says Berlioz, "a fourth part of real difficulty, another fourth of ignorance, and a good half of caprice in all this unwillingness of singers to render their parts as they are written." The inevitable ballet was another obstacle in the way of Berlioz at the Grand-Opéra. Powerless to hinder its introduction into "Der Freischütz," the master scored for orchestra "L'Invitation à la Valse," but this did not satisfy the dancers, who thought to gain their end by asking Berlioz, through the manager, to add the Ball scene in his "Symphonie Fantastique" and the Fête music from his "Roméo et Juliette." Of this he would not hear, but ultimately consented to introduce selections from "Preciosa" and "Oberon." We may add that during the subsequent absence of Berlioz from Paris, the manager worked his will upon Weber's opera, and so cut it about that Castil-Blaze and "Robin des Bois" lost their bad pre-eminence in favour of Pillet and the new version. On this the indignant author of the recitatives exclaims, "And how they perform that which remains! What singers! what a conductor! what lazy sleepiness in the movements! what discordance in the ensembles! what a heavy, stupid, and revolting interpretation from beginning to end! Be, then, an inventor, a torch-bearer, an inspired man, a genius, to suffer torture, spitting, and abuse. Unmannerly hucksters! While waiting the whip of a new Messiah able to chase you from the temple, rest assured that every one in Europe who possesses the least artistic sentiment entertains for you the most profound contempt." It must be owned that in the lowest depths of anguish Berlioz was able to relieve himself by a vigorous expression of opinion.

* We may estimate the value of some of these writers as authorities from the fact that one of them confounds Claude Goudimel with Claudin Le Jeune. He says, "l'incomparable musicien Gaudimel (sic) si connu de tous sous le nom de Claudin le Jeune!"

"Der Freischütz" fairly launched on the Grand-Opéra stage, our master seems to have had no resource but his feuilletons. This he bewails most pitifully. We have already seen with how much labour he used the critical pen, but the task of wielding that of a feuilletonist was agony. On this matter his remarks are worth quoting at length:—

"The critic (I suppose him honest and intelligent) writes only if he has an idea, if he would throw light upon a question, combat a system, or bestow praise and blame. Then he has reasons which he believes sufficient for expressing his views, and awarding censure or eulogium. The unhappy feuilletonist, obliged to write upon everything within the domain of his feuilleton (sad domain, swamp full of locusts and toads!), desires only to finish the task imposed upon him; he has very often no opinion upon the subjects about which he is compelled to discourse; they excite neither his anger nor his admiration; they are not. However, needs must that he pretend to believe in their existence, to have a reason for giving them his attention, and taking part for or against. Most of my brethren know how to do this without pain, and even with a charming facility. For myself, when I set about it, I do so with efforts not less prolonged than distressing. I was once shut up in my room for three entire days, trying to write a feuilleton on the Opéra-Comique, and without the power to begin it. I could not remember the work of which I had to speak (a week after the first performance I had forgotten the name of it for ever), but the tortures that I endured during those three days before achieving the first three lines of my article—certainly! I can recall them well. My head seemed ready to split asunder. I felt as though burning ashes were in my veins. At one time I remained leaning upon my table, holding my head with both hands; at another I marched with long steps up and down the room, like a soldier doing sentry in a cold of fifty-five degrees. I stood at the window looking at the surrounding gardens; the heights of Montmartre, the setting sun—forthwith reverie carried me a thousand leagues from my accursed opéra-comique. And when I returned, and my eyes fell upon the title written at the head of a sheet of paper still white, and obstinately waiting the other words with which I was bound to cover it, I felt overwhelmed with despair. I had a guitar leaning against my table—with a single kick I split it. On the mantelpiece two pistols looked at me with their round eyes—I contemplated them a long time. Then I began to strike my head with my fists. Finally, like a schoolboy who cannot do his lessons, I wept with furious indignation, tearing my hair. The salt water coming from my eyes seemed to solace me a little. I turned the muzzles of my observant pistols to the wall. I felt pity for my innocent guitar, and taking it up asked of it some chords, which were given without spite. My son, aged six, at that moment knocked at the door—in consequence of my bad temper I had unjustly censured him that morning. As I did not open, he cried, 'Father, wilt thou be friends?' and I, running to the door: 'Yes, my son, let us be friends. Come.' I took him on my knees, rested his blonde head upon my breast, and both of us went to sleep. I then gave up all hope of beginning my article: it was the evening of the third day. On the morrow I succeeded, I do not know how, in writing I do not know what upon I do not know whom. . . . That is fifteen years ago, and my torture still endures. Extermination! And to be always thus! Let them give me scores to write, orchestras to conduct, rehearsals to direct; let them make me remain eight hours, ten hours even, bâton in hand; to exercise choristers without accompaniment, myself taking up their points while beating time, till I spit blood and cramp stops my arm; let them make me carry desks, double-basses, harps, take down platforms, nail planks, like a commissionaire or a carpenter; let them next oblige me, by way of repose, to correct engravers' and copyists' faults all night; I have done it; I do it; I will do it; that belongs to my musical life, and I bear all without complaint—without even dreaming of complaint—as the huntsman endures cold, heat, hunger, thirst, the sun, showers, dust, mud, and the thousand fatigues of the chase. But eternally to feuilletonise for a living; to write nothings about nothings; to bestow tedious eulogies upon insupportable sillinesses; to speak this evening of a great master and to-morrow of an idiot with the same seriousness, in the same language; to employ one's time, intelligence, courage, patience at this work, with the certainty of not being able to serve the art by destroying abuses, removing prejudices, enlightening opinion, purifying public taste, and putting men and things in their right place. Oh! this is the height of humiliation. Better far be—a republican minister of finance."

No quotation could possibly throw more light than the foregoing upon the intense susceptibility of Berlioz' organisation. He was like an Æolian harp, so delicately strung that the faintest breath set him in vibration; while a disturbance that would have barely moved an average man threw him into convulsions. We saw him, some time ago, behaving like a madman under a love disappointment, but that could to some extent be understood. Not so the torture which wrung from him cries of anguish because he could not get an article fairly under weigh. We must not suppose, however, that the pain was unreal. "The heart knoweth its own bitterness," and of many forms of human suffering it may truly be said, "the stranger meddleth not therein."

In 1844 came a diversion from feuilleton writing. An industrial exhibition was held that year in Paris, and towards the close of its period Berlioz heard from Strauss, the dance composer, a suggestion that the building should be utilised for monster concerts. The idea seemed feasible, and the two musicians proceeded to work it out, after the usual contest with French officialism, in the shape of a Prefect who saw plots against the State in the most innocent of projects. A thousand and twenty-two executants having been engaged, and the programme drawn up, rehearsals began, and our master was again in his element. He tells us that he met every section of the orchestra separately, and went through the Scherzo of Beethoven's C minor Symphony with thirty-six double-basses some eighteen or twenty times. The great day came, and with it a crowd which surged over the barriers and filled every available place, delighting the heart of Berlioz with, at all events, an assurance against loss. Then the one thousand and twenty-two began, and we are told that the ensemble was miraculous:—

"The grandest effects were produced by the overture to 'Freischütz,' the Andante played by twenty-four horns; by the prayer from 'Moïse,' which was encored, and in which the twenty-five harpists, instead of arpeggios in simple notes played arpeggios formed of chords in four parts, thus quadrupling the number of strings in vibration, and giving the effect of a hundred harps; by the 'Hymn to France,' which was also redemanded, but which I declined to repeat; and finally by the Benediction of the Daggers from 'Les Huguenots,' which electrified the audience. I had twenty times doubled the soli of this great piece, so that eighty bass voices were employed for the four parts of the three monks and St. Bris. The impression produced upon the executants and the auditors nearest the orchestra passed all experience. As for myself, I was seized, in conducting, with such a nervous trembling that my teeth chattered as though I had a violent access of fever. Despite the non-sonority of the building, a musical effect comparable with that has not often been heard, and I was sorry that Meyerbeer could not be present to witness it. The terrible piece, which one might describe as written with electric fluid by a gigantic voltaic battery, seemed accompanied by flashes of lightning and sung by tempests."

The nervous excitability of Berlioz may be guessed when he goes on to say:—

"I was in such a state after this scene that it was necessary to suspend the concert for some time. They brought me some punch and clothes, and then, forming on the platform a small chamber with a dozen harps in their cases, I could, by stooping a little, undress and change even my shirt before the public without being seen."

The concert, though enormously successful, did not pass off without an untoward incident, which Berlioz may be allowed to describe:—

"As for the chorus from 'Charles VI.' . . . it made a special effect. It awoke the stupid instinct of opposition always fermenting among the people of Paris, and at the well-known refrain, three parts of the audience began to sing with the chorus. This was the protest of plebeianism and grotesque nationalism against the policy followed at that time by King Louis-Philippe, and it appeared to justify the attitude of the Prefect of Police towards the festival."

Guerre aux tyrans, jamais en France,
Jamais l'Anglais ne regnera!

The result was inevitable. Berlioz soon received an invitation to present himself before the authorities, charged with having clandestinely introduced the obnoxious chorus into his programme. Of this he quickly cleared himself, but thenceforth the censorship kept an eye on concert 'schemes,' and no piece could be performed without its sanction.

Strauss having followed Berlioz with a concert of dance music, the partners reckoned up their gains, and our master found himself in possession of 800 francs! This little sum he was called upon immediately to spend in search of the health which labour and worry had taken away. A medical friend came to see him, and recoiled at his altered appearance:—

"D. Ah! ça! What is the matter, Berlioz? You are as yellow as an old parchment! All your features bear the expression of fatigue and extraordinary irritation!"

"B. You speak of irritation. What should irritate me? You attended the festival. You know how it went off. I have had the pleasure of paying 4,000 francs to MM. les percepteurs du droit des hospices, and I have 800 francs left. What ought I to complain of? Is not this according to rule and order?"

(The doctor feels his pulse.)

"D. My dear fellow, you are going to have typhoid fever. You must be bled."

"B. Well, don't let us wait till to-morrow. Bleed me."

(The doctor bleeds him.)

"D. Now, do me the pleasure to leave Paris at once. Go to Hyères, Cannes, Nice, where you will, only go to the south to breathe the sea air, and think no longer of matters that inflame your blood, and excite your nervous system, already so irritable. Adieu, and don't hesitate."

Berlioz took his friend's advice, went to Nice, spent his 800 francs, recovered health, and, returning to Paris, resumed his labours not only as the Sisyphus of feuilletonists, but as the conductor of monster concerts, the director of the Théâtre Franconi instituting a series of performances in his Cirque. Concerning this enterprise the master's autobiography is reticent. Owing to acoustical defects, the music made but little impression, the expenses were enormous, and the receipts not in proportion—result, failure. So, once more disappointed, and worn out with excessive labour, Berlioz went south to recruit his health, finding the wherewithal to pay expenses in the receipts of a concert given at Marseilles and another at Lyons.

At the period now under review the published letters of the master addressed to his son Louis begin, and these may on no account be neglected, owing to the light they necessarily throw upon the writer's innermost feeling and character. The first is undated, but is supposed to have been written near the end of 1845, at which time Louis was a pupil of the Lycée National, Rouen.

"My dear Louis,—Thy mother is a little better, but she is still obliged to keep her bed and refrain from speaking. The least emotion beyond common would be fatal. Wherefore do not write to her such a letter as the last thou didst address to me. Nothing is more distressing than to see thee condemn thyself to inaction and sadness. Thou wilt be eighteen without the power to enter upon any career whatever. I have no fortune; thou wilt have no estate; upon what are we to live? Thou speakest to me always of being a sailor; thou hast then the desire to leave me; because, once upon the sea, God knows when I shall behold thee again. If I were free, entirely independent, I would set out with thee, and we would go together to tempt fortune in the Indies or anywhere else; but to travel one must be in easy circumstances, and having so little I must remain in France. Besides, my career as a composer fixes me in Europe, and if I left the Old World for the New I should have to abandon it entirely. I speak to thee now as almost a man. Thou wilt reflect and thou wilt comprehend. To sum up, let what will happen I shall be always thy best friend, and the only one entirely devoted to thee and full of unalterable affection. I know that thou lovest me, and that consoles me for all. Nevertheless, it would be very sad if at twenty thou wert useless to thyself and to the world. I send thee some envelopes to write to thy aunts. My sister Nancy speaks to me of thee; I send thee her letter. There is no lack of black wax. How shall I send thee some? One does not put sticks of wax in the post. Tell me more about thy teeth. Have they carefully cleaned them? Adieu, dear child. I embrace thee with all my soul."

For particulars concerning the second visit of Berlioz to the south of France we must turn to his "Les Grotesques de la Musique," where they appear in a short series of letters to "MM. Académiciens libres." The master had hopes of a good concert in Marseilles, that town having been, he declares, the first in France to understand Beethoven. "They played and admired the last quartets of Beethoven in Marseilles, while we in Paris were still treating the sublime author of those extraordinary compositions as a fool." In the end he was not disappointed. Nearly 800 persons attended, and Berlioz was for a time the hero of the town. What the people, as distinct from connoisseurs, said of him he learned one day through the agency of a garrulous omnibus-driver by whose side he sat. The driver had talked largely about Rachel, Félicien David, and other celebrities who had visited the town; and as Berlioz listened he touched by chance the horn as it swung in its place:—

"D. Ah! that knows you.

"B. What! why do you suppose horns know me?

"D. Farceur! do you think I am ignorant; it is you who gives the grand concerts of which everybody is speaking.

"B. Ah! how did you find that out?

"D. Parbleu! M. le conducteur, who is an amateur and has been to the theatre, told me.

"B. Well, since they speak of my concerts, what do they say of them? Let me know somewhat of these conversations, you who know all.

"D. Oh! I heard them well the other evening when the Trotebas gave you a serenade. The Rue de Paradis was so full nearly up to the Bourse that we asked if there was an extraordinary sale of coffee on, or if Monseigneur the archbishop gave his benediction. Not at all; they were doing honour to you. Then I heard what the amateurs said during the serenade. There was one, M. Himturn, who had come from Nismes to hear your music, he kept exclaiming, 'And the Hymn to France! and the Pilgrims' March!!' 'What pilgrims?' cried another, 'I haven't seen any pilgrims.' 'And the Cinq Mai! and the Adagio of the Symphony!!' No doubt he adores you out-and-out. Further on, a lady said to her daughter, 'Thou hast no heart, Rose; thou canst comprehend nothing of that; play contredanses.' But the most excited were two dealers in log-wood. They made more noise than the Trotebas. 'Yes, we must condemn all these vagaries. What! If he had had his way he would have put a cannon in his orchestra.' 'Go along; a cannon?' 'Certainly, a cannon; there is in the programme a piece called Pièce de campagne. It was at least a twelve-pounder he wanted to regale us with.' 'My dear fellow, you don't understand. That which you call a pièce de campagne is no doubt the Scène aux Champs, the Adagio of the Symphony. You are playing upon the words of the title.' 'Well, if there isn't a cannon, there is thunder at least, and at the end one must be a fool not to recognise the rolling of the thunder of God.' 'Quite right, that's what he wished; it is very poetic, and moved me much.' 'Don't tell me, poetic! If it was a walk in the country that he sought to put in music he succeeded very badly. Is it natural? Why that thunder? Do I go to my country house when it thunders?'"

Thus the garrulous coachman, Berlioz listening with eager ears and aching sides to the vox populi at second-hand.

When preparing a concert at Lyons, where the late M. Georges Hainl rendered valuable assistance, Berlioz met by chance his old guitar-master, Dorant, who had just arrived from Vienna. A pleasant incident resulted. "I am with you" said Dorant; "what instrument shall I play: violin, bass, clarinet, or ophicleide?" "Ah! dear master, it is easy to see that you don't know me. You will play the violin. Have I ever too many violins? Has any one ever enough?" "Very good; but I shall be a total stranger in the midst of your great orchestra, where I know nobody." "Make yourself easy, I will introduce you." All having assembled for rehearsal, Berlioz kept his word to the "dear master," "Gentlemen, I have the honour to present to you a very able professor of Vienna, M. Dorant; he has among you a grateful pupil, that pupil is myself. You will very soon conclude, perhaps, that I do him little credit; however, will you receive M. Dorant as though you thought the contrary, and as he deserves?" A round of applause followed, and Berlioz adds that he experienced a singular emotion in conducting the Marche au Supplice and Scène aux Champs as performed by, amongst the rest, his old guitar-master, whom he had not seen for twenty years. Another singular experience at this concert was the playing of the harp part by M. Hainl, who had never before essayed the classic instrument. M. Hainl succeeded perfectly, but, as the part contained only two notes, and as all the strings near C and G were removed to avoid mistake, the result is scarcely surprising. The Lyons enterprise did not prove remunerative, Berlioz receiving little more than a serenade and two anonymous letters; one full of abuse, the other from a "wounded amateur," who said, "One can be a great artist and also polite. The mouse can sometimes annoy the lion."

On returning home our master was requested by the authorities of Lille to compose music for some words written by Jules Janin to celebrate the completion of the Great Northern Railway. Lille, about to put itself en fête, and eat and drink largely, thought, says Berlioz, that a little music would encourage both festivity and digestion. The task was soon accomplished, and in good time the composer went down to the favoured town, rehearsed his piece, and got everything ready for the grand event. At that moment the captain of the artillery of the National Guard requested an interview:—

"C. I come, sir, to consult you on the subject of the pieces.

"B. Ah! Is there to be a dramatic performance? I did not know it; but it does not concern me.

"C. I beg your pardon, sir, the matter in question is the pieces of cannon!

"B. Ah! mon Dieu, and what have I to do with those —?

"C. You have to make an astounding effect in your work. Besides, you cannot help yourself; the cannon are in the programme; the public expect their cannon, and we must not refuse them.

"B. But how is your chorus made up?

"C. Our chorus?"

"B. Yes; your park. What are your pieces, and how many have you?"

"C. We have ten twelve-pounders.

"B. Pooh! that's very feeble. Can't you give me some twenty-fours?"

"C. Mon Dieu! we have only six twenty-fours.

"B. Well, give me these six principals and the ten choristers; next we will arrange all the mass of voices on the bank of the great moat near the esplanade, as close as possible to the military orchestra on the platform. Monsieur the captain will be good enough to keep his eye upon us. I will have a fire-work man at my side, and at the moment the princes arrive a rocket will go up, and then you will blaze off the ten choristers successively. Then we shall begin the performance of the piece, and you will have time to reload. Towards the end, another rocket will be fired, you will count four seconds, and at the fifth you will be good enough so to strike a grand chord all together with your ten chorister twelve-pounders, and the six principals of twenty-four, as that the ensemble of your voices shall coincide exactly with the last instrumental chord. Do you understand?"

"C. Perfectly, sir; that will go of itself. You can count upon it."

As the officer retired he was heard to say, "Tis magnificent; only musicians can have such ideas."

In due course the time came, the princes (De Montpensier and D'Aumale) arrived; all Lille was assembled, and Berlioz stood bâton in hand with a fire-work man by his side, when up ran the captain, panting for breath: "For heaven's sake, M. Berlioz, don't give the signal yet, our men have forgotten the matches, and one has gone to the arsenal for them. Give me only five minutes." Five minutes passed; then seven, and Berlioz received an intimation that the princes were waiting. "Go on," said he to the pyrotechnist, "and so much the worse for the choristers if they are not ready to light them up." The rocket flew heavenwards, but the cannon held their peace. The captain had not yet found his matches. Still Berlioz hoped for a master-stroke at the final chord. All would be right then, and confidently he gave the signal for the second rocket, which soared into the sky like its predecessor—with no better effect. The cannon, principals and choristers, all remained silent, and the good people of Lille dispersed, says Berlioz, "fully persuaded that the two rockets, of which they had heard the noise and seen the sparks, were simply a new orchestral effect invented by me, and agreeable enough to the eye."

WHY THE GREEKS MADE NO ADVANCE IN HARMONY.*

MANY reasons have been suggested why the ancient Greeks made no advance in what the moderns understand by harmony—that is, polyphony. To begin with, music differs in one important respect from other fine arts. It is largely assisted by physical science and mechanical appliances and skill, in which the ancients made relatively small progress. Moreover, in some regards, music resembles a language that at an early stage may be made the medium of commanding efforts of genius, but remains, nevertheless, barbarous, and requires centuries to attain, not only polish and style, but that suggestiveness and wealth of meaning which entertains the cultivated mind, independently of the ideas directly conveyed.

With the ancients, as we all know, music was a ministering muse to her sisters, poetry and the drama. Not that she was younger, but weaker; and would, under any circumstances, require a longer period to develop.

Irrespectively of the natural process of development, it has been thought that there were certain fundamental reasons why the Greeks made little progress in harmony.

They were admittedly an exquisitely sensitive people, and lived at a period, and under a moral and religious régime, in which the pleasures of the senses were cultivated for their own sake and made the basis of a worship. It is assumed that quality of tone, to us a mere material of the art, had for them an essential significance. Hence Plato has condemned the flute as immoral. To us, the musical interval we call a major third is, under particular conditions in regard to average power and register in the instrument, more or less agreeable. To the Greeks it was unpleasing, under most conditions, and in just or in pythagorean intonation. Their exceeding sensibility induced them, it is thought, to confine the use of such intervals—or, indeed, of any interval in harmony, except the octave and unison—to what we should now call the ritornello or interlude of the accompanying instruments; very often stringed instruments of the harp family, and probably weak even of their kind, on which the nuances of harmony would be undistinguishable. A major third, delivered with the strong timbre of the human voice, and particularly male voices, would, it is supposed, have been intolerable to the Greeks.

This very common solution—this physiological solution of the question—is pronounced by the author of "Perchè i Greci Antichi, &c.," to be "superficial." Signor Gamucci appears to be a disciple of Professor Abramo Basevi, whose investigations in regard to what harmonists understand by "auxiliaries" were noticed by Helmholtz, who adopted independently, and in a slightly different signification, the terms sensation and perception, the principles of which underlie the technical system of Basevi. In place of these terms, Signor Gamucci adopts the words, "physiological" and "psychological."

With a certain sense of weariness one is obliged to confess that all these terms are only verbal substitutes for sensibility and intelligence Fétis employed in his theory of tonality; or for the terms euphonic and dynamic, employed by musical theorists time out of mind. Basevi himself recognises the gradual development of the principles he adopts, and, whilst justly claiming the merit of his own labour and insight in regard to their special application, he gives a faithful epitome of the theories of his predecessors, most of whom, either expressly or by implication, acknowledged the "insufficiency," as Signor Gamucci would say, "of a theory of music exclusively physiological." And so far, Signor Gamucci is entirely agreed with the modern scientific theorists who admit at once that these questions of dissonances and scales are matters of habit, and that the raw musical sensation is modified by memory and perception. But, says Signor Gamucci, whilst Helmholtz adopts the terms sensation and perception, he only appeals to æsthetics and musical expression when his physiological theories begin to fail him.

The remark is quite fair; but, of course, Helmholtz and his imitators, taking up one side of the question, would naturally be inclined to force the bearing of physical facts. Signor Gamucci asks the pertinent question, "Are we to assume that the present progress in harmony is a growth of blind habit, or is it that the actual state of modern harmony only consolidates the effects of habit?" It cannot be supposed, as he says, that the physical organisation of modern ears differs from that of the Greeks; and if it be a question of artistic sentiment—that is of the æsthetic sense of beauty—in which, as Helmholtz insists, the Greeks must be accepted as unsurpassable models, they ought to have been the first to attain the advancement we find only in modern harmony.

As an alternative in the question, Signor Gamucci seems to imagine that between the physiological theory, which is admittedly insufficient to account for the evolution of music, and the æsthetical theory adopted as a pis-aller by Helmholtz, there is a well-determined place for a special psychological theory, independent of æsthetics.

Signor Gamucci's essay is written in the easy conversational style of the day, without scientific pretence, but it is to be feared that the literary element in its composition induces him to create theories from words rather than facts. We were particularly anxious to discover what the special and intermediate psychological theory might be; and we cannot say that it turns up anywhere in an intelligible and neatly defined form. By gradual inference we are led to assume that the "psychological theory" is only after all a resetting of the old principle of tonality. In our search for the theory we were carried, as a matter of course, under the guidance of an Italian of the present time, to Schelling and the German æstheticians. But, after a dip into objectivities and subjectivities, we were plunged without warning into the "speech-theory" of Herbert Spencer; and, apparently in complete innocence on the part of Signor Gamucci, that objections had been raised to any such theories of the origin of music. He is of opinion that so much was music with the Greeks a question of sensation and imitation, that it may be said they ascribed to sounds in music an office similar to that of the contortions of the body in the dance. "Every sound," he says, "was considered in itself alone as a possible imitation of a possible inflexion of voice, responding to an emotion of the mind. By degrees the sounds became the object of psychological operations, by dint of which they appeared to have a tendency to group, or, so to speak, organise themselves."

The latter part of this description points plainly to the embryonic principle of tonality, represented, as Signor Gamucci admits, in the tetrachord of the Greek system; and, in the same shape, it still survives as the basis of the modern system of technical harmony. The real question then, to be solved, is "Why the ancient Greeks made no advance in the development of this psychological principle of tonality?" The answer, we suppose, is that the main condition of the advance was the employment of harmony, which has the power of unsettling or of completely changing the tonality of any melodic passage; whereas, with the Greeks, not only were harmonic intervals in most cases repugnant to their subtle appreciation of the pleasures of sensation, but if "every inflexion of voice responded to an emotion of the mind," certain inflexions of sound would remain inviolable and unalterable, as representing a particular mood; which Signor Gamucci, unknowingly following an opinion already suggested by Addison, thinks was named after a particular tribe—such as Dorian, Æolian, &c.—to whose mode of speech it corresponded in regard to vocal inflexion, as in the various provincial dialects of all countries.

No doubt this inviolability and fixation of the Greek mode, not only in respect to the endings of the octave scales, or in the more musical sense in which they can still be utilised, but in regard to the political, moral, and educational purposes to which they were applied, is the most obscure and also the most interesting part of the question. Signor Gamucci, with his views in regard to the primitive and physiological state of the Greek musical mind, its intense sensibility and oriental proneness to symbolise and personify—for we must not forget that Greek music, like Greek philosophy, was exotic—is evidently amongst those who cannot credit the apparently fabulous effects attributed to the ancient modes, unless the means employed was something more than what we understand by musical.

There is, however, a little to be said on the other side. These marvellous effects are not peculiar to Greek history and Greek modes, or even to ancient history. There are certain traditions, more or less well founded, of similar effects, and even of mania, being produced by the minstrelsy of the early ages; but always amongst a rude people, or in the cases of heroes of a strong volitional, not to say brutish, nature. Modern and collegiate superstitions, in regard to the fellow-countrymen of Homer and Thucydides, may blind us as to the true nature of the Greeks. Admitting their extraordinary gifts, and the rude freshness of their sensations, there seems to be no particular necessity to search for extra-musical means in accounting for the marvellous effects of the modes. Those effects are, after all, not much more marvellous than the effects of a bagpipe on a modern Caledonian, the Dorian and true Spartan of the British Islands. And, with most people, it may be said that not all the "Dead Marches" of Handel, or the funeral marches of Chopin and Beethoven combined, can be compared, for one instant, in solemnity of effect, to the simply intoned miserere, providing the mise-en-scène is appropriate. This is a question of association, and remotely of sensation; for the lively imagination is fed by sensation. When we are told by Signor Gamucci that the psychological element was relatively absent in Greek music, we understand that it is the æsthetical element which ultimately leads to the gratification of the mere sense of beauty; and represents a degree of development following the physiological state of pure sensation and direct imitation. When an art is, to a certain extent, independent of sensation, and even of forms of beauty, estimated only for their own sake, the psychological element prevails, and the forms of art are estimated for the art's sake. In regard to music, it is doubtful if the Greeks ever attained even the æsthetical stage; and in that view of the case we can, perhaps, faintly understand why the absence of the psychological element prevented them from adopting, not only developments in harmony, but, as far as we can conceive of their musical attainments, anything like extended forms in any shape. We are rather inclined to be satisfied with the physiological theory in its simplest form, without any aid from the negative psychological theory. We can imagine that an ancient Greek, on hearing a symphony of Beethoven's, might gradually cull some meaning from the chaos of sound, could he be induced to stay and tolerate the absolute discords of the orchestra. There is, indeed, no necessity to travel back mentally to the age of Pericles to find Signor Gamucci's primitive and physiological state of development. In our own vaunted times, there are numbers to whom music is mainly a question of intonation, sensation, and direct pleasure. To them the dissonances in Wagner's music are abhorrent, and its dramatic meaning an enigma.

As we are told to expect wisdom from a multitude of councillors, there can be no doubt that we should in the present day be thoroughly acquainted both with the theory and practice of music; for the number of artists who, by virtue of their talents, have earned their right to be looked up to as guides is not only very large, but constantly increasing. But it must not be forgotten that there is a vast difference between matters of opinion and matters of fact. Grammarians may disagree as to the derivation of a word, and musical theorists may disagree as to the derivation of a chord, but the word and the chord mean the same to all. Passages may be recited, too, by two persons equally skilled in elocution, and works may be performed by two artists equally great as pianists, but the main principles of the recitation or performance are the same, and the expressed intention of the author is in each case strictly observed. Many modern executants, however, appear to be striving to convince us that composers were really not such good judges of their own intentions as those who interpret them. Hence we have the compositions of the great writers altered to meet the requirements of great pianists, and even editions published with passages printed, not, as it may be presumed, according to the manner in which the composer might have played them, but as the editor would play them himself. Some portions of the works of Beethoven we have heard performed and seen engraved, as we happen to know, in direct opposition to the composer's intention. Notes expressly intended to be bound are repeated; pianos are played forte, and fortes are played piano; a crescendo is transformed into a diminuendo, and a diminuendo into a crescendo; showy ornamental passages are inserted throughout pieces in no respect suited for such treatment; and a performer is freely forgiven for playing wrong notes in consideration of the extraordinary manner in which he plays the right ones. In no subject but music, we contend, could such unwarrantable innovations be tolerated; and those who resolutely refuse to learn of these teachers are the very best friends of the healthy progress of the art.

THE number of letters we constantly receive from earnest, zealous, and evidently talented young musical aspirants may be accepted as an undeniable proof of a growing want for sound education in the art, either gratuitous or within the means of those with very limited resources. Of course it will be urged that there are already many scholarships at various institutions which may be competed for without introduction, the successful candidate receiving free instruction for a limited period; but it must be remembered that these are prizes bestowed only upon those with such exceptional gifts as will enable them to make a name in the world of art, and thus justify the wisdom of the election. But there are also students not advanced enough, or perhaps not old enough, to gain a scholarship who might, with careful instruction, even raise themselves far above those who do gain it; and these are the persons for whom we plead, because we know that they have no means of pleading for themselves. In a communication received during the past month from a young lady who has already high testimonials of her musical powers, we are asked whether there is any possibility of cultivating those powers without encountering the large outlay necessary to procure a first-rate education from accredited professors. We do not print her letter because it is her express wish that we should not do so; but may say that her case is quite strong enough to press upon the consideration of wealthy patrons whether scholarships for those who will assuredly become good, if not great musicians, might not be instituted with benefit to general artistic progress. "I am utterly unable to obtain my heart's desire in becoming an Academy student," writes the correspondent to whom we have referred; and, alluding to the Mendelssohn Scholarship, she says, "no doubt it is foolishly ambitious of me to dream of that," so that here we have at least two important requisites in a student—enthusiasm and modesty.

So much has been said upon the subject of "encores" that we care not to reopen the question. The system is certainly on the decline; but it must be some time, we fear, before it is entirely abolished. Those, however, in the habit of frequenting the Opera must assuredly agree with us that the habit of showing appreciation of a vocalist's powers by covering the stage with bouquets is even more absurd than that of requesting her to sing a composition over again, for not only is it as effectual a stop to the action of the opera, but it makes her appear more ridiculous by compelling her either to deposit them one by one upon any chair or table which happens to be near, or to sweep them up in her arms and carry them off to the wing. Again, it often happens that when a bouquet is thrown between two ladies there is a division of opinion as to whom it was intended for; and although this causes some pretty little by-play before the audience, we cannot say what expressions of jealous feeling the incident may give rise to in the green-room. Our readers then will, we are sure, be glad to hear that bouquet-throwing has been abolished in the Royal Theatre at Munich; and we sincerely hope that so salutary an edict will have its effect upon other establishments. It is good that the listeners at an operatic performance should, at certain appropriate intervals, show their estimate of a singer even by calling her before the curtain at the conclusion of an act; but to destroy the dramatic effect of a work by forcing her to grope about the stage after bouquets—many of which we happen to know are by no means spontaneous tributes of admiration from the audience—is a positive offence to all real music-lovers; and we should feel much indebted to the authorities of the Munich establishment for setting us so excellent an example.

It is certainly an undoubted sign of the progress of music when we find that the terms especially belonging to the art are gradually creeping in to give titles to works which have not the slightest relation to sound. No doubt Mr. Whistler could scarcely define the kind of paintings which his peculiar talent prompted him to place before the public without having recourse to those words which were presumed to be exclusively confined to the description of musical compositions; and, considering how artists in colour and artists in sound naturally sympathise with each other, he may be forgiven for this act of appropriation. But there is a point at which the use of such terms becomes an abuse; and we could not therefore but feel a shock on reading in a periodical a short time since a description of a "Symphony in Red Brick." As we think it by no means unlikely that we may soon hear of an Overture in Terra-cotta, or a Fantasia in Portland Stone, it appears time to protest against such an absurd misappropriation of words; and, whilst on the subject, also to call attention to the fashion which has lately obtained of giving semi-musical titles to literary works. We have on a former occasion mentioned several books to which the names of well-known songs have been affixed by their authors; and although it does not appear that the contents of these productions have much relation to their titles, the practice still goes on. But, to crown all, now appears a novel called "Four Crotchets to a Bar." What this can mean we will not stop to inquire; but if authors christen their works with musical titles, may it not become the custom for composers to christen theirs with literary titles? Who knows but we may have an orchestral composition called "Sense and Sensibility," or a Sonata called "Mrs. Halliburton's Troubles"?

THE proceedings at Brighton, in connection with the competition of Orphéon Societies, next month, promise to be interesting, if not particularly valuable, in their bearing upon English music. It is stated that more than sixty Societies located in France, Belgium, and Switzerland have accepted the invitation of the Committee, and that these bodies will descend upon Brighton to the number of nearly 3,000 souls. We hope that they will not be disappointed, and our belief accords with our hope, since the arrangements are in experienced hands, well accustomed to the work abroad. According to present intention, the Societies will arrive in Brighton on Monday, September 5, and open the competitions on Tuesday, continuing them till Wednesday afternoon. The work will be done simultaneously in five places; and in the afternoon of each day certain selected choirs will give a concert, at which the co-operation of M. Gounod, M. Saint-Saëns, and other eminent musicians is promised. On the evening of Wednesday a torchlight procession will take place preparatory to the distribution of prizes; and Thursday is to be devoted to an open-air Fête and Ball in the Pavilion, at both of which the foreign visitors will be guests. Some surprise has been expressed at the exclusion of English Societies from the concours; but we are able to state on the best authority that this has arisen from the difficulty of classifying them. The Orphéon bodies, accustomed to such rivalry, can be handicapped at once on their public "form"; not so the English choirs, whose status would necessarily have to be arbitrarily determined.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

THE Baron Bódog D'Orczy's Opera "Il Rinnegato," produced on the 9th ult., although unquestionably doomed, after a most deceptive success, to that undisturbed repose enjoyed by the operas of those many noble amateurs who have by some means obtained a place before the public, is not to be despised as a good, honest piece of workmanship. We cannot but respect a composer who brings to his task sound musicianship, earnestness of purpose, and a powerful will to carry out that purpose to a legitimate conclusion; but some respect is also due to those who have to listen; and we are not overstating the fact when we say that anything more tedious, dreary, and positively uninteresting was never submitted to an operatic audience. For nearly four hours the principal characters continued to drag on a series of recitatives—in many places accompanied by some very excellent instrumentation—and though, as we have already said, even those most weary might acknowledge that in all this there was consistence of design, a few bars of positively defined melody would have been most gratefully accepted had the inexorable Baron so graciously willed it. The story is particularly unpleasant: Barnabas, the Renegade, is a Hungarian; and when Hungary is under Turkish rule, in order to obtain possession of Dora, niece of the Governor, he tears the cross from his breast and becomes a Mussulman. Then he stabs his rival, pursues Dora, who is about to take the veil, repents his apostasy, and at length is very properly strangled by the Turks. All this is mixed up with some supernatural effects, which seem only introduced for the sake of making the libretto a little less dreary, a "choir of angels" in the concluding scene being a decided relief from the sombre tone which pervades the Opera. It is scarcely fair to make Wagner responsible for the many colourless works which have lately been placed upon the lyric stage; but there can be no question that composers like the Baron D'Orczy would have written infinitely better operas had they never heard of the great reformer's tenets. The overture is a weak imitation of the introduction to "Lohengrin," and the long dramatic recitatives which are carried through the work remind us how unsafe it is for a composer to forsake the old school of opera unless he have genius enough to act with equal success upon the theories of a new one. Let us however mention that the ballet music, with the Hungarian and Turkish dances, was quite refreshing after the dulness of the dramatic portion of the work; and that the interpolated air sung by Dora received, as it deserved, a decisive encore. Signor Galassi was excellent in the ungrateful part of Barnabas, and Mdlle. Juch sang the whole of the music of Dora with much effect, her want of histrionic power being but little felt in so inanimate a character. Mdlle. Tremelli was everything that could be desired as the mother of the Renegade; Barnabas's rival Elemer was well supported by Signor Ravelli, and the rest of the characters were efficiently represented by Signori Novara, Rinaldini, Runcio, Monti, and Grozzi. The Opera was conducted by the composer, who was called forward the usual number of times, and "Il Rinnegato" will no doubt be added to the répertoire of the establishment, to be placed upon the stage next season should inquiries be made for it "at the box office." The subscription closed on the night of the production of the new Opera; but extra nights, at cheap prices, have been given, the establishment finally closing on the 22nd ult.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

THE performance of Meyerbeer's "Roberto il Diavolo" enabled Madame Fürsch-Madier to appear as Alice, and, if not to increase, at least to fully sustain her reputation. As Roberto Signor Mierzwinsky displayed much declamatory power, and indeed was heard to greater advantage than in any of his former characters, the music appearing to exhibit the very best portions of his voice. The revival of Hérold's Opera "Le Pré aux Clercs" confirmed our impression that, charmingly melodious as the music is, it is not suited for so large a stage as that of the Royal Italian Opera. Madame Albani was of course everything that could be desired in the character of Queen Isabella, and M. Soulacroix was a decided acquisition in the part of Mergy, his singing and acting throughout most thoroughly realising the intention of the composer. The principal soprano had what were strangely termed "gala nights" towards the end of the season, which concluded on the 23rd ult., the other members of the company, we presume, kindly consenting to be placed in the background on these important occasions.

LONDON MUSICAL SOCIETY.

THE second Concert of the season was given at St. James's Hall on June 30, under the conductorship of Mr. Joseph Barnby, the programme comprising Schumann's Cantata "The Pilgrimage of the Rose," Goetz's "Nœnia," Gounod's "Gallia," and Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, performed by Herr Reisenauer. The melodious Cantata of Schumann shows the composer in his very happiest frame of mind; and we sincerely hope that, after this excellent performance of the work, choral societies may be stimulated into admitting it permanently into their répertoire, not only on account of its intrinsic beauty, but because it presents no undue executive difficulties either for soloists, choir, or orchestra. The principal vocalists were the Viscountess Folkestone, Miss Trevena, Miss Vivian, Mr. Charles Wade, and Mr. Thorndike; and although we are aware that amateurs invite not criticism upon their efforts, we cannot refrain from warmly commending the intelligent and refined singing of the Viscountess Folkestone in the part of the Rose Maiden. Goetz's "Nœnia" is beginning to receive the attention it deserves, and on this occasion the choruses were given with remarkable precision and dramatic feeling; but we cannot agree with the system of assigning that portion evidently intended to be sung by the separate divisions of the choir to solo voices. Not only do we see no warrant for this in the score, but we do not think that the effect is good. Gounod's "Gallia"—a fine work, too rarely heard—was admirably given, the Viscountess Folkestone singing the soprano solo with much success. Not even the good playing of Herr Reisenauer could reconcile us to Liszt's Concerto, which, although containing many effective and showy passages for the principal instrument, we cannot agree with Mr. Hubert Parry (who analyses the composition in the programme) is a "brilliant and well-balanced work." There was a large and highly appreciative audience.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

AN interesting orchestral Concert was given by the students of this institution at St. James's Hall on the 1st ult., when a Pianoforte Concerto by Mr. George J. Bennett (Balfé Scholar), excellently played by Miss M. Willett, a "Te Deum" by Mr. W. Sewell (Novello Scholar), and a Part-song for female voices, called "Winter," by Mr. Ernest Ford, gave ample evidence, not only of the talent for composition existing in the Academy, but of the admirable manner in which that talent is directed. The choral music was efficiently sung under the direction of Mr. W. Shakespeare, who conducted the Concert with his accustomed ability, and the solo performers—the Misses Ellis, Gyde, and Evans (pianoforte); and Mr. Frank Arnold (violin)—acquitted themselves with much credit to themselves and their professors. The vocalists were the Misses Cornish, Myers, Woolley, Thudichum, Spencer, Jones, Clements, and Shackell, Messrs. B. Davies and L. Williams, all of whom were highly effective. M. Sainton kindly led the orchestra on the occasion.

HERR RUBINSTEIN AND MADAME MENTER.

THESE great artists, after being each a distinct centre of attraction, came together at Willis's Rooms on the 1st ult., when a Concert d'Invitation was given by the agents of Herr Bechstein, whose pianofortes were introduced to this country not long ago by Dr. Hans von Bülow. A large number of professors and amateurs attended, and the occasion was made a great success by unique rivalry and not less singular skill. A great feature was the association of both artists in works for two pianos, or for one instrument à quatre mains. To the first class belonged a Fantasia (Op. 73) by Herr Rubinstein, and to the second a selection from the same master's "Bal Costumé." Without desiring to prejudice the Fantasia, we may say that the "Bal Costumé" carried off the honours. It is a work in twenty sections, each descriptive of a pair of characters; as, for example, "Sauvage et Indienne," "Troubadour et Dame." The idea must be pronounced a happy one, especially for Herr Rubinstein, whom it enabled to display all his skill in characteristic and descriptive music. We quite expect to find selections from this varied and picturesque work become popular, and there was but one opinion as to the charm of those played by the composer and his fair associate. How they were played it is quite superfluous to tell. Subsequently, Madame Menter introduced Tausig's arrangement of Weber's "L'Invitation à la Valse," Herr Rubinstein following with Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 109, and Schumann's "Carnival," which he gave with astounding effect. So ended one of the most remarkable réunions of a season destined to take historic rank.

Concerning the last two recitals of Herr Rubinstein and the final one given by Madame Menter not much need be said, since they presented no new feature. Both artists played their best, fatigued as they must have been, and both had reason to be satisfied with the reward of their efforts in the form of large audiences and enthusiastic applause.

A HIGH DAY IN YORK MINSTER.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

THE placidity which becomes so venerable a city as York—and is, as a rule, enjoyed by that ancient place—was somewhat ruffled on Thursday, the 7th ult. Then might have been seen moving into the town, throughout the morning hours, unwonted bands of men, women, and boys, speaking excitedly in every shade of northern dialect, and spreading themselves through the streets before, by-and-by, converging upon the glorious Minster. They were exceedingly peaceful people, whom York welcomed with as loud an acclaim as its bells could give. Nothing was to be feared from them—not even, as we shall presently see, false notes: they were armed only with books, and marshalled solely by clergymen. Altogether, therefore, was the occasion one of harmonious procedure—a gathering as innocent in its aspect as in its purpose. But who were these harmless disturbers of the old town's somnolency? They were certain church choirs belonging to the dioceses of York, Ripon, and Durham, and they met for a grand festival in the Minster, partly at the instance, and in a great measure through the exertions of the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, M.A., whose name will not be read here for the first time in connection with good work done on behalf of Church Song. I am indebted to Mr. Metcalfe for a list of the parishes which, mainly through the efforts of the clergy, sent representatives to York, and I reproduce it to show the wide-spread interest manifested. From York diocese came the choirs of the Minster, Beverley (St. Mary's), Bramham, Dunnington, Middlesborough (St. John's), Scarborough (St. Martin's and St. Mary's), and Selby (Abbey); from Ripon diocese, those of Ripon (Cathedral), Armley, Bolton Abbey, Bramley, Huddersfield, Keighley, Knaresborough, Leeds (All Souls, parish church, St. George's), and Wakefield (parish church and Holy Trinity); from Durham diocese, those of Durham (Cathedral), Alnwick, Morpeth, and Newcastle (St. Peter's and St. Nicholas). In the large body thus constituted were 410 trebles, 59 sopranos, 102 altos, 39 contraltos, 147 tenors, and 158 basses; making a grand aggregate of 915 voices—not soft southern voices, bien entendu, but big resonant northern ones, adapted to make the "welkin" ring, much more to startle the sleepest echo reposing in the obscurest corner of the Minster. No slight task had these people gathered to perform. It involved something more than getting through a chant, a psalm-tune, and an easy anthem, since the pièce de résistance was nothing less than a new Church Oratorio, "St. John the Evangelist," composed for the occasion by Dr. Armes, organist of Durham Cathedral. Yet the utmost confidence in the ability of the singers was shown by those responsible for the success of the enterprise. It goes without saying that the choirs had been studying the music separately for some little time; but there was, at first sight, an appearance of risk in trusting to a single brief and hurried rehearsal. The danger, however, was much more in seeming than in reality. The managers knew perfectly well what they were about, and their complete justification will appear in the course of my remarks.

As the time for the Festival Service drew nigh, the Minster precincts put on a lively aspect. At first in twos and threes, and then in a stream, the members of the choirs, all wearing badges, passed through the door leading to the Lady Chapel, while a crowd of the good citizens of York besieged each of the entrances that gave access to unreserved places. Here let me say that the attendance of the public was by no means embarrassing in point of numbers. Few people seemed to have come from the country round, and the inhabitants of the town who had leisure or inclination to be present were not in strength sufficient to fill more than a part of the large available space. While a corps of wand-bearing and obliging stewards attended to these, and the sopranos of the choir marshalled themselves as near as possible to the seats reserved for their male associates, a surpliced procession formed itself in the Lady Chapel. This was done so expeditiously and well, that very few minutes had passed after the appointed time before the leading singers, passing to the north of the choir, appeared in the nave. No attempt at a processional hymn invited disaster at the outset. Owing to the conformation of the building, it could not have succeeded without precautions out of all proportion to any possible results, and the choirs did well to march to the sound of a voluntary played by the organist, Dr. Monk. The voluntary in question was clever, regarded as a study in suspensions; and, looking at the fact that the Minster organ is, by comparison with the edifice it serves, a puny thing,

The musical score is written for four voices (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. It is in the key of B-flat major (two flats) and 4/4 time. The tempo is marked 'a tempo' at the beginning and end, with 'pp' (pianissimo) dynamics. The score consists of three systems of staves. The first system contains the first line of the hymn. The second system contains the second line. The third system contains the third line, which includes a 'rall.' (rallentando) section followed by a return to 'a tempo'. The piano accompaniment is written in a grand staff (treble and bass clef) and provides harmonic support for the vocal parts.

I am not prepared to say that Dr. Monk could have made any better use of it. At the same time I would rather have seen the long procession unfold itself to the strains of some grand triumphal march, full of the dignity and jubilation becoming such an event. Many years ago I stood in the Paris Madeleine while the Corpus Christi procession passed down the church on its way to perambulate the exterior of the building, and I still have vivid and impressive recollections of the magnificent discourse of the organ. It was a musical commentary upon every feature of the pageant. But then the organ was that of the Madeleine, and the workman is ever at the mercy of his tools.

As soon as all had taken their places, a short Service began, the Psalms being chanted in unison to the "Grand Chant" and the Magnificat to Purcell in F; Dr. Monk conducting from a rostrum, and Dr. Armes presiding at an inefficient organ erected in the nave. The effect of the Grand Chant was partly lost by transposition to G; I longed to hear it trumpeted forth by those noble Yorkshire voices in the original key, yet throughout one could not but be impressed by so powerful a mass of tone, especially when, after each cadence, the "sound of many voices" was taken up and prolonged through the remoter parts of the building as though echoed by the "great cloud of witnesses" in whose presence, according to St. Paul, all things are done. The Anthem, that is to say, the Oratorio, followed the Collect, "Lighten our darkness," as usual, Dr. Monk still conducting, while the composer made himself responsible for a difficult accompaniment upon the inadequate instrument already pointed out.

The book of Dr. Armes's Oratorio is a compilation by the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, from the writings of the saint whose name it bears, and deals exclusively with incidents in the life of that personage. It is throughout historical, didactic, and impersonal, the object being to set forth events, not in dramatic guise, but simply as a text for religious homily. This perhaps accounts for the specific designation "Church Oratorio." In any case "St. John the Evangelist" is an extended musical sermon, full of high and noble lessons, based upon touching and beautiful incidents. The events are seven in number. First, after a choral prologue, "This is the love of God, that we keep His commandments," &c., comes "The Call"; and then, in order of mention, "At the Supper," "By the Cross," "At the Sepulchre," "At the Ascension," "Witnessing to the Faith," and "The Revelation." It should be observed that Mr. Metcalfe cuts down the narrative as much as is consistent with requisite clearness and fullness; hence there is no undue abundance of recitative. To this merit another must be added: the didactic selections are strictly in harmony with, and almost an inevitable consequence of, the texts with which they are allied. A few examples will be pertinent. The narrative tells us, "Now there was leaning on Jesus' bosom one of his disciples whom Jesus loved," and the preacher adds, "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the Sons of God: there is no fear in love; for perfect love casteth out fear. We love Him because He first loved us." Again the narrative: "He shall come in like manner as we have seen Him go into heaven," and again the comment: "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also which pierced Him; and all kindreds of the earth shall wail because of Him. Even so. Amen." Such strict relevancy as that here exemplified, added to the fact that the lessons are in no case unduly prolonged, avoids the tedium into which didactic oratorio so often falls, and Mr. Metcalfe may be congratulated upon the exercise of most sound judgment. Chorales are a feature of the musical work, and for these Mr. Metcalfe provides, not by writing or selecting sacred verses, but by an arrangement of the Biblical prose, as, for example, thus:—

Love not the world.
If any man love the world
The love of the Father is not in him
For all that is in the world
Is not of the Father:
The world passeth away,
But he that doeth the will of God
Abideth for ever.

The ingenuity which here admits the chorale without departing from Scriptural words must be admitted. At the same time I see no resultant good such as outweighs the advantage in "church oratorio" of well-known hymns set to familiar tunes. Depend upon it the old Lutheran practice was the best, and if the congregation can be given a part in works of this kind, and induced to take it, their ultimate popularity is very nearly assured.

Turning to the music, I must at once felicitate Dr. Armes upon a composition distinguished by very great talent and almost faultless taste—a composition indeed that, if its legitimate effect be produced, will give him a high place among rising English musicians. The subjects he has illustrated are, as we have seen, most varied in character, but Dr. Armes is equal to them, or, if he does not in every instance fully rise to the height of his great argument, he never falls below the point of interest and ceases to attract admiring regard. Speaking generally, the style of the work may be described as a happy compound of the strength of old English Church music with the sentiment of our own time. There are some who contend that present-day Church music is sinking to the effeminacy and sickliness characteristic of an "æsthetic" poet's gush. Well, there is always a tendency towards extremes, and because of this we should the more prize a composer who knows how to combine the gravity of the past with the grace of the present. Something analogous was done by the old architects when, as in the Choir of Gloucester Cathedral, they dropped elegant perpendicular Gothic upon massive Norman. The musician deals with more plastic materials, and can make homogeneous that which in architecture must ever remain sharply divided. Dr. Armes gives us a case in point. His freest passages seem but a natural development of the spirit which we all recognise as characteristic of and proper to the typical music of the English Church. The accompaniments are presumably intended for the organ, but it is clear that they were conceived with reference to an orchestra. And very properly so. The orchestra is, happily, coming into the Church, now that the Church begins to recognise its close relationship with the higher forms of sacred art, and the time may be at hand when every important composition intended for use in worship will have in view the employment of the noblest and fullest musical means.

From these general remarks I may pass to a few details without, it is to be hoped, risk of wearying the reader. The narrative at the opening of "The Call" is given in recitative, alternating with a tempo passages by all the basses; and we here meet with a distinctive feature of the work having undeniable advantages where the singers are equal to the difficulty presented. Here also the composer's careful and loving study of the text is happily exemplified. His music follows the Scripture closely, but without the crudeness and fidgetiness so often found in association with musical word-painting. Passing a melodious, if not very striking duet for tenor and bass, "That which we have seen and heard," we come to the ordination of James and John, and the bestowal upon them of the surname "Boanerges." The composer, seizing upon the idea conveyed in "sons of thunder," precedes and follows the recitative with majestic organ passages of significant import, between which and the following chorus, "If we walk in the light"—a canon four in two—a somewhat free accompaniment maintains a connection. The canon flows on smoothly, and the number ends with a passage in full vocal harmony, unaccompanied but for the interjected first phrase of the contrapuntal theme. Dr. Armes treats the narrative of "At the Supper" with touching simplicity, following it with another flowing and melodious duet, "Behold what manner of love," for soprano and tenor. This section is very brief, and at once closes with a chorale, "Love not the world." The recitative portion of "By the Cross" also shows the composer at his best, and strengthens a growing conviction that he is largely qualified to deal with dramatic subjects. An unaccompanied chorus, "Hereby we know," will commend itself to lovers of what is grave and cold in Church music, and serves to throw into greater relief the recitative immediately following, "Jesus said, 'It is finished,'" &c. Here I must be permitted to make a quotation, by way of illustrating the happy, and to say the least, unhackneyed thoughts met with in Dr. Armes's treatment of the narrative. The subjoined passage will speak for itself:—

Largo. BASS. p
And He bow'd His head and

This leads directly to a bold and massive chorus, "We have seen and do testify," a prominent feature in which is a continuous counterpoint of quavers in the bass accompaniment. Dr. Armes has written nothing better adapted to create an impression in his favour. Passing to "At the Sepulchre," further excellence in the treatment of recitative demands notice; and we also meet with an interesting, though in places slightly "angular," contralto solo, "They have taken away the Lord." A trio and chorus, "This is God's commandment," is remarkable for an accompaniment for the organ of decided originality. This number brings the section to an end. "At the Ascension" is introduced by an extended instrumental movement, and noteworthy for a picturesque recitative, "And when the Lord had spoken," declaimed by all the sopranos. There are also a dignified duet, "Ye men of Galilee," and a grave chorus, "He shall come," leading to a bass air with chorus, "Behold He cometh with clouds," many passages in which are of striking beauty. The sixth section, "Witnessing to the Faith," includes a soprano air, "These are they," upon which Dr. Armes has lavished all his skill with corresponding effect. Other numbers that should not be passed over are an elaborate quartet, "Blessed are the dead," and a final chorus, "Unto Him that hath loved us," which brings the Oratorio to a noble and dignified end.

I do not apologise to the reader for troubling him with these details, and, if he desires to know why not, let him see the reason in the work itself. As for the choice of it at York, I say with emphasis that the managers could have done nothing better, especially in regard to the important duty of cultivating musical talent within the pale of the Church. It was doubtless open to them to select some well-known and favourite composition; but had this course been followed I should not now have brought under the notice of thousands of readers an Oratorio which, in all sincerity, I look upon as a credit to English music.

The performance was, on the whole, surprisingly good. Scanty rehearsal notwithstanding, the choirs kept well together under the energetic guidance of Dr. Monk, and assisted by the admirably played accompaniment of Dr. Armes. No serious hitch occurred from first to last, while many of the concerted numbers were given with a power and precision that satisfied all and astonished some who knew not of what these northern singers are capable. No doubt the effect would have been better had the choirs occupied a platform facing down the nave, but, disadvantages apart, there was really no cause for complaint. I should add that the soprano solos were sung by Miss Jones, and those for contralto by Miss Orridge. Unhappily I do not know the names of the surpliced gentlemen to whom the tenor and bass airs were confided, or I would mention them in connection with an opinion that they did their work exceedingly well, and gave entire satisfaction.

There is little more to add. At the close of the prayers, the "Old Hundredth" was sung in unison while the offertory was made, and after the blessing choirs and congregation dispersed, satisfied with an experience full of pleasure, and significant of a good time coming in which the Church will resume her place as the "nursing mother" of sacred art. For this result honour to Mr. Metcalfe, to Dr. Armes, to Dr. Monk, and all who helped to bring it about.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.—CONFERENCE ON ORGAN CONSTRUCTION.

THE Council of the College of Organists have just issued a Report giving the result of their review of the opinions expressed in the course of the series of Public Conferences on Organ Construction held during the early part of the present year.

It must be well known to many of our readers that organists labour under exceptional difficulty in performing upon their instrument, owing to the fact that, in addition to the vast complexity of the resources to be controlled, it is exceedingly rare to find two organs with identical external arrangements. Even in so essential a matter as the relative position of pedals and manuals no absolute rule is uniformly observed. The position of the draw-stops again would seem to follow no higher law than that of chance, or the convenience or whim of the builder; and the methods of locking or unlocking the swell pedal are as diverse as the corresponding treatment of country gates. Each builder seems to pride himself on discovering some new way by which to accomplish this very simple end.

The unhappy organist, when called upon to perform on a strange instrument—and this generally happens before a critical audience—finds all his former experience of little use to him. The pedals are possibly one note to the left or right of his ordinary experience. The swell draw-stops are in the place where he would look for the great draw-stops, and the pedal stops in the position in which he expects to find the choir stops. The fixing of the swell pedal is an enigma, and the only mental note he can make as to the arrangement of the composition work is that it is contrary to all his experience, and very inconvenient.

It was to provide a remedy for this disagreeable and unnecessary variety in the external incidents of the instrument that the Council of the College of Organists first called the Conference, and invited the expression of opinion from those interested in, and competent to advise on, the several points from time to time submitted for consideration. The result of the Conference has been carefully balanced with other collateral evidence, and the Council now give the result in a series of Resolutions and Recommendations. We trust they will receive the well-merited attention of organ-builders and others, as the adoption of any such plan of uniformity cannot but advance the art of organ-playing.

The chief decisions of the Council are expressed as Resolutions, while certain other points, less essential for uniformity's sake, are expressed as Recommendations.

We append both Resolutions and Recommendations:—

RESOLUTIONS.

1. That the compass of the pedals be from CCC to F, i.e., thirty notes. 2. That the pedals be parallel. 3. That the pedals be concave, with radial top facings; and that the concavity be the arc of a circle having a radius of eight feet six inches. 4. That the length of the centre natural key of the pedals be not less than twenty-seven inches. 5. That the front of the pedal sharps form an arc of a circle having a radius of eight feet six inches; and that the length of the centre short key of the pedals be not less than five and a half inches. 6. That the pedal scale be two and three-eighths inches from centre to centre of two adjacent natural keys. 7. That a plumb-line dropped from the middle C of the manuals fall on the centre C of the pedal-board. 8. That a plumb-line dropped from the front of the great organ sharp keys fall two inches nearer the player than the front of the centre short key of the pedal-board.

9. That the height of the upper surface of the great organ natural key, immediately over the centre of the pedal-board, be thirty-two inches above the upper surface of the centre natural key of the pedal-board. 10. That the relationship between manuals and pedals be subservient to the fixed relative position of the great manual keyboard and the pedal-board already defined; it being understood that the position of the great manual will determine the position of the other manuals. 11. That it is undesirable to alter the relative positions of the several manual keyboards as commonly found in English organs, viz., swell above the great, choir below the great, solo above the swell. 12. That the compass of the manuals shall be from CC to G in alt at least, i.e., not less than fifty-six notes. 13. That the length of manual natural keys be five and a half inches, and the amount of overlapping of the upper manual keyboards be one and a half inches. 14. That the height from the upper surface of the natural keys of one manual to that of the next manual above it do never exceed three inches.

15. That the position of the great organ draw-stops be on the right-hand side of the performer. 16. That the position of the swell organ draw-stops be on the left-hand side of the performer. 17. That the position of the choir organ draw-stops be on the right-hand side of the performer. 18. That the position of the solo organ draw-stops be on the right-hand side of the performer. 19. That the position of the pedal organ draw-stops be on the left-hand side of the performer. 20. That the position of the draw-stops of the couplers be on the left-hand side of the performer. 21. That the several groups of draw-stops be placed in following relative positions: Left-hand side from top to bottom—swell organ, pedal organ, couplers. Right-hand side from top to bottom—solo organ, great organ, choir organ.

24. That the order of composition-pedals, vents, thumb pistons, or other mechanical means of combination, from piano to forte, be in all cases from left to right; and that the various sets shall be distinctly grouped. 25. That the several groups of composition pedals stand in the following order from left to right from the front panel: pedal organ, swell organ, great organ. But if pedals are applied to the couplers that they be placed between the swell and great compositions; and that if composition pedals are applied to the choir and solo organs that they project from the right jamb.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. That the consideration of organ-builders be directed to the widely expressed desire for some means of operating on the swell, in addition to the ordinary swell pedal. 2. That there should be some contrivance to fix the swell pedal at any point of its descent at the will of the performer. 3. That some plan be devised to bring the swell shutters into operation more gradually, so as to place the crescendo and decrescendo perfectly under the control of the performer.

4. That the composition pedals affecting the great organ include proportionate combinations of the pedal organ; but that a vent be provided to shut off the pedal organ to a soft sixteen-foot tone by draw-stop and double-action pedal. 5. That the more important and commonly used couplers should be acted upon by pedals as well as by draw-stops. 6. That the great to pedal coupler have a draw-stop knob both on left and right-hand sides of the manuals.

7. That the draw-stops project from perpendicular jambs. 8. That in the case of large organs the draw-stop jambs be placed obliquely. 9. That no key-slip be placed between the different manual keyboards.

10. That the short keys of the pedals be either lengthened or raised at the back, in such a way as to assist in the cultivation of a more legato style of pedalling.

11. That the consideration of organ builders be directed to the desirability of securing all centre-pins in the various actions.

12. That the attention of those engaged in the preparation of organ specifications be directed to the desirability of including sixteen, eight, and four-foot pedal organ stops, of characteristic qualities of tone, suitable for melodic use.

THE Distribution of Prizes for the academical year, to the students at the Royal Academy of Music, took place in the concert-room of the Institution on the 23rd ult. The awards were to have been presented by Mrs. Gladstone, but in consequence of ill-health she delegated the duty to her niece, Lady Frederick Cavendish, who appeared much interested in the proceedings, and at the conclusion of the ceremony addressed a few kindly words to the audience. After a brief Concert, conducted by Mr. William Shakespeare, the Principal, Professor Macfarren, delivered an eloquent address, in which he spoke of the continued prosperity of the Institution, and thanked the professors for the interest they continued to evince in the welfare of the Academy, not only in their teaching, but during a very long and arduous examination. The prizes were then distributed as follows, the recipients being warmly applauded as they advanced to the table: The Charles Lucas Silver Medal (for the Composition for Chorus, Orchestra, and Organ, of the rooth Psalm), George John Bennett; the Parepa-Rosa Gold Medal (Singing), Benjamin Davies; the Sterndale Bennett Prize, purse of ten guineas (Pianoforte), Annie Cantelo; additional prizes, purses of five guineas (presented by W. Dorrell, Esq., and Charles Hallé, Esq.), Rose Goode and Mary Bruce Sanderson; the Llewelyn Thomas Gold Medal (for Declamatory English Singing), Annie Grey; the Evill Prize, purse of ten guineas (for Declamatory English Singing), Frank May; the Heathcote Long Prize, purse of ten guineas (Pianoforte), Herbert Lake; the Santley Prize, purse of ten guineas, (for Accompaniment and Transposition), Percy Stranders. Certificates of Merit to Pupils who have previously received Silver Medals, being the highest award of the Academy: Effie Clements, Beatrice Davenport, Lucy Ellam, Rose Evans, Elizabeth Foskett, Amy Gell, Amy Hare, Maud Willett, William G. Wood. Silver Medals: Annie Balfour, Annie Cantelo, Ellen Ellis, Emily Elvey, Florence Taylor, Gwenllea Thomas, Ernest Ford, Alfred Izard, Frank Arnold, Walter Barker, George John Bennett; and a prize Violin Bow, presented by Mr. James Tubbs (for Violin-playing), German Jones. A large number of Bronze Medals were also given, and several Students received Commendations.

A FESTIVAL Service was held at the Church of St. Peter, Eaton Square, on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 6th ult., being the octave of the festival of the patron saint. The choir of the church, strengthened in the treble by choristers from the Temple Church, and in the other parts by members of various choirs, chiefly amateur, was supported by an orchestra of about forty performers, led by Mr. Ralph, in addition to the large organ of the church, at which Dr. Bridge presided. The "Service of Praise"—to quote from the papers distributed in the church—was preceded by a few well-chosen words from the vicar, the Rev. G. H. Wilkinson, at the close of which the Festival Evensong was commenced by the orchestra with the slow movement from Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor. The effect of the opening bars was marred by an unfortunate slip in the horns, coupled with a slight uncertainty in the other wind parts, which latter defect was not altogether overcome throughout the service; the tempo, moreover, at which the movement was taken was decidedly too quick: the Service, however, composed for the Gloucester Festival of last year by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, received, on the whole, a very satisfactory rendering. To the work itself we have alluded already, as our readers may remember, on the occasion of its original production last year, and now that it has appeared in a printed form we purpose to speak more particularly of it in another portion of our columns; here, however, we may add that the picturesque and important bass solo in the Nunc dimittis was well interpreted by Mr. Bell, of the choir of Westminster Abbey, while the treble solo which is the feature of the Magnificat was, as at Gloucester, entrusted to a member of the St. Peter's Choir, namely, Master Carington, to whom the Service is dedicated. Spohr's Cantata, "God, Thou art great," which filled the place of the Anthem, was perhaps the most successful portion of the Service; the soloists were those already named, with the addition of Messrs. Sexton and Bryant for the duet "Children, pray this love to cherish." Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia" preceded the Cantata, and at the close of the Service the War March of the Priests was played by the orchestra as an out-voluntary. Mr. W. de M. Sergison, Organist of the church, was the Conductor.

THE Worcester Musical Festival commences on Sunday afternoon, September 4, at three o'clock, with a special Service in the nave of the Cathedral. The Rev. W. J. Butler, M.A., Canon of Worcester, will preach the sermon, and the musical portion will include Attwood's Anthem "I was glad," Magnificat and Nunc dimittis by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, Organist of Gloucester Cathedral, Spohr's Cantata "God, Thou art great," and the Old Hundredth Psalm. On Tuesday morning "Elijah" will be given; on Wednesday morning a new Cantata by Mr. A. J. Caldicott, "The Widow of Nain," conducted by the composer, Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, and Handel's "Jephtha," with Mr. Arthur Sullivan's additional accompaniments; on Wednesday evening, in the Cathedral, "Engedi" (Beethoven), and Parts I. and II. of Haydn's "Creation"; on Thursday morning Cherubini's Grand Mass in D minor (No. 2), and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise"; and on Friday the "Messiah." A special closing Service will take place in the nave of the Cathedral on Friday evening, when a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis composed for the Festival by the Rev. E. V. Hall, Spohr's Overture to "The Last Judgment," Handel's Anthem "The King shall rejoice," and Mozart's Anthem "O God, when Thou appearest," will be given. There will be secular Concerts at the College Hall on the evenings of Tuesday and Thursday; a special feature at the second Concert being a Cantata by Mr. A. C. Mackenzie, called "The Bride," written expressly for the Festival, and to be conducted by the composer. The principal vocalists are Madame Albani, Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Anna Williams, Miss Hilda Wilson, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Smith, Mr. Dyson, Mr. Maas, Mr. F. King, Mr. Millward, and Mr. Henschel. Mr. Done, as usual, conducts; Mr. C. H. Lloyd, Mus. Bac., presides at the organ; and Mr. Langdon Colborne, Mus. Bac., at the pianoforte and organ at the early morning services.

THE Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind gave an interesting Concert on the 23rd ult., at the Alexandra Palace. The programme was an ambitious one, including Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor, Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianga," Schumann's "Die bieder Grenadiere," and other pieces by Spohr, Gounod, and Sullivan; but the excellence of the performance however fully justified the selection. The pieces named were accompanied by a complete and efficient orchestra, selected from the best London professors; and the whole of the vocal music, soli and chorus, was sung by the pupils of the College. A better performance of the "Woman of Samaria" has rarely been heard; several numbers were redemanded by the audience, who frequently gave audible expression of their satisfaction. Between the parts the blind students wrote from dictation a four-part composition with which they had no previous acquaintance, and immediately afterward sang it at sight, their fingers doing duty for eyes. In the second part of the programme encores and recalls were the order of the day. The Mendelssohn Capriccio was conducted by Mr. Fritz Hartvigson, and the whole of the other music by Mr. W. H. Cummings. The Concert afforded indisputable evidence that the pupils of the College are fully competent to take their places in all concert-work, whether as soloists or part-singers.

THE last Concert of the fifth series of Chamber Music, given by Messrs. Ludwig and Daubert, took place at the Royal Academy Rooms on Thursday evening, the 7th ult. The programme, richer in interest perhaps than any immediately preceding it, contained the marvellously wrought-out Quartet in C sharp minor, Op. 132 (Beethoven), the Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, in A major, Op. 26 (Bennett), and the Quartet in G major, Op. 64 (Haydn). Each of the above works had full justice accorded it, the intricate and extremely difficult Quartet by Beethoven being given with clearness and unity of purpose. The rendering of the Trio by Bennett, however, might be said to have been attended with the greatest success. Messrs. Ludwig and Daubert, efficiently aided by Madame Frickenhaus, revealed to perfection the melodious thoughts and musicianly devices of the composer. Herr Daubert displayed his fine tone and broad phrasing in solos by Locatelli and Rameau, and Mr. Bernard Lane gave the utmost satisfaction by his artistic singing of Handel's recitative and air, "Deeper and deeper still" and "Waft her, angels." An excellent accompanist was found in Mr. J. B. Zerbin. The sixth season of these admirable Concerts will be looked forward to by many true lovers of music with pleasurable expectation and best wishes for success.

An interesting Concert was given at the Royal Academy of Music on Wednesday, the 6th ult., when a Cantata entitled "Narcissus and Echo," by Mr. Edwin Such, was performed for the first time. The legend upon which the work is founded offers itself freely to musical purposes, and the librettist, whose name was not given in the book of words, has treated it with a fair amount of skill. The name of the composer was unfamiliar to the public, but he is evidently a thoughtful musician, having, we believe, studied under Dr. Ferdinand Hiller. He writes well for voices; and several numbers in his Cantata are graceful and melodious. The most noticeable defects are a want of variety and facility in orchestration, both of which may be the result of inexperience. This is the more probable as Mr. Such showed but little knowledge of the art of conducting in his direction of the work, and the performance suffered in consequence. But the orchestra and chorus were of good quality, and the principal vocalists, Miss Mary Davies, Miss Hope Glenn, and Mr. W. H. Cummings rendered full justice to their share of the music. "Narcissus and Echo" was followed by a short miscellaneous selection, including Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Spohr's dramatic Violin Concerto (played by Herr Ludwig), and Schumann's Chorus, "Gipsy Life."

DEAN STANLEY's funeral in Westminster Abbey, on Monday, the 25th ult., was an impressive ceremony. The Prince of Wales and other members of the Royal Family and many of the eminent men of the day attended. The musical portions of the Service were admirably rendered by a large choir formed from the regular choir of the Abbey, the Special Service choir, and members of the Chapels Royal. Croft's and Purcell's music was used, but perhaps the most striking selection was the dirge by Sir John Goss, "And the King said to all the people." More pathetic and grand music was surely never written by this composer. The solo portion was impressively given by Mr. Hilton, and the chorus, abounding as it does in delicate light and shade, was done full justice to by the excellent choir. The Dead March in "Saul" (which is cleverly engrafted on to the dirge) had a most solemn effect, being played as the body was moved from the choir to the chapel of Henry VII. The sentences at the grave were sung unaccompanied, and after the interment the choir and mourners proceeded to the nave, when Handel's Funeral Anthem "His body is buried in peace" was sung by the complete choir of about eighty voices, Dr. Bridge conducting and Mr. W. J. Winter taking his place at the organ. Beethoven's Funeral March was played as the congregation dispersed.

THE Report issued by the Rev. Thomas Helmore, Mr. Kellow J. Pye, Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and Dr. Stainer—the judges appointed to act in the competition for the prize of £10 10s. offered by the Madrigal Society for the best madrigal—states that out of thirty-eight compositions forwarded, four were selected for a trial performance, which was held at the Freemasons' Tavern on the 13th ult. From these four, one was chosen, which proved to be composed by Mr. Frank L. Moir. No. 16, "When as at Chloe's eyes I gaze," No. 17, "To Music," and No. 34, "O too cruel fair," however, are specially commended, and a hope is expressed that the composers of these three madrigals, as well as other competitors (some of whose compositions showed great promise) will be encouraged again to send in works for the Annual Prizes about to be established by the Madrigal Society, and by the liberality of one of its members.

WE have no desire to inquire into the causes which have led Messrs. Schulz-Curtius to separate from Mr. Franke and Herr Richter; but having in our last number mentioned that the Richter Concerts will be continued as usual next year, we think it necessary to inform our readers that the "Symphony Concerts," the prospectus of which has just been forwarded to us, although announced as the "Fourth Season," have nothing whatever to do, except in the character of the programmes, with the series of performances so ably carried on by Herr Richter. They are placed under the conductorship of Mr. Charles Hallé, and announced to commence on Monday, May 1, 1882. Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Pastoral Symphony, and Mass in D, Schubert's Symphony in C major, Schumann's "Faust," and Berlioz' "Harold" Symphony will be included in the six Concerts of the series, besides several overtures, concertos, and solos, to be played by eminent artists. The orchestra will be composed of ninety performers; and the Beethoven Choir will assist in the choral works. Mr. Otto Peiniger will direct the Choir; and negotiations are pending with Mr. August Wilhelmj as leader of the band.

AT the twenty-fifth annual Concert of the Southwark Choral Society, to commemorate the event it was decided by the members to present Mr. J. Courtney, the Conductor, and Mr. J. West, the Secretary, with some token of respect and esteem, they having originated the Society, and filled those offices since its commencement. Accordingly, on the 12th ult., at the weekly meeting for rehearsal, a handsomely engraved tea and coffee service was presented to each of these gentlemen. In making the presentation Mr. Barr, the librarian, said that the ladies and gentlemen of the Society believed in deeds, and not in words only, and asked Messrs. Courtney and West to accept these tea and coffee services, which he presented to them in the name of the Society, as showing the high estimation in which their services were held. Mr. J. Courtney and Mr. West, who were cordially greeted on rising, acknowledged the gift in suitable terms. An appropriate inscription was engraved on each service.

THE annual business meeting of the Tonic Sol-fa College was held on Saturday, at the Aldersgate Street Rooms, Mr. J. S. Curwen presiding. The Report, read by Mr. R. Griffiths, the Secretary, stated that the total receipts for the year were £1,201 11s. 2d., and the total expenses £1,114 15s. 8d. The work of the year had been heavy and increasing, and the movement was proved to be growing in extent and in public appreciation. A total of 11,237 certificates in musical knowledge had been granted. The Chairman welcomed the severe criticism to which the system, on account of its success, was now being subjected, and hoped they would go on to perfect themselves as teachers and as artists, and continue the popular musical education which they had begun. Mr. A. J. Ellis, F.R.S., said the system was not only popularly successful, but scientifically true. Several other addresses were also delivered.

THE Kilburn Musical Association concluded its third season on Tuesday, the 5th ult., at the Kilburn Town Hall, with an excellent performance of "Judas Maccabæus." The high reputation of the choir was fully sustained, the music being rendered in a manner which reflected the greatest credit on the members and their conductor. The solo vocalists were Mdle. Enequist, Mdle. Wennberg, Miss Allitsen, and Messrs. Ben Davies, Dunman, and Walter F. Clare, all of whom were very successful, the frequent encores testifying to the effect produced on the audience. Miss Gollmick presided at the piano, and Mr. Hugo Beyer at the harmonium. The zealous and indefatigable Conductor, Mr. Adolph Gollmick, received at the close of the performance a suitable ovation on thus ending a very successful season.

ON the 13th ult. the members of the Birkbeck Violin Class presented their tutor, Mr. W. Fitzhenry, with an address signed by the members, and a silver salver with an inscription. Mr. Fitzhenry, in thanking the Class, said it was always his aim to bring them to as high a standard of efficiency as possible. About eighty members were present.

A SERVICE of Sacred Music was given by the members of the Marylebone Presbyterian Church Choral Society on Friday evening, the 22nd ult., the Rev. Donald Fraser, D.D., pastor, presiding. The first part of the programme was miscellaneous; the second part being a selection from "Judas Maccabæus." The singing of the choir, which has only recently been formed, reflected credit on its Conductor, Mr. Sinclair Dunn. The soloists were Miss Ella Hall (mezzo-soprano), National Training School; Miss Effie Clements (soprano); Miss Rose Dafforne (contralto); Mr. Sinclair Dunn (tenor); and Mr. Frank May (bass); students at the Royal Academy of Music. The accompanists were Mr. W. G. Wood, F.C.O., and Mr. Cecil Goodall, R.A.M. There was a large and appreciative audience.

MISS FRANCES SMITH gave a morning Concert at Harley Street on June 23, which was fully and fashionably attended. The young artist, who we believe is still pursuing her studies at the Royal Academy of Music, displayed her skill as a pianist in Chopin's Ballade in G minor, a charming duet by Otto Goldschmidt for two pianos (assisted by Mr. J. C. Forrester) and in several other pieces; the delicacy and refinement of her playing and vigorous touch securing the sympathetic attention of her audience. The vocalists were Madame Marie Klanwell, Miss Clara Samuël, Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, and Mr. W. H. Cummings. Messrs. Ralph and Oberthür performed solos on their respective instruments, and the Concert was conducted by Mr. Arthur O'Leary.

THE following were the successful candidates in the recent examinations for musical diplomas of Trinity College, London: Licentiate—Louise Dicks, London; Harry Thornton Jewson, Trinity College. Associateship—Alice Maria Buckley, Carmarthen; William Henry Cross, Liverpool; William Anstey Dyer, Daventry; Dawson Crisp Wilson Ewer, King's Lynn; Eleanor Mercy Jones, Leeds; Julia Nash, Canterbury; Richard Frederic Tyler, Trinity College; Edwin Walker, Chapel-en-le-Frith; James William Wallis, Trinity College; Mary York, Trinity College. The examiners were A. E. Dyer, Mus.D., Sir George Elvey, Mus.D., James Keene, F.R.C.S., C. Hubert H. Parry, M.A., Mus.B., A. L. Peace, Mus.D., W. H. Sangster, Mus.D., and D. J. Wood, Mus.B.

THE prospectus of the Stockport Musical Society announces for its second season, 1881-2, four Concerts, to be held in the Armoury, Greek Street, commencing on Wednesday, October 26. There will be an efficient orchestra, selected from the bands of Messrs. Hallé and De Jong, and a choir numbering 100 voices. The first and third concerts will be miscellaneous; at the second the "Messiah" will be given, and at the fourth Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." At the miscellaneous concerts the solo instrumentalists engaged are Mr. Charles Hallé (pianoforte) and Madame Norman-Néruda (violin); and the vocalists Miss Catherine Penna and Miss Catherine Pickering. The Director and Conductor is Mr. Joseph Bradley, Mus. Bac.

THE scheme of handing over the interests of Italian Opera to a company, which has for some time been talked about, has now taken form. The Royal Italian Opera and Her Majesty's Theatre are to be united, and Mr. Ernest Gye undertakes the management for the company in London, whilst Mr. Mapleson acts in the same capacity in the United States for a period of ten years. As Mr. Gye is said to have proved to the Directors that a net income of £40,000 per annum may be fairly expected to be realised it need scarcely be said that, commercially speaking, the speculation promises well. Its effect upon art we can scarcely yet foresee.

THE Annual Service of the Bishop of London's Fund was held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday afternoon, the 5th ult. The setting chosen for the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was the well-known one by Gounod composed some years since for All Saints' Church, Margaret Street; the Anthem was Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's 125th Psalm, "All they that trust in Thee, Lord," and at the conclusion of the Service the "Hallelujah" Chorus was sung. A sermon on behalf of the Fund was preached by the Bishop of Bedford, and Dr. Stainer presided at the organ.

THE Grosvenor Choral Society, at its last monthly Concert at the Grosvenor Hall, on the 22nd ult., gave a performance of Hofmann's Dramatic Cantata, "The Legend of the Fair Melusina." Despite a rather smaller attendance of the choir than usual, ample justice was done to the choruses. The solos were very efficiently rendered by Miss Hélène Grieffenhagen, Miss Lizzie Turner, Messrs. W. Lloyd and Thurley Beale. Miss Florence Hartley accompanied at the pianoforte, and Mr. D. Woodhouse at the harmonium, with their usual ability. In the second part a miscellaneous selection was given. The Concert was conducted by Mr. G. R. Egerton.

A FASHIONABLE and numerous company assembled on the 4th ult. at the invitation of Mrs. R. H. Wyatt, Grosvenor Place, to hear Reinecke's "Little Rosebud" given by the South Kensington Ladies' Choir, under the direction of Mrs. Arthur O'Leary. The choral numbers, which are by no means easy, were noticeable for purity of intonation and precision. Particular mention must also be made of Mrs. Bramwell Davis, Miss Brinton, Miss Park, Miss O'Leary, Miss M. Wyatt, and Mrs. Lea, whose soli contributed much to the enjoyment of the evening.

THE excellent Concerts established at Eastbourne by Mr. Julian Adams were resumed on the 11th ult. with every prospect of a successful season. The programme was a high-class one, comprising a Symphony of Haydn, a selection from "Faust," Overture, "Rienzi," and Mackenzie's "Rhapsodie Ecossaise," besides vocal soli by Miss Clara Perry. The composition of the band is very good, and Mr. Adams conducted with his usual skill and energy.

THE Annual Festival Service of the Lay Helpers' Association in Westminster Abbey took place this year on Tuesday evening, June 28. The Service was C. E. Miller's setting in A, the Anthem being "It is a good thing to give thanks," by Dr. Bridge, who presided at the organ. Mr. W. S. Hoyte, Choirmaster of the Association, conducted.

MDLLE. DORÉ-DESIGNES gave a very successful morning Concert at 81, Queen's Gate, on the 14th ult., before a numerous and very fashionable audience. The talented singer was assisted by Mdlle. Avigliana, Miss Bertha Foresta, the Misses Layton, and Messrs. Power, Law, De Lara, Thorndike, Hollman, Oberthür and Mattei.

MR. JOHN C. WARD has been awarded a medal by the Commissioners of the International Exhibition at Paris, 1878, in recognition of his services rendered as Organist at the Concerts given at the Trocadéro by Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir.

THE Annual Prize given by the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club was, on the 22nd ult., awarded to Mr. Montem Smith for a glee for five voices, entitled "At the dawn of life's day."

MR. FRANK BRADLEY, Organist of St. John the Evangelist, Wilton Road, has been engaged to play at the English Church, Avenue d'Antin, Paris, and to give recitals on the fine organ for six weeks.

REVIEWS.

The Rudiments of the Theory of Music. Designed for the use of pupil-teachers and students in Training Colleges. By H. A. Bamford.

[John Heywood, Manchester and London.]

THE preface to this book might be cut out and transferred to any work of a similar kind published since music became a subject seriously studied. It commences thus: "Numerous as the elementary text-books on the Theory of Music undoubtedly are, the need for a simple and concise hand-book, sufficiently comprehensive for students in training colleges, has been felt for some time. This book is intended to supply that want." Presuming that this want were really felt, we have nothing whatever to say against Mr. Bamford's attempt to supply it; but if the author were to have as many works on the "Rudiments of the Theory of Music" pass through his hands as we have, we can scarcely believe that he would find it necessary to add another to the store. Without stopping to discuss the propriety of declaring that this is a treatise on the "Theory of Music," seeing that it only treats of the elements of the art, we may say that we have carefully gone through every chapter, and have much pleasure in testifying that, with very few exceptions, we can scarcely imagine that the several subjects can possibly be explained more clearly. These exceptions let us at once draw attention to. In the first place, although Mr. Bamford errs in good company, we cannot but believe that it would be just as sensible to call a leaf a leave, as to call a staff a stave; and as this book is intended for young people, these matters are worth consideration. Then we are at a loss to understand what can be meant by saying that the G and F clefs are "sometimes called the treble and bass clefs respectively," seeing that they are never called so save when the former is placed upon the second, and the latter upon the fourth line of the staff. We must also point out that in the table of time signatures the simple time from which the compounds 12-4 and 12-16 are derived do not appear, so that the student is left in doubt as to where four dotted minims or four dotted quavers can come from. Assuming that in another edition this subject may receive attention, it may also be well to suggest that 2-8 and 6-16 may be added to the duple times; for certainly, although the former time is not much used, the latter will be met with in music constantly played, even by students. In the next place we cannot agree with our author that "the sharps or flats placed at the commencement of a musical composition are called the key signature, because they tell us in what key that piece of music is written." The key signature can only tell us that the piece is in one of two keys; and we do not believe it good to fix in the mind of a student that the major is the normal scale, so that he may afterwards be induced to think that the minor is a tolerated departure from it. As we have already said, apart from the trifling objections we have raised, the book is well and clearly written throughout; a good feature being the list of questions upon the matter contained in each chapter, which are supposed to be satisfactorily answered before proceeding further.

Concertstück for Pianoforte and Orchestra. By Walter Macfarren. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THIS work was written especially for Miss Kuhe, and played by her with much success at Herr Kuhe's Brighton Festival in February last. In this age of pianoforte "virtuosity" it is quite refreshing to meet with a composition so pure in writing, and yet so admirably suited to display the legitimate powers both of the executant and the instrument; and we have every hope that the number of artists who can appreciate such sound workmanship is sufficiently large to ensure a wide acceptance of Mr. Macfarren's Concert-piece. It is almost unnecessary to say that the orchestral accompaniments are indispensable for the due realisation of the composer's intention; but a very good idea of the effect of the piece can be obtained, at least by the performer, from the pianoforte part, with the essential indications of the score which accompany it. The strikingly melodious subject in E minor, with which, after a brief introduction for the pianoforte, the composition opens, is a great relief to the ear after the impulsive and pretentious themes with which those who condescend to marked themes at all excite the wonder, if not the admiration, of our audiences; and the judicious changes of key and variety in the character of the passages are commendable points in a work which reflects faithfully the day when the worth of music was estimated rather by its beauty than its difficulty. We trust shortly to hear a piece so admirably adapted for concert-room performance under the fingers of one of our many excellent pianists in the metropolis; and meantime commend it to the notice of those amateurs who are desirous of testing their powers in a classical work from a modern writer.

The Bicycle Sonata. For the Pianoforte. By Stanislaus Elliott. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

THE author of this Sonata, in defence of the design of his work, reminds us that "the greatest classical composers have now and then employed their powers in depicting grotesque and comical scenes and actions"; and continues thus: "In the sister art of painting, the greatest men have depicted subjects calculated to affect our sense of the ridiculous, and this, too, in true artistic form, and without ever descending to the level of the commonplace or trashy—why then should not music artists do the same?" The fact that classical composers have depicted "grotesque and comical scenes" is indisputable; but it must be remembered that these works have merely represented "scenes"; and that all the minute details of these scenes have not been described in equally minute passages, over each of which the meaning intended to be conveyed is written. In the "sister art of painting" we find no analogy; for there the subjects daily around us are tangibly painted for all to look upon; whilst in music, as only the ideas called up by these objects can be indicated, many a phrase becomes not ludicrous, unless the composer tells us that we are to laugh. Take for example the Sonata before us. Can the continuation of a passage formed upon the chord of B flat major suggest "Mind the ditch"—when we are told that the commencement of it means "Pride comes before a fall"? Or, without the words being before us, could we form the remotest idea, after an arpeggio of semiquavers, representing a "collision" and a "squabble," that divided chords of the 6-4 and 5-3 on the dominant meant "A tip to the driver"? There can be no doubt that "programme music," even on a much broader principle, has done very much to degrade the art; and although, therefore, we freely accord warm praise to Mr. Elliott for his Sonata as abstract music, we shall much regret if the encouragement he receives should embolden him to make a second venture in the path he has chosen.

Bourrée for the Pianoforte. By Edwin M. Lott.
[Ashdown and Parry.]

NOTWITHSTANDING the multitudes of Bourrées, Sarabandes, Gavottes, and other antiquated dance-tunes written in humble imitation of those supplied by the old masters, there is always room for any which are really good of their kind, not only because the melodious subject necessitated by the character of the piece interests the listeners, but because the quaint harmonies and good solid passages for both hands render them useful exercises for the student. Mr. Lott has evidently intended his contribution to our rapidly increasing store of such compositions especially for young players, and may be cordially commended for the manner in which he has performed his task. The theme in C major is bold and effective; and the second subject, in A minor, has some good points of imitation. The harmonies are so well considered, and the part-writing generally so musicianlike, that we are sorry Mr. Lott should have given us the two fifths (bar 11, p. 3), which he has carefully avoided by doubling the fifth on the dominant when the passage occurs on the first page, in G major; the substitution of the seventh for the octave would at once remove this defect.

Eleven Part-songs for First and Second Trebles. (Ladies' or Boys' Voices.) Words by Ed. Oxenford. Composed by Franz Abt. [Patey and Willis.]

ABT'S songs are always graceful; and although it may perhaps be said that he writes almost too much for his fame, there is an artistic feeling about his vocal pieces, and they are so well suited for the voice, that he may be tolerably certain, however often he appears, of receiving a cordial greeting from amateurs. It is of course difficult for a composer who is so constantly producing works in one style to avoid repeating himself, and certainly in these Part-songs we encounter many familiar phrases; but, considering that they are always melodious, and never commonplace, such reminiscences are by no means unwelcome. From the eleven Part-songs we may select for especial praise: No. 1, "Vesper-bells are ringing," a simple but effective theme, agreeably harmonised; No. 4, "The Woods in Spring," both words and music of which are admirably adapted for young people; No. 6, "Autumn Leaves," containing some effective changes of rhythm; and No. 10, "Spring's Return," a brief but extremely tuneful song, which cannot fail to become a favourite. It is a pity that the accompaniments, which are absolutely essential to these pieces, should have been printed in such small notes; and in a second edition it would be good, we think, to remedy this defect. We must not omit to mention that the words of all the songs are in every respect suited for their intended purpose, a merit which cannot be too strongly commended.

Fifteen Melodies of Schubert. Transcribed for the Pianoforte by Stephen Heller. [Forsyth Brothers.]

THE arrangement of a song for the pianoforte is by no means an easy matter, and it is good, therefore, to find that so accomplished an artist as Stephen Heller has devoted himself to the task, for he has thus not only furnished us with some really excellent pieces, but has helped to spread a knowledge of some of the best songs of one of the best song-writers. Of course all the vocal pieces here selected do not lend themselves equally well to this treatment, but those which are comparatively ineffective are quite the exception; and we should decidedly recommend pianists, who can both sing and accompany with their fingers, to possess themselves of the entire set. No. 1, "Hedge Roses" (we give the English titles), is extremely good, the crossing of hands in the accompaniment at the commencement being a noticeable point. No. 4, "Wandering," is most ingeniously transcribed, both melody and accompaniment being clearly defined throughout; and, although requiring well-trained fingers, thoroughly within the reach of moderately advanced players. In No. 5, "Halt by the Brook," the semiquaver accompaniment is effectively woven in with the voice part; and in No. 6, "The Butterfly," decidedly the most popular of the set, the left hand is, in the latter portion of the piece, an important element in the realisation of Schubert's fanciful accompaniment. No. 9, "By the Lake," apart from its melodious beauty, is an excellent study for legato playing; No. 12, "The Hurdy-Gurdy Player," is full of character, and may be mentioned also as one of the easiest of the selection; and No. 15, "Spirit Dance," although difficult to present at all faithfully in a pianoforte transcription, is extremely attractive, and will probably become a favourite. Mr. Charles Hallé, who has edited and fingered these pieces, is doing good service to the art by searching for and reproducing in such careful style so many works of the past and present age by composers whose names are guarantees of their worth, as it is no use talking to amateurs about the weakness of the compositions they play unless the strong ones are constantly placed before them.

The Seed and the Thought. Song. Words (from Cassell's Family Magazine) by Alexander Lamont. Music by Edmund H. Turpin. [Weekes and Co.]

MR. LAMONT'S excellent verses have here received a most appropriate setting, the music indeed being of so high an order as to separate the song at once from the crowd of compositions of a similar character daily issued and daily sent for review. A quiet theme in A minor, most artistically accompanied, is succeeded by a burst in the tonic major so thoroughly sympathetic with the words as to convince us that poet and composer have thought with one mind. The close in B minor, immediately before that in A major, at the conclusion of the song, strikes the ear as somewhat out of keeping with the general design of the composition; but beyond this we have not a word to say against, and very much more than we have said in favour of, a song which should enhance the already high reputation of its composer.

Never, O Love, till for ever. Words by Louisa Gray. Music by Sir Julius Benedict. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

ANYTHING from the pen of the composer of this song is certain at least to have that charm of artistic treatment which would ensure it a welcome; but both words and music of the composition before us will especially commend it to the attention of those vocalists who can sufficiently command the upper A flat—and even B flat—to give it due effect. The song is also published a minor third lower; but the melody seems to demand the soprano voice, for which we imagine it was originally written. The accompaniment, without being in any part obtrusive, is full of character.

Romance in F. Quartet for Voice, Violin, Violoncello, and Pianoforte. By "Shah." [J. McDowell and Co.]

THE "Musical Dictionary" informs us that a Quartet is a "composition for four performers"; and as the work before us fulfils these conditions, it is doubtless a Quartet. Yet we cannot but think that as custom only sanctions the use of similar titles in literature when high-class work is at least attempted—so that, for example, "Old Mother Hubbard" would not be issued as a "Poem"—if amateurs will write and publish such effusions as that forwarded to us by "Shah," they should modestly prepare us in the title-page for the childish musical prattle which we are to expect. The "Romance" under notice consists of forty-eight bars in F minor, and forty-one bars in F major, and there are only two chords—tonic and dominant—throughout. The melody is of the most commonplace kind; there is not the slightest attempt at writing in any of the instrumental parts, and the voice at the conclusion holds on the last syllable of the word "pe-rish" for six bars. In the interest of art we counsel the anonymous composer of this piece to pause before he again commits his thoughts to the engraver; and, in our own interest, if he will insist upon publishing, we earnestly request him not to send us a copy of his work for review.

The Moon shines o'er the lake, love. Serenade. Words by Lewis Mansel Thornton. Composed by Charles Henry Shephard, A.R.A.M.

[A. Hirschman and Co., Newcastle-on-Tyne.]

WE have on several occasions spoken in high terms of Mr. Shephard's vocal compositions; and although the Serenade before us has scarcely the marked character observable in most of his former works, it is melodious and skilfully harmonised. The return to the original subject, after the unexpected change of key, is a point of interest; and a good tenor singer may make the song extremely effective.

Vittoria. Air. Composed by Carissimi. Arranged for the Pianoforte by Claudius H. Couldery.

[Lamborn Cock.]

THESE transcriptions of airs by eminent composers are excellent subjects to place before amateurs, provided they are not tortured into that "brilliance" beneath which they are usually buried. Mr. Couldery has performed his task fairly well, contenting himself with those conventional arpeggios without which no modern "arrangement" seems complete; and the piece may be conscientiously recommended, not only for the intrinsic beauty of the melody, but as a good exercise for expressive legato playing.

Sempre Lei! Romanza. Parole di Cesare Oliva.

Ne tu pecchè mo faie? Canzone. Parole di E. Bonadia.

Musica di L. Denza.

[Ricordi.]

THE composer of these two refined songs has undoubted talent for melody, as well as for the due expression of words. Both are decisively written in the Italian school, and little attempt is made in the pianoforte part beyond the sympathetic accompaniment of the voice. Of the two we prefer the first, "Sempre Lei," which, commencing in F major, passes with good effect into the tonic minor with a graceful figure in the accompaniment, and returns to the original key, the pianoforte part moving towards the end of the song in semiquavers. The second is somewhat more laboured in the melody, but it has many good points, and might, we think, be made effective by an efficient Italian vocalist, or at least one who has caught the true Italian pronunciation.

Un Mattino d' Amore. Duetto. Poetry by L' Avvocato Enrico Lemmi. Composed by P. D. Guglielmo.

[Duncan Davison and Co.]

SIGNOR GUGLIELMO here presents us with a charming Duetto, which should command the attention of vocalists in search of music to please a mixed audience, without presenting any difficulties to the executants. It is modelled on the received Italian style—a melodious theme, harmonised in thirds and sixths—and is quite as good as many duets which have gained much favour in the conventional fashionable operas.

Offertorium. No 2 of Twelve Original Compositions for the Organ. By H. J. Stark. [William Reeves.]

THE performance of this Offertorium produces feelings of a very mixed character. The first subject is in every way excellent—as for the one in E flat, all we can say is, that we know many waltzes less secular and quite as fitted for a place during or after a church service.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE prospective répertoire of the Imperial Opera of Vienna for the coming season will include the following interesting revivals, viz., Spontini's "La Vestale," Gluck's "Orpheus," and "Iphigenia in Tauris," Schubert's "Alphonso und Estrella," Lortzing's "Undine," &c. Boito's "Mefistofele" is likewise to be produced for the first time during next winter. Regarding the activity displayed by the Imperial establishment in question during the past season, we extract the following statistical details from the Musik Welt, according to which, out of 284 representations, Verdi's operas occupied 37, Wagner's 35, Meyerbeer's 33, Donizetti's 22, Mozart's 22, Rossini's 21, Gounod's 19, Weber's 11, Bellini's 9, Bizet's 8 evenings respectively. The remaining performances consisted of Gluck's "Der betrogene Kadi," Beethoven's "Fidelio," and operas by Cherubini, Boieldieu, Halévy, Marschner, Schubert, Delibes, Brüll, and others.

A new cantata by Herr Brambach has achieved a great success on its first performance at the recent Festival of the "Rheinische Sängerbund," held at Coblenz. The work is entitled "Prometheus," and is written for male chorus, with vocal solos and orchestra.

The Neue Freie Presse of Vienna has just published an interesting and characteristic correspondence between Richard Wagner and the late Carl Herbeck (then Orchestral Director of the Vienna Opera) touching chiefly upon topics in connection with the performance of "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," and "Die Meistersinger." In his letters the reformer shows himself, as usual, extremely self-conscious, uncompromising, and irritable to a degree; Herbeck, on the other hand, contriving with admirable tact and good feeling to steer clear of the Scylla and Charybdis of the master's peculiarities.

M. Weckerlin, the librarian of the Paris Conservatoire, has made an interesting discovery in the library of that institution. Between the covers of a long-forgotten portfolio he found the original edition of the first published work by Mozart, bearing the title: "Sonates pour le clavecin, qui peuvent se jouer avec l'accompagnement de violon, dédiés à Madame Victoire de France, par J. G. Wolfgang Mozart, de Salzbourg, âgé de sept ans. Œuvre première gravée, par Mme. Vendôme, ci-devant rue Saint-Jacques, à présent rue Saint-Honoré, à Paris, aux adresses ordinaires." The copy in question is, moreover, the identical one which the child-composer presented to Madame Victoire (daughter of Louis XV.), being richly bound, and bearing a high-flown dedicatory inscription in French in the composer's handwriting.

The famous Leipzig Gewandhaus was founded in the year 1481, and was endowed three hundred years later, in 1781 (at the instance of Herr Müller, then burgomaster of the town), with its concert-hall, where the first musical performance took place on November 21 in the same year. The ancient institution will thus celebrate in November next a centenary of twofold interest and significance.

Herr Max Staegemann, of Königsberg, has accepted the post of Director at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater.

Heinrich Hofmann has just completed a new Opera, "Wilhelm von Oranien," to which Roderich Fels has written the libretto.

We read in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik: "Fresh activity is just now being displayed at the Bayreuth Theatre, where Herr Brand, the Technical Director of the Hoftheater at Darmstadt, is engaged, with the assistance of a goodly number of workmen, upon the scenic mounting of 'Parsifal.' This can be no mean undertaking, since Wagner has in this, probably his most peculiar work as far as its poetry is concerned, given the reins to his imagination even to the verge of possibility. Thus, for instance, at one juncture of the drama everything on the stage is required completely to disappear in the open scene. It will take some time before the necessary alterations of the Bayreuth stage can be completed."

An international competition of Choral Singing is announced to take place at Ghent, Belgium, next month.

Dr. Günther, of Leipzig, has been nominated Presiding Director of the Conservatorium, in the room of the late Conrad Schleinitz.

A Scandinavian select orchestra, under the direction of Herr Balduin Dahl, proposes to give a series of concerts in Germany during the coming autumn, when Scandinavian National Music will be chiefly represented in the programmes.

Weber's "Freischütz," that specifically German of all German operas, reached the sixtieth anniversary of its first performance on June 18 last. The work, it is scarcely necessary to remind our readers, was brought out by the Royal Theatre of Berlin in 1821, where, upon its 200th representation (in 1840), it had realised the sum of nearly 94,000 thalers (£14,000) to the exchequer of that institution. At Paris, where "Freischütz" was at first produced in a most mutilated condition as "Robin des Bois," that opera reached its 670th representation (upon various stages of the capital) in July of last year. The popularity enjoyed by Weber's work in England, especially during the second decade of the present century, is well known to the readers of this journal. Some interesting details with regard to the first production of "Freischütz" in London will however, we understand, be furnished in a supplementary volume to Professor Jahn's monumental work on the composer, entitled "Carl Maria von Weber in seinen Werken."

A cyclus of Weber's operas will be performed during next season at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, on which occasion the master's last operatic work, "Oberon," will be performed for the first time here with the added recitatives of Herr Wüllner.

Herr Xaver Scharwenka will, it is rumoured, shortly open an academy of music at Berlin, for which the services of several eminent professors have already been secured.

During the latter part of the present month a series of competitive choral performances is announced to take place at Wiesbaden, in which over forty choral societies from various parts of Germany will take part.

We cannot withhold from our readers the following curiosum, extracted from a recent number of the Berlin Musik Welt. The journal in question says: "One of our great (perhaps our greatest) pianists was presented, during his late tournee through Switzerland, with the customary 'Gewerbeschein' (legitimation of craft) of the Canton le Valais, the tenor of which runs as follows: 'Legitimation for strolling handicraftsmen and artists.—The Financial Department grants permission to Mr. — to pursue, for one month, his industry as pianist.' Follows the personal description of the individual, with the reminder that 'the bearer of this paper must be prepared, at any time, to show the same to a police officer whenever asked for.' At the foot of this formidable document the qualifications of the 'strolling artist' are more particularly specified, viz:—

'Artistes ambulants.

Comédiens, Chanteurs, Musiciens, Photographes, Ecuyers, Danseurs de corde, Escamoteurs, &c.; ainsi que Panoramas, Ménageries et autres exhibitions d'art et de curiosités naturelles, 30 francs par mois, plus 1 franc pour le timbre.'

The possessor of the 'Gewerbeschein' is, moreover, enjoined to have it viséd, before every performance, at the local police-office (cost, twenty-five centimes), not to mention numerous other minor regulations of a similar nature."

Herr Otto Devrient has just completed an adaptation for the German stage (based upon Schlegel's translation) of Calderon's drama "Circe," to which Herr Ed. Lassen will supply the incidental music called for by the Spanish dramatist. The interesting novelty will, it is expected, be produced at the Weimar Hof-Theater in November next.

A Viennese journal publishes the following anecdote of Beethoven, related by Herr B. Neumann, who had it from Pleyel, the well-known pianoforte virtuoso and an eye-witness of the occurrence. "One day," the story runs, "a grand concert had been announced at Vienna, the chief attraction of which was to be the appearance at the pianoforte of the great Beethoven. The master came, sat down before the instrument, and after striking a few chords, and producing a few modulations, abruptly left the room, slightly bowing to the audience. The public was, of course, greatly disappointed, and the whole town was full of talk about the failure of the concert. On visiting Beethoven the following day, Pleyel was received by the master with these words: 'Were you at the concert yesterday? The fools!—they fancy one is always disposed to improvise. I had arrived there with the best of intentions, but I soon found it was useless, and so I gave it up.' During this conversation Beethoven had been sitting at the pianoforte, his fingers grasping the keys mechanically. Suddenly the visitor found himself absorbed in a stream of melody; the music of the spheres visited his ear. Beethoven had become unconscious of his friend's presence, and, his face glowing with inspiration, the Titan sat at the pianoforte carried away by his genius."

Franz Liszt has been confined to his room for a week in consequence of a fall he recently sustained at Weimar, but is now recovered. The veteran maestro will remain at the town mentioned until the end of this month, after which he will pay his usual annual visit to Rome. A performance of his "Saint Elizabeth," with scenic illustrations, will take place in October next at Weimar, in celebration of the composer's seventieth birthday.

Camille Saint-Saëns is engaged upon the composition of a Symphony to be produced on the occasion of the inauguration of a statue shortly to be erected to Victor Hugo at Paris.

According to the Guide Musical of Bruxelles, Henri Vieuxtemps has left a number of unpublished compositions, among which may be specially mentioned three violin Concertos, a string Quartet, an Opera entitled "Jeanne de Messine," and numerous solo pieces for the violin. The mortal remains of the great artist will be claimed by the authorities of Verviers, his birthplace, for the purpose of being interred in their native soil.

The following resolutions, as regards orchestral reform, have been adopted by the Congress of Italian Musicians recently held at Milan, viz., the introduction of four-stringed contrabassi, while retaining a certain number of three-stringed instruments of the same calibre; the obligatory practice of pupils on the simple cornet, in lieu of the cornet-à-pistons; the obligatory practice of pupils on the E-flat trumpet in place of the cornet-à-pistons, for orchestral purposes; the introduction of the trombone of various range; the adoption of the French normal diapason.

Another setting to music of "Il Barbiere di Siviglia" is announced in Italian papers, Signor Bianchi, of Bologna, being the composer.

Léon Escudier, founder and chef-rédacteur of the well-known Paris journal, L'Art Musical, died on June 22, at the French capital, aged sixty-five. M. Escudier, in 1876, undertook the management—precarious at all times—of the Théâtre-Italien, which he retained for two years, during which period Verdi's "Aïda" was introduced for the first time to Paris audiences with great success. But the undertaking, on the whole, proved a decided financial failure, and ever since then M. Escudier's health is said to have declined. The deceased also published, in conjunction with his brother Marie, several biographical works on music and musicians.

Paris.—Fête Nationale at the Cirque d'Hiver (July 14): Overture, "Carnaval de Venise" (A. Thomas); Air de ballet, "Reine de Saba" (Gounod); Marche Tzigane (E. Reyer); Sevillana (Massenet); Danse macabre (C. Saint-Saëns); Intermezzo (A. Holmes); Concerto caractéristique for violin (T. Brink); Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys" (Lalo); Sérénade Hongroise (Joncières); Kermesse (B. Goddard); Valse and Pizzicato from "Sylvia" (L. Délibes); Carnaval (Guiraud). Orchestral Director, M. Padeloup.

Leipzig.—At St. Thomas's Church (July 2): Motett for five-part choir, "In den Armen dein" (Melchior Frank); Credo from Mass, No. 1 (E. F. Richter). July 16: Motett, "Singet dem Herrn," for eight voices (W. Bargiel); "Ersehntes Ruhethal" (Mendelssohn).

Dresden.—Pupils' Concert at the Conservatorium (June 18): Quintet for wind instruments, Op. 124 (Briccialdi); Sonata, Op. 26 (Beethoven); Cavatine from "Das Nachtlager von Granada" (Kreutzer); Violin Concerto in G minor (Bruch); Carnaval (Schumann); Air from "Mitrane" (Rossi); Variations for two pianofortes (Volkmann). June 21: Serenade for strings, No. 3 (Volkmann); "Sommertag auf dem Lande," Op. 55 (Gade); Sarabande and Gigue for violin (Bach); Symphony in G (Haydn).

CORRESPONDENCE.

MUSIC IN THE UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—You permitted me in THE MUSICAL TIMES for September, 1877, to give a translation of a bill submitted to the legislature of this far-off republic for the increase of the salary of Señor Ponce de Leon as director of a military band at Bogotá. I regret to say I fear the bill was shelved in the subsequent stages, and that Señor Ponce did not get his rise.

On looking through a file of papers lately arrived, I find two decrees which are of interest, as showing a desire on the part of Colombia to wake up in musical matters. The first is: A decree offering prizes for painting and musical compositions, the latter to be in the form of a symphony on "one or more of our national airs"—1st prize, $150; 2nd prize, a silver medal. The preamble recites that several eminent artists as well as musical composers propose to present their works for solemn exhibition at the coming national anniversary, and to render that festival worthy of the recollections it evokes. The President decrees that the competition appointed by decree of April 12 shall be enlarged as follows; &c. It would appear from this that the said eminent artists and composers had felt rather slighted at the omission of their respective professions from the competition in question. A jury of three is appointed to adjudicate on the compositions offered. The preamble to the second decree recites that:—

"Whereas almost all cultivated nations have a national anthem as well known and characteristic and as dear to them as their flag, and which, by the powerful social influence of music and poetry and by its hallowed remembrances, unites its citizens in the bonds of fraternity, and stimulates them in days of trial, either in leading them to victory against foreign enemies, or in keeping them united and persevering in their time of trouble, and thus serves as a national rallying-point;

"And whereas Colombia has no such anthem, so chosen by all her sons;

"And whereas, therefore, it is the duty of the Government to do all in its power to develop the saving spirit of national unity and fraternity among its citizens;

"And whereas, among sundry prizes offered to stimulate the various branches of science, art and industry, no special invitation has been given to music and poetry in combination, on which, in a great measure, the realization of this idea depends;

"The President decrees the appointment of a Commission to investigate—Firstly, whether there exists a hymn which merits the name of national anthem; and secondly, to choose one from such as may be submitted in competition for the prizes offered on the following conditions. The prizes will be:—

	1st Prize.	2nd Prize.
"To the author of the best words . .	$150	$75
"To the composer of the best music	$150	$75
Or of both combined	$250	$150

The compositions must be original, and within the natural compass of all voices, although one or two verses may be of more extended compass. The words must contain no offence to Spain, 'our mother country,' with whom a cordial treaty of peace and amity has just been concluded. The hymn should be preferably of historic character, and syllabic in construction."

Out of the materials obtained the Committee will be enabled to form a collection of national music, the profit on which is to go to the families of the heroes and victims of the War of Independence. Fifty copies are to be given to the author of each piece.

The Commission may, at their discretion, form a hymn composed of sundry strophes taken from any of the poems submitted, in this case apportioning to each competitor his due share of the award.

The Commission is to consist of seven members, who are empowered to withhold the prizes should the compositions be of insufficient merit. They are authorised to spend $100 in the trial of the music, and are to report their decision on July 20.

Let us hope these efforts may be crowned with success, and that Colombia may soon be in possession of an anthem which will lead her to better things, although the simple mind may be excused for doubting the efficacy of the means proposed.—Yours truly

C. B.

ENGLISH COMPOSERS AND THEIR CLAIMS, PAST AND PRESENT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The admirable letter of Mr. Archer Gurney, in your June number, should afford matter for reflection to all thinking musicians. There is undoubtedly great neglect of native composers, although signs are not wanting of promise of better things—take the forthcoming Norwich Festival for one. To the list of Mr. Gurney other names might be added. The music of Cipriani Potter, according to contemporary notices, must have been of a high order of merit: how comes it that we never hear any in the present day? Gloomy as the picture may look, there are aspects which afford some hope. Music of the first order can never be annihilated; fashion may cast it aside for a time, but sooner or later it will be revived. Looking at the subject broadly, every nation may be said to have treated its greatest composers with more or less neglect during their lives, and left to posterity the task of justly appreciating their works. In many cases it is impossible to mete out absolute justice to a composer while living. There are so many factors in the case, and calm, dispassionate reasoning is almost out of the question. Only when personal influences have ceased, and the mists of prejudice cleared off, can the works of genius be justly estimated. The true artist must therefore submit his work to the judgment of a future age, and be content with the inward assurance that he has been faithful to the talent committed to him.

It is a matter of congratulation to find that English music is making way on the continent. The late Hugo Pierson met with more real appreciation, possibly, in Germany than in England; and the success of Mr. Villiers Stanford at Hanover is one of the most gratifying instances that modern records exhibit. Side by side with your correspondent's letter are programmes which contain more than one English name. What opinions were held some forty years ago, the following extract will show. In the "Foreign Intelligence" of the Musical Library, 1836, there is an account of a concert at Prague, given by Madame Friedrichs, "first harp-player of London." She played some English pieces, and this is what the critic says: "English compositions are not only of a totally different kind from those of France and Germany, but, what is still worse, they closely resemble what was in vogue ten years ago, and are now quite out of date. Besides, national themes are only effective in their own country. We know too little about the Irish to take any great interest in their melodies." Possibly the pieces referred to were of little value; but if "national themes" are to be limited to their own country we have plenty of "Hungarian" for export to-day.

Sterndale Bennett's music is not likely to be forgotten, even if it be not often heard at present. I think many musicians will agree with Mr. Gurney's just estimate of that composer. Onslow is still played to some extent in amateur private circles; and if his name is now absent from concert programmes, he had at one time a large share of attention. Up to the year 1837 his name frequently appeared in the programmes of the Philharmonic Society, and on the establishment of chamber concerts—the first series, under the title "Concerti da Camera," took place November and December, 1855—Onslow headed the first programme with his twelfth quintet (in A minor, Op. 34). Other concerts on a similar plan were given during the following year, and nine works by Onslow (all quintets, by the way) were included in the programmes. If there be inherent vitality in his music, it will surely make its way to the front again.

We English have become so accustomed to be called unmusical that we seem to present native works in a manner that savours of the apologetic. What is wanted by way of remedy is an educated and influential public opinion outside the profession, and capable of making its expression felt. Till such exists the initiative should be taken by concert-givers. I may be pardoned if I mention here my own experience in that capacity. In starting Chamber Concerts in Birmingham two seasons ago, I made it a point to introduce an English (or rather British) work in each programme. That plan has given entire satisfaction to my subscribers, and in many cases surprise has been expressed that such works should have remained unknown. More than one name, both of deceased and living masters, has thus been introduced here for the first time. The disposition on the part of the public already exists to receive with favour the works of native composers; let concert-givers take advantage of it, and a few years will work a wonderful change for the better.

I am, sir, yours faithfully,

STEPHEN S. STRATTON.

ORGAN PEDALS ATTACHED TO PIANOFORTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I unfortunately did not see, until too late for prompt reply, the inquiry by a "Parish Organist," in THE MUSICAL TIMES of June, as to organ pedals attached to the pianoforte. If not too late, I shall deem it a favour if you will kindly insert my reply in your August issue.

I have always maintained that pedals attached to the pianoforte, either by roller, board, twine, or gut, is a failure, for the vital principle of the piano is that the key must be struck, which is not the case with the organ; and thus, if the pedals are attached direct by either of the above methods, pedalling must necessarily be, to say the least, uneven and unsatisfactory, for the feet can never be expected to attain the delicacy of touch so requisite and even difficult for the fingers. Moreover, there is and must be considerable danger of injuring the piano.

I wish now to inform "Parish Organist" that I have succeeded in overcoming the above difficulties and objections, and that I have, after much thought and study, constructed a so far unique action, which produces a perfectly even and struck note, whether the pedalling is legato or otherwise; and no amount of heavy pedalling can in any way injure the piano, the action being so constructed that the pedals have no direct control whatever over the keys. They have had very considerable use for more than four years, with the most satisfactory results; they have never been out of order, and the wear and tear is absolutely nil. As a private individual I have not seen my way to patent my invention, at least without very considerable outlay, which to me would be too great an undertaking; but if this reply to "Parish Organist" should be seen by him, or by any pianoforte-maker or others whom it may concern, I shall be only too happy to prove on inspection all I have said respecting my invention.

Trusting that this correspondence may, even in a small degree, be the means of a more general introduction of pedals to pianofortes, and thus place within the reach of all the very desirable object of organ practice and organ music by the introduction of a pedal clavier to pianofortes such as I have stated,—I am, sir, yours truly,

JOSEPH SHAW, Professor of Music,

Organist of St. Luke's, Leeds.

5, Cobourg Street, Leeds, July 13, 1881.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you allow me to say a few words in favour of pedals attached to a pianoforte? I purchased a set rather more than twelve months ago, and when attached to the instrument, which was very easily done, my pupils had an unlimited amount of pedal practice without the loss of time in going to the organ each day, and also without the expense and bother of engaging and hunting for the very necessary blower. One of your correspondents mentions that "they are honestly worth £10." I will say that mine cost £4 4s., and to me the worth has been beyond my anticipations. The manufacturer has improved the pedals and action in every way since he brought them out in 1875, and I think it is right that all musical men should know this, as it is one of the best inventions for our use of late years.—Yours truly,

AN ORGANIST AND PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BEDFORD.—Mr. Diemer's Cantata Bethany was produced on the occasion of the opening of the new organ in the enlarged Modern School, and with a success which must, we think, shortly ensure it a hearing in the metropolises. The local papers speak in the highest terms of the music, and especially of the sympathetic manner in which every phase of the story—the "Raising of Lazarus"—is treated. The principal vocalists—Miss Whittle, Miss Armstrong, Miss Eveleigh, the Rev. C. H. Murphy, Mr. A. H. Allen, and Mr. Kingston—acquitted themselves excellently in the somewhat trying solos; and the choir was everything that could be desired, especially in "O death, where is thy sting?" and the closing "Hallelujah, Amen." Mr. Ford presided with much ability at the organ. The second part of the Concert included an original string Quartet by Mr. H. W. Stewardson, one of the assistant-masters, and some organ solos, admirably played by Mr. Ford.

BRAMLEY, LEEDS.—A special Service was held in St. Peter's Church on the 5th ult., when Dr. Armes's new Church Oratorio, St. John the Evangelist, composed for the Festival in York Minster, was performed for the first time. The Service, which commenced at 7.30, consisted of the Sentences, the Exhortation, the Confession, the Absolution, the Lord's Prayer, the Versicles, and the Apostles' Creed. Then followed the first four of the seven numbers of Dr. Armes's sacred Cantata, viz., "The Call," "At the Supper," "By the Cross," and "At the Sepulchre," after which the Rev. N. Egerton Leigh, precentor of the Leeds Parish Church, delivered an earnest and appropriate address. The remaining three numbers of the Oratorio—"At the Ascension," "Witnessing to the Faith," and "The Revelation"—were then sung; and at the close a Collect was said, and the blessing given from the altar by the Rev. S. W. Cope, vicar of Bramley, who also read the prayers. The production of Dr. Armes's work did the talented Organist of the church, Mr. F. W. Hird, and his choir the utmost credit, the solos being effectively rendered by Miss Beecroft, Miss Emily Greenwood, Mrs. Saville, Mr. Parkinson, and Mr. H. Farrer. The choir was powerfully augmented by choristers from St. Bartholomew's, Armley, and a few female voices. Mr. Hird accompanied throughout on the organ in masterly style. There was a very large congregation.

BRISTOL.—An excellent musical entertainment was given on June 27 at the Bon Marché. For several months past the assistants engaged at that establishment have been trained by Miss Farler—a lady well-known in musical circles—and the manner in which the part-songs and choruses were sung showed admirable proficiency on the part of the members of the class. The Concert was given for two reasons—in aid of the funds of the Bristol Royal Infirmary, and also to encourage the members of the class. Several well-known singers gave their services, including Miss Farler, who acted as Conductor, Miss Kate Probert, Signor Montecco, and Mr. W. Kidner. The programme included choral music by the class, and several vocal and instrumental solos, Miss Farler's rendering of Sullivan's "Lost Chord" and Signor Pansani's performance on the zither being especially admired. Considering that the class has only been established about six months, the efficiency of the members reflects great credit upon their instructor, Miss Farler; whilst the members themselves are to be commended for the energy they have shown in applying to good effect the teaching they have received.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—A Festival was held on Thursday, June 30, in St. Mary's Church, by the united choirs of the town, numbering over 100 voices. The Service throughout was rendered in an effective manner under the conductorship of Mr. T. B. Richardson, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Mary's. Messrs. Coles and Sydenham presided at the organ, and were assisted by the Militia Band of West Suffolk, under Herr Krill.

CAPETOWN.—A new musical Society, entitled "The Philharmonic Society," has been formed in this city by a number of amateurs, chiefly young men, who hold weekly meetings in the Mutual Hall. The Society, which includes in its scheme the study and practice of instrumental and vocal music, already numbers about seventy members. A number of vocalists will form a part-song choir, and a double quartet of gentlemen will give glees. Mr. Wells (the Conductor of the Amateur Brass Band) will conduct the orchestra, and the vocalists will be under the direction of Mr. Ashley.

EASTBOURNE.—Master Brewer opened a new organ, built by Mr. T. Jones, of Pentonville, at St. Ann's, on Monday, the 11th ult. The programme, which included a Sonata by Rheinberger, Bach's Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, and the Overture to Oberon, was well rendered, and highly appreciated by the audience. After the performance a collection was made for the building of the church.

GREENOCK.—A large representative meeting of the members of the Greenock Choral Union was held on the 1st ult., in the hall of the Watt Museum, for the purpose of hearing read a communication which the Secretary had received from the esteemed Conductor, Mr. J. Westwood Tosh, to the effect that, owing to important engagements in Glasgow, it would be necessary for him to tender his resignation. Mr. Macdonnell, the vice-president, who occupied the chair, expressed his regret at the departure of Mr. Tosh, who leaves with the good wishes of all the members, and with a hope for his future success. It was afterwards unanimously agreed that Mr. D. M. Middleton, the well-known organist and composer, be appointed Conductor. The works for study for next season are Judas Maccabæus, and Sterndale Bennett's May Queen.

LEEDS.—A Promenade Concert and Swiss Fête was given on Saturday evening, June 25, in the Town Hall. The Armley Orchestral Band (Conductor, Mr. P. A. Strickland) performed a good selection of music by Sullivan, Reissiger, Rossini, Wagner, &c., the March from Tannhäuser being particularly well played and much admired. Seldom has a more delightful and successful Concert been given in Leeds than the one which took place on Saturday, the 16th ult., at the Town Hall. Dr. Spark was enthusiastically received, and played three pieces on the grand organ with almost more than usual success. M. Carré was much applauded for his violin solo; and the Police Band also rendered able assistance, with Mr. Sidney Jones as leader. Since last September no less than sixty-six free organ concerts have been given by Dr. Spark, the borough Organist, and it is calculated that they have been attended by about 80,000 persons. The selections have comprised almost every variety of composition—organ works by the standard and modern writers, symphonies, overtures, suites de pièces, and a variety of other music composed for the orchestra and adapted for performances on the organ; violin and violoncello solos, quartets, and other chamber music; vocal music, and a large number of operatic selections, &c. The organists of the town and neighbourhood should derive much benefit from such an institution, for which they are indebted to the enterprising spirit of the Town Council no less than the industry and research of Dr. Spark.

LEWES.—On Sunday, the 17th ult., after Evening Service, Mr. Percy J. Starnes gave an Organ Recital at St. Ann's Church, of which he is Organist. The programme, selected from the works of Handel, Bistate, Mendelssohn, Lemmens, &c., was excellently rendered. The collections both morning and evening were in aid of the Lewes Dispensary and Infirmary.

LINCOLN.—An Organ Recital was given in the Hannah Memorial Chapel on the 8th ult. by Mr. J. Barratt, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of Paisley Abbey. The programme was selected from the works of Handel, Haydn, Auber, Rossini, Guilmant, Romberg, Lemmens, Kullak, and Liszt. Mr. Barratt rendered all the pieces in a masterly style, several being encored and repeated. A vote of thanks was awarded to the Organist on the motion of Mr. Councillor Bainbridge, seconded by J. S. Hardy, Esq.

LIVERPOOL.—Some of the more advanced pupils of Mr. J. J. Monk gave a Concert in the Association Hall, Mount Pleasant, on Saturday afternoon, June 25. The programme included works by Haydn, Mozart, Weber, Spohr, Rossini, Sterndale Bennett, Schumann, Rubinstein, Raff, Guilmant, Gounod, &c. The executants were Misses Rosa Cope, Jessie Wiggins, Ada Minns, Elizabeth Firth, Annie Smith, Emilie Scott, Parry, E. Hartley, Florence Parkes, Quick, Mrs. Harrison Dearn, and Mr. Monk himself. Perhaps the most attractive feature of the Concert was the performance by Miss Emilie Scott of Sterndale Bennett's "Maid of Orleans" Sonata. There was a large and appreciative audience.

NORTH BERWICK, N.B.—Mr. Frank Bates, Mus. Bac., gave his first Organ Recital for the season on Tuesday afternoon, the 19th ult., to an appreciative audience. The selection included Bach's great Fugue in G minor, an Allegretto by Lemmens, an Impromptu by Hiles, and selections from Handel, Haydn, Guilmant, &c. Mr. Bates's playing was greatly admired, and his next Recital will be looked forward to with much pleasure.

OLDHAM.—A popular Concert was given in the Coffee Tavern, Henshaw Street, on Tuesday evening, the 12th ult., to a very large audience. Several amateurs assisted, and an excellent programme was provided. Mr. Springthorpe and Mr. John Fittou were highly successful in their vocal solos, and an interesting item was the violin performance of Master Sutcliffe. The Concert was a great success. Mr. J. Greaves accompanied.

READING.—The opening Recital on the new organ built by Mr. August Gern for Snaezey Church took place on the 6th ult. The performer was Dr. Woodforde, Organist of the church, who played an excellent selection from the works of the great masters, exhibiting their styles in chronological order. The organ, which cost £335, is in every respect a really fine instrument, and its varied powers were most effectively displayed on the occasion.

SAFFRON WALDEN.—The members of the North-west Essex Choral Association held their sixth Annual Festival in the Parish Church on Thursday, the 14th ult., the choirs taking part being those of Saffron Walden, Debden, Wicken, Rickling, Broxted, Hadstock, Widdington, &c. At evensong the choirs entered the grand old church singing as a procession, "Forward, said the prophet," to a tune by Rev. H. Fleetwood Shepherd. The Psalms were sung to Anglican chants, and the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis to Arnold's setting in A. The Anthem was Tours's "Blessed are they." Mr. Richard Lemaire, the Choir-master of the Association, presided at the organ throughout the Service, and the Rev. J. W. Bennett conducted. The Service, which was admirably rendered, was concluded by the Benediction, given from the altar by the Rev. Canon Jelf, vicar of Saffron Walden.

SCARBOROUGH.—A special Festival Service was held at the Parish Church on Friday evening, the 22nd ult., at which Dr. Armes's new Oratorio, St. John the Evangelist, was sung as the anthem. The solo parts were taken by Miss Marie Thomson, Miss Rigg, Mr. Welch, and Mr. Bland, and the choruses were excellently rendered by a choir of 140 voices. Dr. Armes accompanied his own work upon the organ, and Mr. Knapp conducted.

SHREWSBURY.—On the 1st ult. the annual School Concert was given at the Music Hall by the members of the schools. The first part of the Concert was sacred, and included an organ solo, Andante in E flat (Lefebvre-Wely), "How lovely are the messengers," Organ Concerto (Corelli), "I know that my Redeemer liveth," and the "Hallelujah" chorus. The second part, which was secular, opened with the overture to Il Barbiere di Siviglia, followed by several part-songs, vocal solos, and ending with "Gipsy Life" (Schumann), with full band and chorus. The precision of attack in the chorus was very praiseworthy. Mr. Walter Hay conducted.

TORONTO.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave their final Concert for the season in the pavilion of the Horticultural Gardens on Tuesday, June 7. There was a large attendance. Handel's Oratorio Judas Maccabæus was the work selected, and its performance was a gratifying success, reflecting great credit both upon the Society and its able Conductor. The solo vocalists were Miss McManus, Mrs. Bradley, Miss Scott, Miss Clarke, and Messrs. Jenkins, Warrington, Coleman, Kirk, O'Malley, Ward, Taylor, and Scott, all of whom were thoroughly efficient. The choral singing was unusually good, exhibiting volume of tone, certainty of attack, and crispness and clearness of enunciation. The orchestra was strong, and thoroughly efficient. Mr. Torrington conducted with his accustomed skill.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—A Festival Service was held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Wednesday, April 27, when Dr. Stainer's Cantata The Daughter of Jairus was performed for the first time in this city. The choir, numbering about forty-five voices, sang the choruses with excellent effect, the "wailing" chorus being particularly noticeable for its expression and balance of parts. The soprano music was charmingly sung by Mrs. George Catterell, and the other solo parts were taken by competent amateurs. The work made a very deep impression on the large congregation. Mr. Robert Parker directed the performance at the organ; and, in addition to the instrumental introduction, played Bach's Prelude and Fugue in E minor, and Lemmens's "Triumphal March" as voluntaries.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. J. J. Marsh, Organist and Choir-director to St. Mary the Virgin, Parish Church of Bacton, Suffolk.—Mr. E. J. K. Toms, to St. John's, Fulham.—Mr. John Bottomley, to St. Alban's, Warwick Street, Leamington.—Mr. W. H. Hedley Carus, to St. George's-in-the-East.—Mr. Albert J. OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A careful and judicious abridgment of the larger work, and will be found useful by those to whom the original is inaccessible."—Athenæum.

"A most serviceable abridgment of Stainer and Barrett's well-known Dictionary. Few, if any, words that the student can wish explained are absent from this little volume, which should be in every amateur's library."—Daily Telegraph.

"Of even more general utility is 'Musical Terms.' As a dictionary of reference this little volume should be on the table or shelf of every musician."—Graphic.

"Most of the special information contained in the large volume has been reproduced in this shilling pamphlet, the compression having been judiciously made by Mr. K. M. Ross."—Illustrated London News.

"In its condensed form the work contains a mass of information which is rarely to be met with in books of the class. It is particularly copious in German terms, which are now becoming of nearly as much use as the Italian."—British Mail.

"The musical learner will find much useful information on the principles of music and on many technicalities of the art only to be found in high-priced productions."—Perthshire Advertiser.

"No individual with any pretensions to a musical taste should be without this excellent book of reference."—Perth Citizen.

HAVE BEEN ADJUDGED THE

FIRST PRIZE

FOR UPRIGHT IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

MELBOURNE, March, 1881.

We, the undersigned Jurors for Musical Instruments at the Melbourne International Exhibition, have no hesitation in certifying that Messrs. Challen & Son, of London, have obtained the highest number of points for Cottage Pianos, in the British Court.

The award was based on the excellence of the quality, combined with the cheapness and solidity of the instruments exhibited, which we consider to be well adapted to the requirements of the Colonies.

HOPKINSON'S PIANOFORTES.

PARIS EXHIBITION, 1878,

the highest distinction was conferred upon Messrs. HOPKINSON by the Musical Jurors—viz., the only Gold Medal awarded to any British Manufacturer.

MESSRS. HOPKINSON, therefore, feel fairly entitled to repeat the opinions expressed in the year 1845, by the most celebrated Pianists and Musicians then living—viz., THALBERG, Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, Madame DULCKEN, Sir HENRY BISHOP, and others, as still being correct—that their Pianofortes are "unsurpassed in tone and touch by those of any other maker."

Since these opinions were expressed, the leading musical judges in all parts of the world have confirmed them.

Messrs. H. having also, after carefully conducted experiments, introduced improvements of great value, with confidence invite the Trade, Professors, and the Musical Public, specially to inspect and judge of their Metal-framed Grand and Cottage Pianofortes, which they believe to deserve the eulogium passed upon them by the President of the Musical Jurors at Paris, 1878, that—

"THEY ARE FAULTLESS."

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

CERTAIN venerable institutions of traditional interest to English musicians have lately required props and renovations. There has even been a cry of alarm or of glee, according to particular prejudices in particular purlieus, that the Italian Opera "is going." Meanwhile Promenade Concerts increase and multiply, and appear to pay. Their success proves that the class of entertainment meets a growing demand, and one that indicates not so much a change in the musical taste of the public, as a state of transition in general conditions and social habits.

The Promenade Concert in this country has had to adapt itself gradually to climatic and material necessities. Its history could be prettily traced from the old serenade by torchlight in romantic garden, mediæval street, or tavern-yard, to the courtly reign of perruques and wax-lights at Ranelagh or Vauxhall. There are people who are still very much alive who have witnessed a striking development in the history of the subject. They have seen the effulgence of Julien's waistcoat by gaslight, and will have to admit, with that sad mixture of sorrow and hope in such confessions, that their own generation is now eclipsed by the violet-tinted glory of the electric light in Covent Garden Theatre.

It is all very well to say that music by any light will sound the same, but the truth is the system of lighting involves differences in the size and acoustical properties of concert-rooms. It also affects the temperature, and consequently the intonation of the instruments and brilliancy of the music; and, moreover, it very much affects the personal sensations of the hearer and his state of serenity and mental receptivity for music.

Music, like all other subjects, has its sub-divisions, commencing with the two broad divisions, the art itself and the diffusion of the art. It cannot be said that Promenade Concerts have much direct influence one way or the other on what is called the progress of the art. That is at all times a long and serious business, and to a certain extent is independent of concert programmes and of incidental circumstances. It comes chiefly from the producer or inventor, who collects and arranges his materials in the solitude of his study. The means we employ to diffuse the products of art-genius will, of course, react on the creative power existent at any particular period; but if years ago a composer had written a symphony or dramatic scene now admitted to have been a decided advance in the art, the progress was effected there and then as soon as the music was penned. The tedious process of inserting new ideas into the heads of the multitude is an after consideration. When the creative element in music was most in the ascendant, musicians were content to live and die unheard, if not unheard of, beyond the precincts of an Italian city or German principality. Nowadays a composer, if he thinks he is not sufficiently appreciated in the old world, can conveniently remove to the new; and a virtuoso from Thrace or Sarmatia can come to London and realise a fortune in less time than it took our forefathers to get from one place to the other. The material conditions so favourable to the diffusion of the art are already marvellous, and before long they are likely to be still more startling; but it is only too apparent that there is no corresponding progress in the art itself.

Mr. Pepys, on May 28, 1667, found Vauxhall "mighty divertising." Possibly Mr. Pepys was there en garçon; and even to that orthodox old gossip and connoisseur the music was not less of secondary importance than it might be to any of us who, on one of these autumnal evenings in 1881, may choose to stroll through the concert saloon of Covent Garden Theatre into the Floral Hall. In fact, the main attraction of Promenade Concerts is the facility of strolling in and out; and it points to the direction which the amusements of the future are likely to take in competing with the many demands on the time and attention of a very scientifically educated public. The system of lighting places of amusement by electricity will be immensely in their favour in the immediate future. The atmosphere of theatres and concert-rooms during that carboniferous period of modern civilisation now about to pass away was inhospitable enough to confine all but the very young and the very enthusiastic to their books and pianos in their own homes. Consequently a larger proportion than might be of theatre-goers and concert-goers were people who sought amusement for its own sake, and who had the least critical appreciation either of the drama or of the music. At all periods, and particularly under more enticing conditions in regard to animal comforts, the audience at a Promenade Concert will, to say the least of it, be heterogeneous and unprofitable to the too careful analyst. It admits at present, however, of one capital division, into the portion who are seated and the portion who are not. Amongst the former there are whole families of the purest respectability, and of the highest suburban cultivation, who can manage to pass patiently and pleasantly the long intervals between the songs; whilst as a counterpoise there are many young gentlemen of studious habits and æsthetic tastes who will yawn through the songs and waltzes for the sake of the occasional classical excerpt which they assiduously follow with the pianoforte or instrumental score before them. In the much-abused promenade itself, amongst a few less definable items, are loungers of all classes and from all countries; many of whom are men of travel and experience who, if not accomplished amateurs, have a certain musical education, and are no mean judges, and know when to applaud and when to be silent, and who keep in check the greedy, the indiscreet, and the juvenile who love the mere clamour of an encore.

It is altogether a mistake for musicians to take too high and academic a standpoint in estimating the value of Promenade Concerts. It is admitted that these entertainments have no very direct influence on the progress of the art as a musician would understand the term, but in their adaptability to newer conditions they may become a power in the educational or practical domain of the art. In this country above all it is the practical side of music we hear most of and know most about. That is the reason why, being wealthy, we have so much good music and, being narrowly practical, we have so few composers. The majority of our amateurs will sing or play songs or pieces of such a compass or of such a degree of difficulty, but if asked the name of the composer they turn listlessly, and half surprised at the question, to the title-page. They care nothing for the composers or the art; but only for the song or the piece; or at most for the distinguished person who sings or plays one or the other in public. It is not unconstructive to remind ourselves, when we have a good opportunity, that our national failing is made obvious even in arts and sciences in which we succeed better than in music. There is perhaps no immediate connection between music and medicine, or between Promenade Concerts and the late Medical Conference; but no one could help observing the essential distinction between the addresses delivered by the foreign members and by the English members of that assembly. So marked was the difference that even the Times, that embodiment of English sentiment, rather ridiculed our own practitioners as bone-setters and blisters; and Sir James Paget himself more euphemistically apologises for their somewhat exclusive attention to a particular branch of their art. The polite world in Church and State very properly feasted and patronised the foreign professors with genuine British hospitality and condescension; and as for their aggressive science, so long as it did not positively account for the apples in the dumpling, and left us a little standing-room on the old ground, it was passed over as not of much practical value.

In regard to music, it is not too much to say that, simply by contact with the outer world and by what the medical professors call "solidism," English opinions and tastes have been revolutionised within the last ten years. The old ways of provincialism, individualism, inefficient private education, family prodigies and village popes, doctors, and masters, are fading before the fierce light which is flashed from one European capital to another, and searches the remotest districts. We may learn something even from cotton-spinners and cloth manufacturers, who are beginning to discover that Manchester and Bradford are only separate functions in a very large organism, and that if their artistic productions are not appreciated as much as they should be by the foreigner, it is not a question of free trade or fair trade, but of being abreast of the world, and of emulating the more scientific knowledge and methods of other countries. In respect to our manufactures, the moral and material conditions in this country have of late years been exceedingly favourable to competition. In art questions it is rather the reverse. Neither in climate nor temperament are we much favoured; and in music our native practicality inclines to "bone-setting"—to the mechanics of the art, and even to what is most mechanical in the act, art, grammar, and form of composition. It is more politic and more dignified to recognise the fact than to whine and complain that our musical compositions are underrated at home or abroad. The great fault of our music is that it has been too timid. Even our musical professors were so modest, or so gauches, that an English orchestra of the very finest material was, since the period of railways and continuous immigration, often thought incomplete without some adequately bedizened foreigner to conduct. That was partly a result of our former provincialism, our isolation, the domesticity of our musical tastes, and our ignorance of the orchestra. Promenade Concerts, if they serve no other higher purpose, may at least cultivate a taste for orchestral effects; and it seems, from the experience of the last two or three seasons, that our musicians, known or unknown to fame, mean to assert their claims to the bâton. Our advance is palpable. Like raw provincials gradually accustoming ourselves to evening dress, we are some of us beginning to feel at home in higher musical society—higher at least as compared with music-halls. The only danger is that the well-cut coat and unexceptionable cravat are not the only essentials to success; and that occasionally, in the brilliantly lit salons frequented by the élite of what we may call the peripatetic school of musical connoisseurs, we may unconsciously betray the earlier-acquired accent or mien of other resorts. It is not sufficient excuse that the artists at a Promenade Concert should be English if their talents are not equal to the educational level of the audience. Excellent people, who live apart from the world and its vanities, may enjoy the luxury of charitably selecting special objects of condemnation from a confessedly mixed audience; but those who know more about it, and possibly take even a less acute interest in specialties, will know that, with all allowances, the audience at a London Promenade Concert is more critical, and of a more universal education, even in music, than the ordinary class of subscribers who, with their families, attend as a question of fashionable routine places of higher artistic pretensions. By greater refinement and invention in the surrounding attractions as well as in the musical programmes, the audience can easily be still further improved. The electric light is itself a new and brilliant power in the diffusion of art. It is even a new moral power. It is fatal to everything that is tawdry and false; to worn-out decorations, to rusty-red hangings, as well as to renovated complexions, paint patches, dyes, and violet powder. The reign of gaslight has ended in an age of individual pretension and hypocrisy. In the coming era, if there be even less creative power, and in music a temporary exhaustion of old materials, we can honestly work in a new field, in the combination of the arts and in the utilisation to that end of novelties in material conditions. To succeed even in such a direction mere practicality, mere carpentry, will be insufficient; we shall more than ever depend upon the higher cultivation of the national taste, and as much as ever on the enthusiasm and audacity of genius.

CLÉMENT MAROT AND THE HUGUENOT PSALTER.

IV.

GUILLAUME FRANC, son of Pierre Franc of Rouen, appears, says M. Douen, to have been one of the numerous Protestants who were forced to abandon France on account of their religious convictions. He arrived at Geneva while Calvin was at Strasburg, and obtained a licence, dated June 17, 1541, to open a school of music. In 1542 the register of the Council records a payment to Franc for teaching the children to sing.* On the 6th of June in the same year he was appointed "chantre"† of St. Peter's church, and on April 16, 1543, the Council passed a resolution in the following terms: "Inasmuch as the psalms of David are being completed, and that it is very necessary to compose pleasing melodies for them, ordered that Master Guillaume, the chantre, who is very competent to teach the children, should give them instruction for an hour on a day to be appointed, and that Master Calvin should be consulted about his remuneration."‡ This minute no doubt refers to the nineteen psalms on which Marot was then engaged, but which were not published until the following August. It will be observed that although the design of adapting melodies to these psalms is expressly mentioned, nothing is said about employing Franc on this work. His services are retained solely to teach the children the tunes when composed. Still less is there an allusion to any connection between Franc and the edition of the psalter already published. Several applications by Franc for an increase of salary are recorded in the registers, until at last, on his request being refused, he resigned his post on August 3, 1545, and left Geneva for Lausanne. Here he was appointed to the same office in the cathedral that he had held at Geneva, and died about May, 1570. When Franc went to Lausanne in 1545 he found some psalms already in use, but sung to melodies composed by Gindron, a canon of the cathedral. Concerning these melodies Viret wrote to Calvin on July 21, 1542: "We have resolved to sing as soon as possible the music of the psalms composed by Gindron, which is much easier and more pleasing than yours, and which we would have preferred to see printed in place of that which is in use with you."* In this, as in other respects, Lausanne shows a tendency to assert her own independence, and a disinclination to submit to the supremacy of Geneva. A rival psalter was the natural result.

* The reader will remember the Ordonnance of November 20, 1541, already mentioned.

† We retain the French word, for which there is no precise equivalent in English.

‡ Pour autant que l'on paracheue les psalmes de David et quil est fort necessaire de composer vn chant gracieux sur yeulx, ordonné que maystre Guillaume, le chantre, qui est bien propre pour recorder les enfans, les instruire vne heure le iour qui sera fixé, et qu'on parlera de son gage à maystre Calvin.

We have already seen that in 1551 Beza obtained a licence to print "the rest" of the psalms, which, he stated, he had caused to be set to music. We now know that he employed Franc for this purpose, and his design probably was to publish a complete psalter for use at Lausanne, with new tunes to supplement those of Gindron. M. Douen speaks† as if he thinks that such a psalter was accordingly printed at Geneva in 1552, but no trace of it appears, and its publication, though undoubtedly then contemplated, may have been postponed from time to time until Beza had finished his translations of the psalms.

A minute recently discovered in the records of the Council of Geneva has been already referred to. It is of the highest importance, and we now give it in full: "Thursday, 28 July, 1552. With reference to what the said Master Jacques, minister at Lausanne, has stated, that at Lausanne they cannot agree to sing the psalms altered here by Master Louis Bourgeois, nor those of the Sieur de Bèze to which he has set melodies, they propose, for the purpose of singing the psalms translated by Marot, to print them with their original melodies, and also those which the Sieur de Bèze has translated, with melodies which the chantre of Lausanne has set to them. This they have not presumed to do without a licence, wherefore he has asked permission to print them here. Ordered that, seeing the request is reasonable, permission be given to them."

The letter of Viret in 1542 shows the spirit of independence that existed at Lausanne. The minute of 1552 speaks the same language. Lausanne will have nothing to say to Geneva or Genevan tunes. She prefers the "premier chant" of Marot's psalms, and the tunes set by her own chantre to Beza's new translations. The "premier chant" appears to us to mean the melodies to which Marot's psalms were originally sung at Lausanne. The alterations made at Geneva commence with the first edition of the psalter, in which nearly all the primitive Strassburg melodies were more or less modified.

But the Order of Council tells us more. It settles the question of the editorship of the Genevan psalter, and proves that the alterations made in the melodies, the six new tunes introduced before 1549,‡ and the thirty-four tunes of 1551 are undoubtedly the work of Louis Bourgeois.§ Much confusion has been caused by a letter addressed by David Constant to Bayle, which says: "I have unearthed a rather curious fact, viz., a certificate which Beza gave under his hand and in the name of the Ecclesiastical Body to Guillaume Franc on November 2, 1552, in which he states that it was Franc who was the first to set to music the psalms as they are sung in our churches, and I have moreover a copy of psalms printed at Geneva in which is the name of this Guillaume Franc, and more than that, a licence from the magistracy, signed Galatin, in 1564, by which he is also recognised as the composer of this music. Our Plantin, in the Lausanna restituta, renders him the same testimony." So long ago as 1745 Baulacre of Geneva had pointed out the errors contained in this statement. He says that Professor Ruchat, who had adopted Constant's account in his Histoire de la Réformation de la Suisse, afterwards saw reason to suspect its accuracy, and on examining the certificate found that it referred solely to the poverty of Franc, the sad condition of his family, and the bad health of his wife, but contained nothing whatever relating to the psalms. Baulacre then proceeds to show that Constant had confounded Franc's Lausanne psalter printed at Geneva in 1565 with the genuine Genevan psalter completed in 1562. As regards the certificate we are inclined to think that Ruchat's investigations were imperfect, and that there may have been some document of the kind spoken of by Constant. It corresponds with what is said in the Council minute of July 28, 1552, and was no doubt intended to support Franc's claim to have set to music the thirty-four psalms of Beza before they were sent to Geneva, and published there with tunes adapted to them by the rival editor. Constant, however, was altogether mistaken in speaking of Franc's tunes as those which were then sung in the churches. By his time the local psalter of Lausanne had been long superseded by that of Geneva.

A copy of Franc's Psalter still exists in the library of Geneva. It bears the title: "Les Pseaumes mis en rime françoise par Clement Marot et Theodore de Beze, avec le chant de l'Eglise de Lausanne. . . . Jean Riuary, pour Antoine Vincent, 1565. Avec privilege, tant du Roy que de Messieurs de Geneve." M. Douen gives a minute description of this volume. The Genevan licence is dated December 1, 1564, and says: "Permission is granted to Guillaume Franc, chantre in the church of Lausanne, to print the psalms of David translated into French verse by Cl. Marot and Th. de Bèze, and to add to them the new tunes which he has set to some of them. . . ." Franc's preface explains his motives:—

Guillaume Franc, chantre of the Church at Lausanne, to the readers, greeting.

My brothers, that you may have no occasion to think that by this new edition of the psalms, with their proper tunes, I have desired to undertake anything to surpass those who have laboured on this subject with very great care, or even to correct what has been well done by them, I have deemed it necessary to advise you that in this work I have proposed to myself no other end than the advancement of the honour and the glory of our Lord, by employing the talent he has given me to the service of his Church, and this I have done with reference only to this church of Lausanne, as in such external matters it is lawful to conform to local circumstances, without any separation arising on that account between the churches of our Lord. More than that, I can aver that I was urged to do this more by the advice and request of those who hold office in it than of my own will, alleging as a reason that they thought it very useful for each of the psalms to have its own proper tune. This being considered, I have selected all the best tunes of those which have been in use, as well in this as in other reformed churches, which I have retained.* And as to the last translated psalms which are sung to the tunes of the earlier psalms, I have to the best of my small ability fitted them with tunes of their own, because many persons hearing the aforesaid psalms sung, mistook one text for another on account of the tune. Wherefore I hope that of those who have no other object in view than the advancement of the Kingdom of our Lord, there will be no one who will not take all in good part, and who will not endeavour henceforth, as God may grant him grace, to sing praises to His Majesty in diverse tunes and melodies.

This preface is very suggestive, equally in what it says and in what it does not say. Franc makes no allusion whatever to any Lausanne psalter of earlier date, and we think he could hardly have omitted some reference to it, had such a psalter been ever published. If the inference we have drawn above from the minute of July 28, 1552, be correct, the plan of the Lausanne psalter as then designed was considerably modified in 1565. Thirteen years had elapsed, the Genevan melodies of 1551 had become established, and the completed psalter had been published three years previously. The time was past when the alterations of Bourgeois or the tunes adapted by him to Beza's thirty-four psalms could be rejected, and Bourgeois himself had long left Geneva, so that any personal rivalry, had such existed between him and Franc, was now at an end. Franc therefore contented himself with introducing into his psalter only forty-six melodies differing from those of Geneva. These he distributed as follows: Proper tunes were adapted to the five psalms* of 1554-7 which at Geneva were sung to the melodies of other psalms, also to twenty† of the twenty-two psalms of 1562, left without melodies of their own in the Genevan psalter, while to the remaining two, 69 and 117, were assigned as proper tunes the Genevan melodies of 51 and 127, to which they were already respectively sung, new tunes being supplied to the last-mentioned psalms. The number of new melodies thus furnished by Franc was twenty-seven, or strictly speaking twenty-six, as the tune assigned by him to psalm 51 was that which had been adapted to it in the Genevan psalter of 1542, but which Bourgeois had replaced by another in 1551.

* Viret of course refers to the first edition of the Genevan psalter.

The tunes selected by Franc from sources extraneous to Geneva are nineteen in number, and were set to psalms 17, 27, 29, 48, 54, 55, 56, 57, 75, 83, 85, 94, 102, 106, 132, 141, 146, 147, and 150. Of the rejected Genevan melodies four‡ belong to Bourgeois (1551) and fifteen to the edition of 1562. All the other tunes in the Lausanne psalter are taken from that of Geneva.

Franc in his preface is equally silent respecting any connection between himself and the Genevan psalter. On the contrary, while he adopts tunes from all its editions he distinctly declares them to be the work of others, and we have seen above that when he was himself at Geneva he was engaged by the Council as a teacher only, not as an editor. We think therefore that the evidence before us, scanty as it is, is quite sufficient to sustain M. Douen's judgment that Franc had no part in the preparation of any edition of the Genevan psalter, and we pass on to the claim of Bourgeois, which alone remains to be considered.

Louis Bourgeois, a native of Paris, was invited to Geneva in 1541, about the time of Calvin's return from Strasburg. When Franc went to Lausanne in 1545 his office was given to Bourgeois, jointly with a Genevan named Fabri, the one to serve the Church of St. Gervais, the other that of St. Peter. In 1547 the rights of citizenship were conferred on Bourgeois gratuitously, and he was soon afterwards exempted from some municipal burdens to enable him to devote himself wholly to his studies. Of his private life we know no more than what can be gathered from some scattered entries in the Genevan registers, chiefly relating to fruitless applications for an increase of salary. A curious incident, to which we have already alluded, occurred in 1551. On December 3 the Council ordered Bourgeois to be thrown into prison for having altered the psalm-tunes without leave, and that the tunes already in print should continue to be sung until the others were taken into consideration. Bourgeois obtained his liberty the following day at the intercession of Calvin, and the alterations he had made were soon afterwards adopted. He returned to Paris about 1557, and was still living in 1561. The cause of his leaving Geneva is not exactly known, but it has been ascribed with some probability to the refusal of Calvin and the Council to permit the use of harmonized psalms in public worship. The evidence we have already adduced proves that, certainly from 1545 to 1557, and almost certainly from its commencement, Bourgeois was the musical editor of the Genevan psalter. He was also its first harmonizer. In 1547 he published "Pseaulmes cinquante* de David, Roy et Prophete, traduitz en vers françois par Clement Marot, et mis en musique par Loys Bovrgeoys, à quatre parties, à voix de contrepoint egal consonnante au verbe.† . . . M.D.XLVII." Prefixed to this work is a dedication to André Chenevard, of which we subjoin a translation:—

"I remember sometimes that, through the good-will you bore towards me, you proposed to me to publish some complete work of my composition in music, a task which I was then unable to undertake, because I found no suitable materials on which to labour. For even then I began to hold in contempt those dissolute songs, which could yield no fruit for the contentment of the mind. But now since by the divine grace we have certain psalms of David translated by the late Clement Marot, of eternal memory, in such a happy style that to understand them we need no longer have recourse to foreign tongues, and that they have already begun to be sung in several places, I have thought I could not do anything better or more agreeable to those who take pleasure in praising God with the voice and understanding (as the apostle says) than adapt to the subject and the ordinary tune of the said psalms three parts in harmony, setting note against note. And although the charm and delicacy of music would draw me away from this undertaking, nevertheless I have not given encouragement to this counsel. For it seemed to me that this effeminate music, which is fitted to express either the pleasure or the languor of love, is not suitable to the majesty of these holy and divine affections. And, however absurd I may perhaps appear to very expert master musicians, I prefer holding a reputation of that sort among them to being accounted lax and weak by those who fear God, to whom alone I have had regard in this my undertaking, as persons who do not make an ill use of holy things, and who will weigh with judgment the good will I have to benefit the uncultured, who ought not to be deprived of this holy delight. I freely confess, inasmuch as I am in everything subjected to the subject, that some passages may be found which are not suitable to the sign commonly called the minor-imperfect, but this fault ought not to be imputed to me; for I wished in no respect to tamper with the subject aforesaid. However that may be, I dare to affirm to you, my very dear friend, that master musicians themselves, they who wish to judge according to truth, will not despise our labour, and that purified ears will take no small delight in it, and that in addition to all this, such music is ordinarily suitable to all instruments. As to the rest, for those who will not be content with this work, I have constructed on the same materials of the aforesaid psalms another somewhat more free in style, but conforming nevertheless, as far as possible, to the gravity of the sacred subject. And the whole, as much on account of a friendship of long standing, as of the earnest desire you feel for the advancement of useful knowledge, I inscribe with your name, beseeching all lovers of fair play to weigh the affection of the one for the other, seeing that we endeavour to make common cause in regard to a thing at once useful and delightful, which is the thing to be greatly desired for attaining contentment in this life."

In this preface we see strong evidence of the spirit then prevalent among musicians to which we have already alluded. Bourgeois feels it necessary to put forward an elaborate apology for publishing a work in simple counterpoint, and intended to benefit the uncultured; while, to assert his own position as a musician and to suit the taste of those who required more elaborate harmony, he produced simultaneously another selection of psalms, in which within reasonable limits the resources of musical science might be employed. This second work is entitled, "Le premier liure des Pseaulmes de David, contenant xxiv Pseaulmes. Composez . . . en diuersité de musique, ascauoir, familiere ou vaudeville, aultres plus musicales.‡ Lyon. 1547."

The words alone are common to this and the preceding collection, and the melodies, according to M. Douen, are inferior to those in the Genevan psalter. In fact they are not harmonized melodies, but subjects treated contrapuntally. "Figure" and "fugue" reign supreme.

‡ M. Douen says "five" and "fourteen," but he has apparently forgotten that the tune of psalm 57 was not added until 1562.

* The psalms are numbered consecutively, 1 to 50, without regard to their original order, and, the work being intended for private use, selected verses of each psalm are only given.

‡ Fugued.

A remarkable work, entitled "Le droit chemin de musique," was published by Bourgeois at Geneva in 1550, and contributed greatly to make the art of singing popular, but we pass it without further notice as belonging more properly to the general history of music than to our present subject. Bourgeois returned to Paris about 1557, and, if the supposition be correct that in taking this step he was influenced by a desire to obtain the liberty, denied him at Geneva, of bringing his harmonies into general use, there may be some grounds for M. Douen's opinion that the impetus given to psalm-singing by this novel treatment of the melody may have contributed, in some degree at least, to produce the Huguenot demonstrations that took place the following year in the Prêaux-Clercs.

Although Bourgeois had severed his direct connection with Geneva, he still occupied himself with the psalter. We hear of him for the last time in 1561, when he published at Paris "Quatre-vingt-trois Psalmes de David en musique (fort conuenable aux instrumens) à quatre et cinq et six parties, tant à voix pareilles qu'autrement; dont la basse-contre tient le suiet, afin que ceux qui voudront chanter avec elle à l'vnisson ou à l'octaue accordent aux autres parties diminuées; plus le cantique de Simeon, les Commandemens de Dieu, les prières deuant et apres le repas, et vn canon à cinq parties et vn autre à huit."*

The name of the editor of the new tunes in the Genevan psalter of 1562 is as yet unknown, but an entry in the "Comptes des recettes et dépenses pour les pauvres" informs us that in June and July, 1561, Master Pierre, the chantre, received a sum of money for having set the psalms to music.† M. George Becker, in a letter to M. Douen, suggests that "Master Pierre" may be Pierre Dubuisson, chantre, who received the rights of citizenship gratis in 1565, but here the question must rest until further evidence is forthcoming.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. X.—BERLIOZ (continued from page 410).

A FEW months after the return of Berlioz from the south of France he set out on a more extended tour, proceeding, in the first instance, direct to Vienna. His remarks upon the state of music in the Austrian capital are scarcely within the scope of this work, but we may reproduce a single brief passage as the opinion of an eminent man upon a state of things which unhappily survives to this day. After referring to the great and growing rarity of dramatic sopranos, Berlioz adds:—

"Not that soprano voices of great power and compass are, like true tenors, diamonds beyond price. No; good and even well-trained female voices present themselves still; but what can be done with such instruments if expression, intelligence, and inspiration do not animate them? It is of real and complete dramatic talent that I would speak. We find plenty of cantatrices whom the public love because they sing showy nothings brilliantly, and whom the great masters detest because of inability to interpret their works in a proper manner. They have voice, musical knowledge, an agile larynx; they want soul, brains, and heart. Such women are veritable monsters, and as formidable to composers as often they are charming. This explains the weakness with which masters have written rôles full of false sentiment, which seduce the public by the showiness of their appearance; it explains also the bastard works we see born, the gradual abasement of style, the ruin of true expression, forgetfulness of dramatic propriety, contempt of what is true, grand, and beautiful, and the decrepitude of the art in certain countries."

During his stay in Vienna Berlioz conducted three concerts with marked success. The public applauded him, the press praised him, his friends gave him a supper, together with a bâton, and the emperor sent him 1,100 francs and a message—"Tell Berlioz that I have been much amused." This the master styles a "singular compliment." Of course there were quaint episodes in the Viennese experience. One day, in a public garden, a little man accosted Berlioz:—

"Monsieur, you are a Frenchman, I am an Irishman; there is, consequently, no national amour propre in my sentiments, and (seizing the master's left hand) I ask permission to shake the hand that wrote the 'Romeo' Symphony. You understand Shakespeare."

"In that case, sir, you have mistaken the hand; I write always with this."

Here the Irishman dropped the wrong member, grasped and shook the right one, and went away saying, "O these Frenchmen—these Frenchmen! They must laugh at everything and everybody, even at their admirers!"

By the way, the reputation of Berlioz as a quiz made him somewhat formidable to his Viennese friends, and he tells, with admirable gravity, how Dessauer wished to convert him to some new musical doctrine, but could never get to the point of unfolding it. "Every time the opportunity offered for us to causer à fond, as he said, if I looked him full in the face with my most serious air, at the moment of beginning his homily, he fancied that I was laughing at him, and, relapsing into silence, put off my conversion till a better time."

From Vienna the master went to Pesth, taking with him the Hungarian March now conspicuous in "La Damnation de Faust." This he had written at the suggestion of a Viennese amateur, who said, "If you would please the Hungarians, compose a piece upon one of their national themes; they will be charmed with it, and you can give me, on your return, news of their 'Eljen' and their applause." A great sensation attended the announcement of the march, and the editor of one paper was so moved by curiosity as to find out the residence of the copyist and go carefully through the manuscript. The next day he met Berlioz:—

"E. I have seen the score of your Rakoczy March.

"B. Well!

"E. Well! I am afraid.

"B. Bah!

"E. You have announced your theme piano, and we, on the contrary, are used to hearing it played fortissimo.

"B. Yes, by your gipsies. Be easy; you will have such a forte as you never heard in your life. You have not read it well. In any case, it is needful to look after the end."

Of the performance, Berlioz says:—

"After a trumpet passage based upon the rhythm of the opening bars of the melody, the theme appeared, played piano by the flutes and clarinets, and accompanied by the strings pizzicati. The public remained calm and silent at this unexpected announcement, but when, on a long crescendo, fugal fragments of the theme reappeared interspersed with the heavy boom of the big drum simulating the report of distant cannon, the hall began to ferment with an indescribable noise, and, at the moment when the orchestra, entering upon a furious mêlée, gave out a long-continued fortissimo, cries and stampings shook the hall; the concentrated feeling of all those excited souls exploded with accents which gave me a shiver of terror; I seemed to feel my hair stand up, and at the end of that decisive section I was obliged to abandon the peroration of my piece, the tempest of the orchestra being unable to struggle against the blast of a volcano, the violence of which nothing could arrest. . . . I was greatly agitated, as may be supposed, after a storm of this nature, and was wiping my face in a little room at the back of the theatre, when . . . I saw enter, unannounced, a man poorly dressed, and with a face lighted up in a strange manner. Seeing me, he threw himself towards me, embraced me with ardour, his eyes full of tears, and exclaimed with difficulty, 'Ah, sir! sir! I am a Hungarian—poor devil—cannot speak French—a little Italian. Pardon my ecstasy. Ah! I understand your cannon. Yes, yes—the great battle—dogs of Germans.' Then, striking his breast heavily: 'In my heart—I bear you—Ah! Frenchman—revolutionary—to know how to make the music of revolutions!' I cannot attempt to paint the terrible exaltation of this man: his tears, the grindings of his teeth! It was almost alarming and quite sublime." On returning to Vienna after his great success, Berlioz was waited upon by the amateur who had suggested the march. The noise of its frantic reception had reached the capital, and our amateur, frightened rather than pleased, said, "I run to beg you not to say a word about me on this matter. If it were known in Vienna that I had contributed in any way to the composition of the march I should be seriously compromised, and it might do me harm."

Berlioz next visited Prague, where he gave six concerts, and enjoyed the satisfaction of presenting his "Roméo et Juliette" to Liszt, by whom that work had never before been heard. Again success rewarded his efforts. The public were delighted, and the virtuosi arranged a supper at which Liszt in their name presented the composer with a silver cup. Hereby hangs a tale which Berlioz may be allowed to tell:—

"Liszt was unanimously chosen to make the presentation speech instead of the chairman, who had not sufficient acquaintance with the French language. At the first toast he made me, in the name of the assembly, an address at least a quarter of an hour long, with a warmth of spirit, an abundance of ideas, and a choice of expressions which excited the envy of the orators present, and by which I was profoundly touched. Unhappily, if he spoke well he also drank well, the treacherous cup inaugurated by the convives held such floods of champagne that all Liszt's eloquence made shipwreck in it. Belloni and I were still in the streets of Prague at two o'clock in the morning persuading him to wait for daylight before exchanging shots, at two paces, with a Bohemian who had drunk better than himself. When day came we were not without anxiety about Liszt, whose concert was to take place at noon. At half-past eleven he was still sleeping; at last some one awoke him, he jumped into a cab, reached the hall, was received with three rounds of applause, and played as, I believe, he had never played in his life before."

Going on to Breslau, our master was somewhat disquieted by the coldness of the public at certain concerts which he attended before giving his own. On one occasion complete silence followed a capital performance of Beethoven's "C minor," and Berlioz augured from this a fiasco for himself. "You are mistaken," said an enthusiastic lady amateur, who lacked finesse, "the public admire the chef d'œuvre of the great master as much as possible, and if they do not applaud, it is out of respect." Berlioz was too keen a humorist not to appreciate this explanation. He adds, "I was much afraid of being respected, but happily without occasion, for at my concert the assembly, to whose respect I doubtless had no adequate claim, thought it a duty to treat me after the vulgar usage adopted all over Europe towards popular artists, and I was applauded in a fashion the most irreverent."

During the whole of this tour our master was busy with his "Damnation de Faust," the libretto of which he had written himself, or rather completed, since portions of a translation of Goethe's lyrics by Gerard de Nerval, set to music by Berlioz twenty years earlier, and two or three scenes by Gandonnière, were incorporated in the work. Berlioz found it easy to be at once poet and composer. He wrote words and music with unexampled facility, taking advantage of every opportunity, in season or out of season, to push on with the task:—

"In an inn at Passau, on the frontiers of Bavaria, I wrote the introduction, 'Le vieil Hiver'; at Vienna, I composed the 'Scene on the banks of the Elbe,' the air of Mephistopheles, 'Voici des roses,' and the Dance of Sylphs. I have already told on what occasion and how I produced in one night, also at Vienna, the march on the Hungarian theme of Rakoczy. The extraordinary effect which it produced at Pesth led me to introduce it into the score of 'Faust,' after taking the liberty to place my hero in Hungary at the beginning of the action, and making him witness the march of a Hungarian army across the plain where he pursues his reveries. A German critic has found it very strange that I made Faust travel to such a place. I do not see why I should have refrained from doing so, and I would not have hesitated to lead him anywhere else, provided it were for the advantage of my work. I was not obliged to follow Goethe's plan, and the most eccentric travels can be attributed to such a personage as Faust without in any degree shocking vraisemblance. Other German critics having much later revived this singular thesis, and attacked me with violence because of the differences between my book and the plan and text of Goethe's 'Faust' (as though there were not other 'Fausts' besides that of Goethe; and as though one could put the whole of such a poem to music without interference with its order), I was silly enough to answer them in the preface to my 'Damnation de Faust.' I have often asked myself why these same critics did not reproach me for the book of my symphony 'Roméo et Juliette,' so unlike the immortal tragedy. No doubt they refrained because Shakespeare was not a German. Patriotism! Fetishism! Crétinism! At Pesth, when one evening I lost myself in the streets, I wrote the choral refrain of the 'Ronde des Paysans' by the light of the gas in a shop window. At Prague I rose in the middle of the night to set down a melody I was afraid would be forgotten—that of the angelic chorus in the apotheosis of Margaret. At Breslau I penned the words and music of the students' Latin song, 'Jam nox stellata'; and on returning to France, having gone to spend some days near Rouen, at the place of the Baron de Montville, I composed the great trio, 'Ange adoré.' The rest was written in Paris, but always as an improvisation, at my own house, at the café, in the garden of the Tuileries, and even on a post of the Boulevard du Temple. I did not seek the ideas; I let them come to me, and they presented themselves in an order the most unforeseen. . . . I look upon the work as one of the best that I have produced, and up till now the public appear to think with me."

But the public of Paris, at all events, did not so think in December, 1846, when "La Damnation de Faust" was twice produced at the Opéra-Comique. Only a few hundreds attended, and the result was catastrophe. Berlioz expected a better fate for his work, and says thereabout:—

"Illusion! Since the first performance of my 'Roméo et Juliette' years had rolled away, during which the indifference of the Parisian public for all that concerned art and literature had made incredible progress. . . . The good people of Paris—those who go to concerts, those who are credited with troubling about music—tranquilly remained at home, caring as little about my new piece as though I had been an obscure pupil of the Conservatoire, and more would have gone to the Opéra-Comique on those two occasions had the poorest work in the repertory been represented. Nothing in my artistic career ever more deeply wounded me than this unexpected indifference. The discovery was cruel but useful, and I have profited by it, because I have never since ventured twenty francs upon the Parisian public's love for my music. I sincerely hope I never shall do so in the future [this hope was not realised, by the way], if I live a hundred years. After two days of inexpressible moral suffering, I fancied I saw the means of escape from embarrassment by a tour in Russia."

Berlioz followed up this idea, and having, by the help of friends, raised a little money, he set out for the capital of the Czar on the 14th of February, 1847. Fifteen days later he reached his destination, and was immediately visited by M. de Lenz (he of the "Trois Styles"), who acted as his sponsor in Russian society, and befriended him in many ways. Berlioz now found his expectations more than justified. The result of the first concert was a profit of 12,000 francs.

"I was saved! I turned mechanically then to the south-west, and could not help murmuring these words, 'Ah! dear Parisians!'"

The second concert proved no less successful, while the first given in Moscow yielded 8,000 francs; and again Berlioz, looking to the south-west, murmured, "Ah! dear Parisians!" It was at Moscow that an incident took place which led the master to remark upon the curious difficulty experienced by the public in comprehending a man who merely writes music and does not play it. The incident, however, was not new:—

"I was nearly insulted at Breslau by a good paterfamilias who absolutely wished to compel me to give his son some violin lessons. When I strongly protested that it would be by the merest chance if I could play, since I had never handled a bow in my life, he took all my words as so much false money, and saw in them only a kind of stupid mystification.

"Sir, you think you are speaking to the famous violinist De Beriot, whose name somewhat resembles mine."

"Sir, I have read your announcement, you give a concert in the University Hall the day after to-morrow, thus"—

"Yes, sir, I give a concert, but I do not play the violin at it."

"What do you do then?"

"I cause the violin to be played; I direct the orchestra. Go yourself and you will see."

"My man restrained his anger, and it was only on leaving the concert that, by dint of reflection, he could understand a musician presenting himself in public without being an executant."

The kindred experience in Moscow was on this wise: the only available hall being that of the Assembly of Nobles, Berlioz waited on the Grand Marshal of the Palace of which it formed a part. He was a "respectable old fellow of eighty," and listened with patience to the musician's request.

"G. M. What instrument do you play?"

"B. I don't play any."

"G. M. In that case how can you give a concert in the hall?"

"B. I have my compositions performed and direct the orchestra."

"G. M. Ah! Ah! that is curious; I never heard of such concerts. I will willingly lend you the hall; but, as you doubtless know, every artist who is allowed to use it must, in return, play, after his concert, at one of the private réunions of the nobility."

"B. The Assembly then, has an orchestra which it puts at my disposal to perform my music?"

"G. M. Not at all."

"B. Then how can it be heard? Surely it is not expected that I shall pay three thousand francs to the performers required for the execution of one of my symphonies at the private concert of the nobles? That would be to rent the hall very dearly."

"G. M. Then, sir, I am sorry to refuse you. I cannot do otherwise."

The old official persisted in this course even when Berlioz made a second application, supported by a resident French artist. It occurred to him, however, that possibly his knowledge of the French language was inadequate, and, upon this, he called in the aid of his wife.

"Madame la Maréchale, whose age was nearly as respectable as that of her husband, but whose features were less benevolent, arrived, looked at me, heard me, and cut short the discussion by saying in French, rapidly, clearly, and concisely:—

"We neither can nor will violate the regulations of the Assembly. If we lend you the hall, you must play an instrumental solo at our next réunion. If you will not play, we cannot lend."

"Mon Dieu, Madame la Maréchale, I could at one time play very well on the flageolet, flute, and guitar; choose which of these three instruments I shall use. But, as I have not touched one of them for twenty-five years, I must warn you that I shall play very badly. But stop; if you will be satisfied with a solo on the drum, I shall probably do better."

At that moment a superior officer entered the room, and, on learning the difficulty, took Berlioz aside, saying: "Do not insist, M. Berlioz, or the discussion will become very disagreeable for our worthy Marshal. Send me your request in writing to-morrow, and everything shall be arranged. I will make it my business." The result was that Russian rule was violated, "for this occasion only," and Berlioz had not to prove his skill on either the flageolet or flute, guitar or drum.

Our master follows up his account of these incidents with some reflections upon the curious ideas that come into the heads of young people with regard to music:—

"Without speaking of amateurs who persist in taking useless lessons at an exorbitant price to conquer a barbarous organisation upon which the patience and talent of the best masters are wasted; or of those dreamers who are persuaded that they can learn music as they do mathematics, by the intellect only; and without taking note of the worthy fathers who have an idea to make their sons colonels or composers—one meets with sad examples of monomania among those who appear least liable to an attack."

Berlioz then proceeds to cite two cases. In the first instance, a young man called upon him in Paris.

"B. Be good enough, sir, to take a seat.

"V. It's nothing—I am a little—I have—sir, I have come into a fortune.

"B. A fortune! Let me congratulate you.

"V. Yes; I have come into a fortune, and I want to know if I shall do well to make myself a composer.

"B. Be good enough to take a seat. Mon Dieu, sir, you credit me with extraordinary perspicacity. Prophecies based on even important works are often wrong. However, if you can show me a score—

"V. No, I have no score, but I will work hard. I have so much taste for music, you know.

"B. No doubt you have already written something—a symphonic movement, an overture, a cantata—

"V. An overture? N-n-no; I have not written a cantata either.

"B. Well, have you tried to write a quartet?

"V. Ah, sir! a quartet!

"B. Well, don't try a quartet. It is, perhaps, the most difficult of all works to treat well, and the masters who have succeeded in it are curiously few. But, without going so high, can you show me a simple romance, a waltz—

"V. (offended). A romance!—no, no, I do not make such a thing as that.

"B. Then you have done nothing?

"V. No; but I will work so—

"B. At any rate you have finished your studies in harmony and counterpoint; you know how to deal with voices and instruments?

"V. As to that—as to that—I know neither harmony, counterpoint, nor instrumentation, but you will see—

"B. Pardon me, sir, you are eighteen or nineteen, and it is too late to begin such studies with any good. However, I suppose you know how to read music at sight and can write from dictation?

"V. Do I know how to sol-fa? Well—no, I don't know the notes even; I know nothing at all, but I have so much taste for music, and I should so like to be a composer. If you will give me lessons I will come to your house twice a day—I will work at night!"

Berlioz, upon this, explained to his visitor the obstacles in his way, and the young man left, like his scriptural prototype, in a sad mood, but evidently with the intention to try another master.

The second case was met with in Moscow, the patient being a Russian of twenty-two:—

"V. Sir, I have an immense passion for music. I have studied all its branches, incompletely, as you may suppose. Moscow offers few opportunities, and I am not rich enough to travel. My parents have vainly tried to turn me from my course, but a great person here is willing to aid me, and has declared that if a competent musician testifies to my real ability he will pay the expenses of my education in Germany and France. Try me, and then write frankly the opinion you have formed. In any case I shall owe you eternal gratitude. If your opinion is favourable, it will give me life, for the constraint now put upon me is death!

"B. Really, sir, I understand what you suffer, and you have all my sympathies. Dispose of me.

"V. A thousand thanks. To-morrow I will bring you the works I wish you to pronounce upon."

Next day, the young man returned, pale and sad:—

"V. I have brought you nothing. I passed the night looking at my MSS., and none seemed worthy to show you, and, frankly, none represents of what I am capable. I will begin something that shall be better.

"B. Unhappily, I am soon going back to St. Petersburg.

"V. No matter; I will send you my new work. Ah, sir, if you knew what fire burns within me! . . . They treat me as a fool here, but, believe me, I am not that, and I will prove it to you."

Berlioz assured the young man of his continued interest.

"Mon Dieu!" said I, after he had gone, 'are not these the symptoms of an exceptional organism? Here is perhaps a man of genius.'

Only once, however, was the young Muscovite heard from, and then to say that he had finished nothing, inspiration having quite deserted him.

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE.

It is a feature, and not the least pleasing feature, of the recent musical revival in England that we are determined to extend the benefits of the art to the lower, and indeed the lowest, strata of the community. The idea of the Italian Opera, for example, being an entertainment exclusively reserved for the upper ten can no longer be sustained in our democratic age. The centre of musical life has shifted from "Gentlemen's Concerts" to "Popular Concerts," and there is every reason to believe that the civilising and refining influence of music will continue, like freedom, to "broaden down from precedent to precedent." Even our Government, although traditionally adverse to the support of art, has recognised the fact by spending—some people say wasting—one hundred thousand pounds a year on the teaching of music in elementary schools; and whatever musicians may think of the artistic value of singing "by ear," they cannot at least fail to appreciate the healthy instinct which has led to these, as yet, somewhat doubtful results. Another move in the same direction has been the organisation of the numerous and various entertainments for the people—using that word in its broadest significance—which have lately sprung up in London, and not in London alone. Philanthropists and musicians have, upon the whole, every reason to rejoice at the results already attained and to look forward still more hopefully to those which the future may have in store. There are no doubt drawbacks to this as to most other movements: pessimists may discover in them one of the many manifestations of dilettanteism too rampant in our age—of that dilettanteism which will make itself heard at any cost, and accept the applause of Islington and Shoreditch, when it must despair of obtaining a hearing at Mayfair. Other objections, and from a different point of view, have been raised against the employment of artists at these cheap concerts. It has been said, and not without a show of justice, that the singers who kindly give their services for such a purpose materially injure the legitimate interests of their profession. Human nature is mean, and there are many people who prefer to hear Mrs. Osgood or Mr. Santley in the far East for the sum of sixpence to paying seven shillings for the same treat at St. James's Hall, perfectly able though they may be to afford the latter amount.

But in spite of all this, and more, there is much in the new movement which one must be a confirmed pessimist not to recognise. If we hear of gentlemen of social position going to the lowest thieves' den at Whitechapel and attracting the inmates thereof (with the assurance, it is said, that there will be nothing in the way of sermonising) to a performance at which ladies and gentlemen sing, and read, and recite for the benefit of these poor outcasts; hearing all this, we can scarcely fail to be pleased that art, even if it be not the very highest style of art, should be put to such admirable purpose. And instances of the same kind might be adduced from the provincial towns, large and small, no less than from the metropolis. Let us take Manchester for an example. Here, the "Art for the People" movement has assumed large dimensions, with fairly satisfactory results upon the whole. Ballad concerts, varied by readings and the like, have been started with considerable success at Pendleton and Hulme, where the population consists chiefly of skilled workmen of the better class, clerks, and tradesmen. More difficult has been the work at Ancoats, where the lowest class of ordinary labourers, to the number of about seventy thousand, had to be appealed to. Here the initiative was entirely due to the energy of Mr. Councillor Rowley, who hit upon a scheme of combining the arts of painting and music for the benefit of the people. In August, 1880, a loan exhibition of high-class pictures by living painters, mostly from the collection of Mr. Rowley, was held at the New Islington Hall, and in the same room concerts were given every evening from 7.30 to 9 o'clock, while the exhibition lasted. A penny was charged for admission, including a brief catalogue raisonné, setting forth in plain language the subject of the pictures and such historic facts as were necessary for their explanation. The concerts were continued during the winter on every Tuesday evening, and again during April of the present year, when another exhibition of pictures belonging to Mr. Galloway, the great ironfounder, took place. Some of the finest specimens of Mr. Madox Brown, Mrs. Butler's (Miss Thompson's) famous "Quatre Bras," and other well-known pictures were amongst the works exhibited. The music was of a varied character and adapted to suit the taste of the audience, ballads, glees, and other popular pieces being included in the programmes. Upon the whole, the combined attractions of the two arts were found to answer their purpose. More than ten thousand people were admitted to each of the exhibitions, and the musical performances were listened to with an amount of decorous attention not always to be met with amongst better-class audiences.

Here, however, as no doubt elsewhere, a difficulty was met with in the apathy of the audience towards such music as was offered to them. The taste of the people has been affected by that curse of modern times, the music-hall; and the workmen of Ancoats frequently found the serious and sentimental ballads "slow" compared with "We don't want to fight," "Tommy, make room for your uncle," and similar masterpieces. And perhaps their instinct was not without a grain of truth. The modern drawing-room ballad or "royalty song" in its way represents a depravity of taste as deep, and less excusable, than any piece of vulgarity for which the "great Vance" or the greater Macdermott is responsible. And it shows, as we said before, a healthy instinct on the part of the working classes that they refuse to consume such weakly stuff. And here we touch upon the vital question of the popular art movement. How are we to find a style of music which will keep the working man awake after nine hours' hard labour, and at the same time be free from the vulgarity of modern taste in high and low circles? Fortunately, the answer to that question immediately suggests itself to the reflecting mind. There is abundance of such art already at hand—abundance, we may say without presumption, greater in this than in any other country. We are of course speaking of the popular ballads and tunes of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, which, as regards variety of form, simplicity and truth of feeling, and beauty of melody, contain all the germs of the highest art development. In addition to this, liveliness, and wit, and humour are not wanting; and that workman must be tired indeed who would not be roused by the sounds of a jig, or a reel, or a hornpipe, to which if he chooses he may beat the time with hobnailed boots or horny hands. On the other hand, he would scarcely fail to have his sympathy or his patriotic ardour roused by the tales of "Black-eyed Susan," "Poor Tom Bowling," or any of Dibdin's fine songs of the sea; for these and other more modern songs of good sound English ring should of course be included in the programme, in addition to the ballads of olden times. By adopting our suggestion and making the "Entertainments for the People" the true home of popular song, the originators of such enterprises would further their philanthropic plans, and at the same time fill up a serious gap in our musical life.

THAT in literature an enduring fame can be made by one work is proved by the fact of the "Elegy in a Country Churchyard" having rendered the name of Gray familiar to all who read English poetry; and that one composition can insure popularity to a musician can equally be proved by the circumstance of the ballad "Kathleen Mavourneen" having made Mr. F. Nicholls Crouch a well-known composer. We do not say that either of these writers has not produced anything else of importance; but unquestionably their popularity rests entirely upon the works we have named. The many admirers of "Kathleen Mavourneen" will then, we are certain, be pained to hear that its composer is now, at nearly eighty years of age, in Baltimore without any occupation, and with a wife and five children (as a local paper informs us) dependent upon him for support. Mr. Crouch has lived a most eventful life. He was originally a performer in the orchestra at the Royal Coburg Theatre in London, afterwards a student at the Royal Academy of Music, then a member of Queen Adelaide's private band. At the patent theatres, where he was engaged, he wrote songs for Miss Tree and Madame Malibran; then became a manufacturer of zinc, in partnership with a Mr. Chapman; this speculation failing, he was appointed supervisor of the music-publishing firm of D'Almaine and Co., Soho Square; went with Max Maretzek to the Astor Opera House, New York, lectured on music at Portland, where he also taught; afterwards became musical director of St. Matthew's Choir, at Washington; on the breaking out of the war enlisted in the Richmond Grays, where he continued until the surrender of General Lee; then, with three broken ribs and his hand "badly mashed," he was engaged as assistant at a farm, and for the last two years was a common workman at a factory, as varnisher. From this post he was recently, with four others, discharged (in order to reduce the expenses of the establishment), and is now without employment or means. He is earnestly desirous of resuming his profession as a teacher of music. Sincerely indeed do we echo the words of the writer of the notice forwarded to us: "Can nothing be done to give him a lift in that direction?"

SOME time ago we drew attention to the fact of a "Beethoven Laundry" being established at Kilburn, and of a street in the immediate neighbourhood being also named after the great composer. Why this particular spot should have been selected for such an honour we have never been able to discover; but it must be regretted that so excellent an example should not have been followed in other parts of the metropolis. We do not desire that more laundries should be identified with the name of an eminent musical artist; but it does appear strange not only that none of our modern squares or streets should be dedicated to the memory of the world's composers, but that no project for placing a statue of one in some open public space should even be mooted. As a proof that such a custom prevails in countries at least presumed to be not more musical than our own, it may be mentioned that the Philharmonic Society of New York has recently opened a subscription for a statue of Beethoven, which is to occupy a prominent position in the Central Park. Now considering how much we pride ourselves upon a knowledge of and love for this composer's works; and, moreover, with the recollection of the good offices performed by our Philharmonic Society in commissioning him to write for English audiences, it is scarcely credible that we should allow the Americans to be beforehand with us in paying so obvious a mark of respect to his memory. But even supposing that we are patriotic enough to glorify only those born on British soil, surely Purcell and some few others of the older English composers might be considered worthy of such national recognition; and we could also name some more modern writers of whose compositions we have just cause to be proud. There can be no reason why we should not erect statues in our public thoroughfares to the great heroes of war; but surely some such testimonial of gratitude might be spared for the great heroes of peace.

ONE of the most earnest workers in the cause to which our own journal is devoted has dropped from the ranks; and not only in the new world, where its labours were carried on, but in other countries where it had long earned the respect of art-lovers, this loss will be deeply felt. Dwight's Journal of Music, published at Boston, in the United States, was one of those periodicals which, whilst reflecting the opinions of the editor, was ever ready to admit the matured thoughts of those whose object was to promote the healthy progress of the art. It may be that, as it held itself aloof from personal conflict, other journals more exciting in character found greater favour with the majority of readers; or it may be that the editor, tired of his weary work of twenty-nine years, wished to retire upon his well-won fame. At all events, in a few pathetic sentences, the announcement appears in the Journal for July 16 that with one more number the publication ends; and by this time, therefore, Dwight's Journal of Music is a thing of the past. We should be sorry to believe that, as stated in his farewell words, Mr. Dwight is compelled to bring to an end so excellent a journal solely from want of patronage; and cannot but think that had he desired to continue what must be to him a labour of love, means would have been found in so artistic a city as Boston for supplying him with sufficient funds for the purpose. But as in the concluding sentence of his address he tells us that he has "no heart to ask or to accept further guarantee from friends," we fear that the resolution he has taken is irrevocable; and can only therefore couple the expression of sorrow we feel at saying farewell to so old and valued a compatriot with a sincere hope that he may long live to enjoy that repose from his duties which we should have preferred to find more amply rewarded.

MUCH has been said upon the power of music to effect most beneficial results upon the afflicted, both in mind and body; and there can be little doubt that a very great deal still remains to be done when the subject shall have been more thoroughly investigated by the medical profession, and certain rules laid down for the treatment of such cases as would be likely to yield to its influence. We have recently heard of a doctor who, finding his patient in a state of confirmed melancolia, managed to induce her to try over some of the music for which she had an especial fondness in former years, and thus not only restored her temporarily to comparative cheerfulness, but, by prescribing a repetition of this medicine—and seeing that she obeyed his directions—at each of his visits, managed in an almost incredibly short time to effect a permanent cure. Of course in this case, and in all others of which we have hitherto heard, the remedy acts indirectly upon the nervous system, and almost unconsciously the patient is relieved. But we now find that the curative process is more directly applied. M. Vigouroux, a French surgeon, it is said has obtained the mitigation of pain by administering a recurrent series of sound-waves, by means of a tuning-fork and a sounding-board, to the affected part. Upon this method M. Bondet has devised an important improvement. A tuning-fork is kept in constant vibration by means of an electro-magnet, and the undulations are communicated to the skin by means of a rod. Neuralgia is thus removed in a few minutes, and anæsthetic effects are induced by a longer action. We are glad to find that this important matter has now assumed so practical a form, and look forward with much interest to the records of its further development.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society's Concerts commence on November 11. The series will include performances of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," "Messiah," "Solomon;" Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist;" Mendelssohn's "Elijah;" Gounod's "Messe Solennelle;" Beethoven's "Mount of Olives;" Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch;" Haydn's "Creation;" and Costa's "Eli."

THE twenty-fourth season of the Monday Popular Concerts will commence on October 31, and continue, with the usual break at Christmas, until April 3, 1882, in all twenty-one concerts. Twenty Saturday Concerts will also be given, commencing on November 5 and terminating on April 1, 1882.

DURING Mr. Carl Rosa's season of English Opera at Her Majesty's Theatre, commencing in January, 1882, in addition to four of Wagner's works, it is announced that he will produce an Opera by Balfe, called "The Painter of Antwerp." The libretto, originally written in Italian, will be adapted into English by Mr. W. A. Barrett.

THE Philharmonic Society begins its seventieth season on February 9, 1882. Eight Concerts will be given, the prospectus including Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony, Berlioz' "Return to Life," Rubinstein's "Paradise Lost," and a new work composed expressly by Raff.

WE are informed that Herr Franke, who has recently been with Herr Richard Wagner at Bayreuth, has arranged with him to hold the exclusive right to the performance of the "Meistersinger" in England and America in 1882, 1883, and 1884.

MR. J. B. LOTT, Mus. Bac., Oxon., has been appointed Organist at Lichfield Cathedral. Mr. Lott, who was formerly Assistant-Organist at Canterbury Cathedral and Organist of St. John's Church, Margate, was selected for the post by the Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley.

DR. BRIDGE'S Cantata "Boadicea" will be performed in the Town Hall, Birmingham, by the Philharmonic Society on November 17.

THE Crystal Palace Concerts will be resumed early in October.

THE dates of Mr. Ganz's Orchestral Concerts are April 22; May 6, 20; June 3, 17, 1882.

M. LAMOUREUX announces a series of five Concerts, to take place during May, 1882.

MR. STEPHEN S. STRATTON announces his third season of Popular Chamber Concerts, to be given in the Masonic Hall, Birmingham. The Concerts will be six in number, and will extend from October, 1881, to April, 1882. Among the works to be performed are Septet (Op. 20), String Quartet in A (Op. 18, No. 5), "Kreutzer" Sonata for piano and violin, "Waldstein" Sonata for piano (Beethoven); Octet for strings and wind (Schubert); Octets for strings (Mendelssohn and Gade); Quintet (Op. 34) for piano and strings, and Sonata (Op. 78) for piano and violin (Brahms), &c. English composers will be represented by Cipriani Potter—Trio for piano, clarinet, and bassoon; Quartet for piano and strings (Mr. C. Hubert H. Parry); a Quintet for piano and wind, composed expressly for these Concerts by Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap; a String Quartet by Mr. F. Ward; and the Duo for two pianos (Op. 4) by Mr. C. E. Stephens. No works previously given will be repeated; but it is hoped that a certain number may be performed during the season following. At the last Concert the entire répertoire will be published; subscribers will then mark their favourite pieces, and those receiving the greatest number of votes will be included in future programmes.

THE list of Rehearsals and Concerts given by the Dundee Amateur Choral Union from 1858 to 1878, which has been printed and forwarded to us, shows the excellent work done by this energetic Association during that period, and how much the music-lovers of the city and neighbourhood owe to the untiring exertions of Mr. Nagel, the Conductor to the Union. The list of compositions performed includes most of the standard Oratorios, and also many secular works by modern writers which have received the stamp of approval elsewhere; the vocalists and instrumentalists engaged for all the important parts being, without exception, those of established London reputation.

THE Highgate Choral Society gave a performance of Barnett's "Building of the Ship" on Thursday, July 28, being the third and last Concert of the season. Mr. Worsley Staniforth was, as usual, the Conductor, and the principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Clara Myers, Mr. M. Adams, and Mr. Bluckney. The accompaniments to the Cantata were played on the pianoforte and harmonium by Miss Catchpole and Mr. Edwin Bending. For the next season a repetition of Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" is announced, together with a performance of Cowen's "St. Ursula," and the revival of one of Handel's lesser-known Oratorios.

AN Organ Recital was given by Mr. E. H. Turpin in St. Stephen's Church, North Bow, after the usual Evening Service on July 28. Between the organ pieces anthems were sung by the choir, which was augmented by members of the neighbouring choirs, and numbered about eighty voices. The solo in "As pants the hart," sung by Miss Chapman, and "If with all your hearts," by Mr. Chapman, were given with great purity of tone, just expression, and feeling. Mr. Turpin's organ-playing was excellent, and the theme of general commendation.

JUDGING from the demand for tickets, the success of the Worcester Festival, which commences on the 4th inst., seems already well assured. The list of Stewards, headed by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Worcester, President of the Festival, comprises upwards of 170 names. The orchestra, led by M. Sainton, includes the most eminent professors in every department; and an organ will be erected specially for the occasion by Messrs. Nicholson and Co., Worcester.

A HARVEST Festival will be held at St. Sepulchre's, Holborn Viaduct, E.C., on the evening of Thursday, the 22nd inst., when Weber's "Jubilee Cantata" will be sung as the anthem. Mr. Loaring, the Organist, will direct, and the choir will be augmented for the occasion.

It is announced that Education, the official paper of Trinity College, London, will appear this month under the new title of Musical Education, with a corresponding change in the nature of its contents, the price also being lowered.

ON the 2nd ult. a number of Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's friends assembled in the Windsor Hotel, Edinburgh, and presented him with a gold watch and a purse of sovereigns on the occasion of his leaving the city for Florence. Dr. Pryde, who was in the chair, made the presentation on behalf of the subscribers, and in doing so expressed the great admiration in which Mr. Mackenzie is held, both as a man and as a musician. The members of St. George's Choir have also presented Mr. Mackenzie with a handsome gold-mounted bâton.

WE regret to announce the death of Mrs. Henry Chatfield. The deceased lady was a pupil of Sir George Smart, Sir Henry Bishop, Madame Puzzi, and Sir Julius Benedict, and was well-known as a vocalist at the Ancient Concerts, &c., but ill health compelled her to retire from public life some years since. One of her three daughters, Miss Fanny Chatfield, is known in London as a teacher of singing and concert-singer.

AT the recent distribution of the scholarships and art prizes pertaining to the ladies' division of the Crystal Palace School of Art, Science, and Literature, the scholarship in music was awarded to Miss Florence E. Brooker, of Lawrie Park, Sydenham. The examiners were Mr. Arthur O'Leary, Mr. E. J. Hopkins, Mr. George Grove, and Mr. August Manns.

It has been officially announced that those who have applied for shares in the Royal Italian Opera Company, Limited, may have their money returned. As it is also intimated that the applicants will have the right of priority should an allotment of shares be made, we may, however, assume that the scheme has only been temporarily abandoned.

REVIEWS.

The Bride. A Cantata. Translated from the German of R. Hamerling. Composed by A. C. Mackenzie. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

AS far as can be judged from the vocal score with pianoforte accompaniment, the secular Concerts at the Worcester Festival will be remarkable for one important novelty, for on Tuesday evening the Cantata now before us will be performed for the first time. Mr. Mackenzie has in a brief period so decisively earned a high name as a composer that, had we not been enabled to pronounce in advance upon the merit of the work which has been written especially for this meeting of the three choirs, a composition fully sustaining the author's reputation might have been confidently relied upon. Reserving a more detailed analysis of the Cantata until after its production, we may say that we are in the highest degree impressed with its beauty and artistic construction. The short Prelude, in F minor, leads to a Chorus in the tonic major, the instrumental accompaniment of which is so exquisitely woven in with the vocal parts as to make us long for the due realisation of the movement with the orchestra and choir to which it will be entrusted at the Festival. The Duet which follows, most sympathetically expressive of the words throughout, is of the utmost interest, the modulations and harmonies growing up so naturally as to veil the artistic workmanship with which they are handled. A beautiful point in the succeeding March and Chorus occurs after the close in B flat major, where the third of the chord is held on to form the dominant of G major, the voices being ushered in by a melodious Symphony commencing with a figure borrowed from the preceding Duet. A short tenor Recitative, ending in A flat major, introduces the final Chorus, in F minor—the effect of which is much enhanced by some occasional choral passages unaccompanied—the Cantata concluding in the tonic major, with a repetition of the last two lines of the poetry. We are glad to find that Mr. Mackenzie has been selected as one of the representatives of English music at an English Festival; and still more are we gratified that he has shown himself so thoroughly worthy of the honour.

The Widow of Nain. A Sacred Cantata. Composed by Alfred J. Caldicott, Mus. Bac., Cantab.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. CALDICOTT'S thoughtful and scholarly work, to be produced in the Cathedral at the approaching Worcester Festival, is divided into three parts, the Shadow of Death, Hope, and Resurrection. In the truly sacred character of his music the composer has proved how earnest has been his study of the text; and if he has in parts trusted rather to his erudition than his invention, he may be freely forgiven, not only on account of the nature of his subject, but because everything that he has attempted is thoroughly satisfactory. The Overture is effective and well written; the opening Chorus—with a canon two in one and soprano solo—especially worthy of commendation (the change from minor to major for the solo, with the semiquaver accompaniment, being highly effective); the Aria for contralto expressive; and the Chorus, "In Rama was there a voice heard," containing some able and vigorous writing. In the second part we have an excellent Trio, the soprano and tenor in canon, and an unaccompanied Quartet and Chorus which cannot fail to be effective in performance. A Chorale in the third part—an infinite canon by inversion at the seventeenth below, treble and bass—deserves mention, not only for its musical merit, but because it is so written that turning the paper upside down, and reading the voice parts backwards, the outlines of melody are maintained; this however is a peculiarity with which readers, and not listeners, are concerned. The Widow's solo, after the resurrection of her son, is dangerously like "Elijah" in the text, but the composer has carefully avoided any similarity in the music; and the duet for soprano and tenor which follows—again suggesting comparisons with the duet between the Widow and Elijah—leads effectively to the final chorus; a bold tonal fugue, commencing on the words "A great and mighty prophet is risen," appropriately concluding a work the salient points of which we have merely indicated, as the opportunity of more amply testing its merits is so near at hand.

Phases of Musical England. By Frederick J. Crowest. [Remington and Co.]

As the author of this book tells us in his preface that it is a question whether he should not have entitled the volume "Phases of Unmusical England," it may be imagined that he does not give a remarkably glowing description of our progress in the art. But we are glad to say that he has hope for us; for, although at present music in this country is "fettered with somewhat serious obstacles," he is of opinion that "under the new order of things—a right system of musical education," these will disappear. Whether Mr. Crowest imagines that this "new order of things" will be materially promoted by the publication of the work before us we cannot say; but as he devotes so much of the book to gossiping articles upon matters which have but small relation to artistic progress—such, for example, as "Encores and Encoring," "Street Music," "Pianofortes on the Three-Years System," "Women and Music"—we can scarcely think that the cause he advocates will be either urged forward or impeded by his efforts. Yet he is in earnest when he really does go to work upon the abuses of the art. We tremble as we approach the chapter upon "Musical Criticism," for we are met on the threshold by this definition: "A Critic.—Fancy. An embodiment of one's own wonderful ability, many other people's besides, and his own cleverness"; and, to anybody who can thoroughly understand the author's meaning, we may imagine that this would be extremely crushing. But it is our duty to go forward; and further on we are told that as "musicians do not spring up on English soil near so rapidly as do capitalists, clergymen, shopkeepers, and mechanics," it is the office of critics to help forward the musically ignorant. Well, we have always imagined that this, to a great extent, is being done by the musical press; but Mr. Crowest seems to have discovered that, as a rule, the critics are either too learned or too ignorant, the former class, amongst other displays of their knowledge, invariably making reference to the tympani, corni, and other Italian names for musical instruments, instead of the more homely

English words "drums" and "horns"; and the latter covering their want of information by the use of such phrases as, "Miss Somebody's singing was 'throaty,'" and Mr. Somebody else "lacked both tone and execution in his playing," giving, as a final example, that a writer once said "Herr — played Beethoven's Sonata in three sharps with his accustomed ability," with reference to which sentence Mr. Crowest reminds his readers that "the key of F sharp minor is also indicated by the signature of three sharps," forgetting, we presume, that the critic under correction never asserted that the Sonata was in A major. We are not so much informed in this chapter how criticisms should, as how they should not, be written; but as the author tells us that "the plan of bringing over to this country artists of all kinds and sizes, physically and artistically, has been well tested," we suppose that he would wish those who notice the vocal or instrumental talent of foreign artists to allude also to their height and weight. The chapter on "Church Music" contains many acute observations upon the manner in which the services are performed in the various English churches, mixed up with others which, however good in theory, can have no relation to the practical part of the subject. Indeed, when the author tells us he is "scarcely sanguine that it would be possible to devise a service which, in its musical bearings, would commend itself to all parties," the sentence which follows—that this "should not prevent steps being taken which would perhaps go far towards consolidating and strengthening Church parties and to healing differences which are to a great extent imaginary"—seems simply absurd, for the very differences which are "imaginary" to some are of vital importance to others; and the best we can do, therefore, is to cultivate mutual forbearance and respect. But it is in the article headed "Musical Commercialisms" that the author most decisively speaks out; for here he not only enumerates several grievances, but suggests a remedy for them. Admitting that we have now cheap editions of the standard oratorios, masses and operas, he falls foul of the "sheet-music," which he says is always marked at an absurdly high price, although he afterwards tells us that, as it is sold at half the sum which appears on the title-page, this is "really felt in theory only, and not in practice, which after all is the thing to be chiefly considered." We are perfectly ready to agree with him that this custom should be abolished; but when he goes on to say that the back of the title-page of a song being left blank, another blank occurring on the last page but one, and the outside page being appropriated to the publisher's advertisements, constitute a fraud upon the purchaser, because he does not receive his music at a shilling a sheet, we cannot but think not only that he has forgotten the fact of sheet-music being sold at half-price, but that he argues upon the "shilling a sheet" theory without informing himself whether any such compact really exists between the publishers and the public. The grave charge, however, that he brings against those who issue cheap oratorios to the public is that they are "inaccurate, inartistic, and misleading." Our readers will, we are certain, be glad to know how he proves this, and we hasten, therefore, to inform them. Mr. Crowest possesses a copy of Haydn's "Creation," and—utterly disagreeing with the manner in which the Recitative "And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament," is written, which he says is "due almost wholly to editors and publishers"—proposes an arrangement of his own, and tells us that this is the manner in which the piece would "rightly stand." The well-known passage in the "Messiah," "Behold, and see if there be any sorrow," he affirms is, as printed, "simply nonsense." The word "Behold" should not be "followed by a blank, with a subsequent strange outbreak, 'and see'; but only unite the words 'Behold and see,' and the meaning is at once apparent." Had Mr. Crowest sufficiently studied this passage he would have seen that when, at first, the composer wishes the word "Behold" to be sung as an exclamation, he places a rest after it; but in the following bar, where he desires the words "Behold and see" to form one phrase, he notes it accordingly. The beautiful recitative, "Thy rebuke hath broken His heart," too, in the "Messiah," Mr. Crowest rearranges, and moreover coolly assures us that a young "musical apprentice" would have shaped it into some such form. We can only hope that should such a "musical apprentice" ever grow up to become a mature artist, he would see the necessity of making a public apology for his temerity. But it will naturally be asked how this musical reformer proposes that such a state of things shall be altered. We have already said that he suggests a remedy, and this is it: the publishers should be induced "to destroy their present music-plates, and commission some competent musician to edit the oratorios with the view to bringing the recitatives and songs into some better shape for publication and wholesale dissemination." It is inconceivable that one who professes so to reverence the writings of the great composers should assure us that Handel—who had so mastered the English tongue as almost to teach us its inherent power in recitative—has handed down to us these "deficiencies" (as he terms them), in consequence of his "insufficient acquaintance with the English language." We have criticised Mr. Crowest's book rather more according to its pretension than according to its merit. Some specimens of the peculiar style in which he writes we have given; but the reader will find many more which might scarcely be expected in the work of one who is so unsparing upon the defects of others. "Musical England" is a tempting subject to enlarge upon; but Mr. Crowest's volume merely skims the surface, dwelling at undue length upon comparatively trifling matters, and leaving its really important "phases" untouched.

Art thou weary? Anthem for an eight-part choir.

The Morning and Evening Service, together with the Office for the Holy Communion, in E flat.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F.

By Charles Harford Lloyd, M.A., Mus. Bac., Oxon.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE words of "Art thou weary?" are those of the well-known hymn by the Rev. Dr. Neale, and the composer of the music has given us a setting of them which is in every way clever, and worthy of the pen of a practised student in the art of writing for many independent parts. The Anthem is to be sung without accompaniment; and in order to give due effect to its several ideas the choir should be extraordinarily large and good: no less than eight solo voices, besides an eight-part chorus, being required. We are bound to say, however, that with regard to execution of the separate parts this composition is exceedingly simple and almost hymn-tune like, except the first soprano part, which for sustained height of its compass must be said to be remarkable. The construction of the Anthem, as we have previously hinted, is good, and the parts are carefully and cleverly manipulated; but we are unable to say that the music, from a melodic point of view, is strikingly original or beautiful; and besides this it does not, in our opinion, convey those subtle phases of varied expression which the words appear to suggest.

The music of the Morning and Evening Service is based upon a simple and solidly vocal style. There are no suggestions whatever of secularity, few changes of time or repetition of subjects or phrases, but each canticle proceeds at an almost uniform pace, without solos, and almost without verses, or any interruption whatever, to the original tempo. It is, however, relieved from monotony by effective unison passages and slightly obligato parts for the organ. Each of the vocal parts appears to be well within the limits of the voice to which it is assigned, and therefore may be sung by very ordinary choristers. In our opinion this Service will be found to be a very useful addition to the style of music which it represents; and, if we mistake not, its popularity with choirmasters will arise, not only on account of its own merits, which are considerable, but because it presents so few difficulties, and can therefore be always performed with safety and effect.

In the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis we see Mr. Lloyd in an entirely new light, and he appears to great advantage. This composition was first performed at the Gloucester Musical Festival of 1880, and obtained mention in most of the reports of that time. It is scored with commendable skill for the orchestra, and the vocal part is represented by solos (soprano and baritone), and the ordinary four-part chorus. In the Magnificat the composer has exhibited considerable originality and intelligence in the general management of the words, the historic or dramatic idea being strongly marked by giving the most important parts to a solo soprano voice, while the chorus is made to enter occasionally to intensify the words, which it really does with much effect. As for the various subjects or melodies, though they are good, they do not strike us as being of remarkable beauty, but they are generally handled in a masterly manner. The Nunc dimittis, in which the solo part is assigned to a baritone voice, does not call for any special comment. We do not like the consecutive octaves between the instrumental bass and the voice part, at the very commencement of the Magnificat, and we may mention that we have exactly the same progression in the Te Deum in E flat, at the words "Vouchsafe, O Lord." This, however, is by no means serious, and can be easily remedied. We trust that this Service, which is in many ways excellent, may be heard at some of our chief church festivals where elaborate music is considered necessary.

Sonata in E flat. Composed for the Pianoforte by Alfred Meyer.

As the title-page of this piece informs us that it is "to be had of all music-sellers," we are left in doubt as to where it is published. We find, however, by a communication to the Editor which accompanied the Sonata, that it is the composition of an Australian colonist resident at Melbourne, and may presume therefore that it comes from a publisher in that city. We can scarcely comprehend how any student knowing so little of the forms of composition should commence his exercises with a Sonata; and still less can we understand how he can send it for review to a musical journal. Strangely enough, in the treatment of his harmonies throughout, the author, as a rule, writes carefully; but not only in the plan of the movements, but even in the time signatures and rests, he appears strangely deficient in knowledge. As far as we can understand, the second subject of the opening movement is in the same key as the first; and, after a close upon the dominant of the dominant, comes a double bar. Then, continuing in this key, we have the second subject once more, a few passages having no particular meaning, and a sudden close in the original key. The slow movement has three crotchets in the bar throughout, and is marked 6-8 time; and the last movement is a "Menuetto," in 2-4 time. In spite of all this unfortunate display of ignorance, we have occasional glimmerings both of talent and musical feeling which, properly directed, might be turned to advantage in works of less pretension. It is to be regretted that such facilities for music-publishing should be offered to amateurs, for in no other art are such crude attempts brought before the public. It is evident, however, that Mr. Meyer will scarcely agree with our estimate of his work, for he places the word "Copyright" prominently upon the title-page, as if he were afraid that some envious publishers might infringe upon his property.

Long ago. Song. Written by Edward Oxenford.

In April. Song.

Why? Song. Words translated from the German of Heinrich Heine.

Composed by C. A. Ranken.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

WE presume, by the initials before the name of the composer of these songs, that they are the production of a lady whose excellent music, allied to some verses of the conventionally gloomy order which seems to find favour in these days, we reviewed some short time since. If so, we sincerely congratulate her upon her return to health; and trust that she may in future employ her undoubted talents upon the poetry of the life which lies around her. The four songs now before us are all good, and instinct with that true artistic feeling which may, we hope, prompt the composer to attempt some works of more importance. "Long ago," has a charming figure in the accompaniment, the prominent sixth of the key (A minor) telling with much effect against the oft-recurring fifth in the voice part. We may also mention the modulation into D minor as a point of much interest. "One golden tress" is scarcely perhaps so attractive as the first song on our list; but the melody is sympathetic with the words, and the accompaniments unexceptionable throughout. "In April" is an extremely simple ballad; and with those vocalists who are not too ambitious it should assuredly become a favourite. "Why?" has an expressive unpretending theme in G minor, the placid, flowing accompaniment to which materially aids its effect. As a rule, we think that the composer sympathises more with the minor than the major key; but we mention this rather as a peculiarity than a defect.

Day Dream. Idyll, for the Pianoforte. By Emanuel Aguilar. [Ashdown and Parry.]

THE composer of this little sketch must have been spending a happy day when his dream shaped itself into so attractive and elegant a form as he has here given us. The principal theme, in D flat major, is just such a melody as might pass through a musical mind during a languid reverie in the sunlight; and the treatment of the subjects throughout evidences the work of an accomplished artist. The passages are refined and lie well under the hand, especially with the fingering marked, which, although we do not always agree with, at least has the merit of preserving the position.

Rejoice in the Lord. A Sacred Cantata. By Dr. F. W. Grey. [Forsyth Brothers.]

IF good, solid, artistic workmanship were all the requisites of a sacred Cantata, Dr. Grey's contribution to the too-rapidly increasing number of such compositions would take high rank. But in music, however skilful a "workman" may be, the creative faculty must be the motive power, or there is little chance of the result of his toil achieving more than a temporary success amongst the few who think more of the treatment of the materials than of the worth of the materials themselves. The Cantata opens with an Overture containing—after a brief introduction upon tonic and dominant pedal in B minor—a well-marked fugue in D major, the writing in which is free and satisfactory throughout. The two choruses—which, being marked "Rejoice, No. 1," and "Rejoice, No. 2," are we presume intended to be continuous—are somewhat remarkable for the repetition of words, as may be imagined when we say that No. 1, containing six pages, is entirely formed upon the phrase "Rejoice in the Lord," and that in No. 2 (precisely the same length), the word "always" is merely added. The music, however, is sufficiently varied, and in No. 2 especially there is some good contrapuntal writing. The Duet for soprano and contralto which follows, "Let your moderation be known," is flowing, melodious, and carefully harmonised; and the Air and Quintet, to the words "And the peace of God," show much aptitude for the expression of words, the Quintet particularly being devotional in feeling, although evidencing but little inventive power. The Chorus "Now unto God" commences with unpleasant suddenness on the chord of F major, after the long continuance of the key of E major; but both this and the final "Hallelujah, Amen," have many good points, and impress us with the conviction of their composer being an earnest and accomplished student.

Stars of the Summer night. Song. Words by H. W. Longfellow. Music by Sinclair Dunn. [J. W. Wood.]

ONE more setting of Longfellow's well-known verses by a composer who at least can afford to be simple. The tonic and dominant chords which prevail at the commencement are just becoming monotonous when the modulation from F into D flat occurs; and on the return to the original subject the semiquaver accompaniment is extremely effective. The song is a commendable specimen of honest and melodious writing.

O give thanks unto the Lord. Full easy Anthem for Harvest. Composed by E. A. Sydenham. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS Anthem can be heartily recommended to choir-masters on the look-out for something new and suitable for the coming harvest-time. It opens with a spirited subject in the key of D, 3-4 time, which is followed by a well-contrasted phrase in the key of the relative minor to the dominant. Then comes a melodious lead of sixteen bars for the tenors, which is repeated in harmony by the chorus, after which the Anthem is brought to a conclusion with a few bars in common time.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE Royal Opera of Berlin recommenced its performances on the 15th ult., with Léo Délibes' ballet, "Coppelia"; on the following evening "Tannhäuser" was produced to a crowded house. At the Kroll'sche-Theater Herr Wachtel, the veteran phenomenon, as he may not inaptly be styled, has been giving a series of performances from his well-known répertoire without exhibiting any signs of a falling-off of his marvellous vocal powers. Wachtel's age cannot be far removed from threescore and ten, but the exact year of his birth is not known even, it is said, to himself.

Hermann Goetz's posthumous opera, "Francesca da Rimini" was produced on the 11th ult. at the Leipzig Stadt-Theater where it was, however, but coldly received. In the opinion of competent critics the friends of the gifted composer of "The Taming of the Shrew" have rendered a doubtful service to his memory by bringing to light this unfinished and unequal dramatic work.

Professor Maria von Bocklet, a well-known musician and teacher of the pianoforte at Vienna, died in that city at the age of eighty. He was a pupil of Beethoven.

The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik has the following: "Anton Rubinstein, having recently been entreated by some of his friends to play during the coming season at Vienna, the great virtuoso stated in reply that he intended to undertake but one more concert-tour in England, and then to withdraw from performances in public altogether."

The Imperial Opera House of Vienna reopened its doors on the 1st ult. with a performance of "Fidelio," under the direction of Hans Richter.

M. Emile Sauret, the eminent violinist, has accepted a professorship at the Conservatorium of Cologne.

The Musikalisches Centralblatt says: "In August, 1831, Johann Strauss, then six years of age, composed his first valse, and is therefore now celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of that event. The composer's sister had written down this early composition, and thus preserved it for the family, in whose circle the valse was often played. Since then 398 more valses have flown from the pen of Strauss, in addition to which he is the composer of seven operettas, and is just now engaged upon writing another similar work, entitled 'Lustiger Krieg.'"

In accordance with recently published police regulations, every theatre in Berlin will have to be supplied by the 1st of next month with an iron curtain, which may be lowered in the case of a fire breaking out, thereby separating the stage from the auditory.

Among the special features of interest at the approaching new season of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater will be a magnificent new curtain designed by the Hamburg artist, Hans Speckter. The classical associations clustering round the Hamburg stage in connection with German opera and drama will be represented in a series of pictures, while in the bordering of the curtain the medallion portraits will be inserted of the founder of the first German opera, Gerhard Schott, of Lessing, Schröder the actor, and others.

At Leipzig died on July 27, Johann Christian Lobe, distinguished alike as teacher of musical composition and author of numerous theoretical works connected with the art. He had attained the mature age of eighty-four.

B. Saldoni's interesting work, entitled "Diccionario Biografico-bibliografico de Efemerides de Musicos Espanoles," has just been completed. It consists of four volumes, the first of which appeared some thirteen years ago, and has an important bearing upon the history of musical development in Spain.

The directors of the Théâtre de la Monnaie at Brussels have acquired the right of first performance of M. Massenet's new opera, "Hérodiade," from the composer, to whom they had applied in the most flattering terms. The new work will be produced in November next.

At the Munich Hoftheater a "cyclus" of Wagner's music-dramas, not including however the "Nibelungen Ring," will be performed during the present month.

M. Pradeau, a gifted pianist, one of the most distinguished pupils of Georges Mathias, has, Le Ménestrel states, accepted the post of Director of the Conservatoire at Moscow, vacated by the death of Nicolas Rubinstein.

Several theatres have recently been destroyed by fire, viz., the theatre at Cadiz, in Spain, the Politeama of Bologna, and the National Theatre at Prague.

The following operatic works will be performed during the coming Italian season at the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburg, viz., Délibes' "Jean de Nivelle," Massenet's "Le Roi de Lahore," Auter's "La Stella," Verdi's "Aida," Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," Halévy's "La Juive," Boito's "Mefistofele" and Berlioz' "La Damnation de Faust." Mesdames Sembrich, Trebelli, and Fursch-Madier are among the artists engaged.

Herr Arnold Mendelssohn, a grandnephew of the composer of "Elijah," has written a cantata for eight-part chorus, soli, and orchestra, which was recently performed with much success at Bonn, where Herr Arnold Mendelssohn resides as organist of the Evangelical Church.

Madame Marchesi, the eminent professor of singing, is about to leave Vienna, where for so many years she has been one of the most successful teachers of the art. The gifted lady will, it is said, take up her residence in Paris, whither her numerous pupils will doubtless follow her.

Handel's "Messiah," which had not been produced in Norway within the memory of amateurs, was recently performed at Christiania, where it created a profound impression.

M. Capoul is to create the titre-rôle of an opera entitled "Saïs," which will be produced this season at the Renaissance of Paris. Both libretto and music of the new work are from the pen of Madame Olangier, the daughter of the former director of the Renaissance.

It is again rumoured in the German musical press that Johannes Brahms is busily engaged upon the composition of an opera.

Anecdotes concerning Franz Liszt are just now the order of the day in Continental journals. The following, lately related in the Paris Figaro, may be reproduced in these columns as exhibiting the maestro in one of his most amiable moods. Franz Liszt, so the story runs, found himself one evening, on which he had arranged for a concert in a small Bavarian town, in the presence of an audience of only seventeen persons. Instead of causing the money they had paid to be returned to them, the jovial virtuoso forthwith invited the small assembly to a supper at his hotel. "But we have come here for the purpose of hearing music." "Very well," was the reply, "and so you shall—after we have supped." The little party declared themselves ready to go. They found a good table spread for them, and, after having regaled themselves with the good cheer of their host, the latter redeemed his further promise by playing, in highly animated spirits, until an early hour of the morning.

The Berlin Musik Welt relates the following respecting the origin of the famous "Rakoczy March," made use of by Berlioz in his "La Damnation de Faust." Francis Rakoczy II. returning with his army from the battle of Szibó, on November 10, 1705, was much gratified with a melody played by a certain Hungarian, one Barna Miska. The latter, in commemoration of the event, henceforth gave to his march the name of "Rakoczy." A descendant of Barna, "handsome Zinka," as he was called, played this composition subsequently throughout the land, and hence it soon became extremely popular.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Leipzig.—At St. Thomas's Church (August 6): Motett, "Paras angelicus" (Palestrina); "Ich liebe, weil erhöret," Motett (Rheinberger). At St. Thomas's Church (August 20): "Herr, wer wird wohnen," Motett for chorus and soli (Hauptmann); Misericordias (Durante).

Marburg.—Academical Gesangverein (July 28): Motett, "Ich lasse Dich nicht" (Bach); Air, "Jessonda" (Spohr); Schicksalslied (Brahms); Choral Fantasia (Beethoven); Finale, "Loreley" (Mendelssohn); Vocal soli (Bruch, Gade, Kleffel).

Sondershausen.—Lohconcert (August 14): Overture, "Anacreon" (Cherubini); Serenade (Mozart); Ballet music, "Paris and Helena" (Glück); Funeral March, "Gottedämmerung" (Wagner); Symphony, A major (Reinecke); Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini" (Berlioz).

* Contributions intended for this column should indicate clearly the place and date of performance, as otherwise they cannot be inserted.

COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS.—CONFERENCE ON ORGAN CONSTRUCTION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—On reading the account under the above heading in your August number, I at once recognised the good the Council are seeking to do, and I consider they deserve great help and support. The work they have undertaken is very difficult, and I suspect the difficulties will not end with the Resolutions. I will only venture to criticise one of their Resolutions in particular, having a suggestion to make which I believe to be an improvement.

Resolution No. 23 appears to me to fall short of the very desirable standard aimed at in Recommendations 2 and 3. Having played on a variety of organs, I can quite indorse the nuisance mentioned, consequent upon the great variety of swell pedals in existence. There is a system in existence (and not very new either, I believe) that I lately met with, which I considered so far superior to any I had hitherto played upon, that I am rather surprised it was not mentioned in your article; I refer to the upright louvres, or "balance swell" as I believe it is called. I think it entirely satisfies recommendation No. 2, if not No. 3 also. The shutters, being upright, will of themselves remain in any position or extent of opening that they are put; and with another advantage, that but a small part of their weight has to be overcome with the foot. The pedal itself is a comfort to use, and scarcely requires any learning. It is generally a sort of shoe, moving on an axis across the hollow of the foot, and is so arranged that by depressing the toe the shutters open to the extent of the pressing; and by depressing the heel they close in the same manner. If properly made it works with far less pressure than is required to "pump" the ordinary swell pedal; and, still another advantage, it by its formation admits of being placed in a more convenient and less constrained position. I am acquainted with two instances of it in Birmingham, notably on the fine organ in the Town Hall, where the swell effect may be heard to perfection.

I trust that calling attention to the above system may be at least of sufficient value to justify the insertion of this letter.—I am, sir, yours respectfully,

W. GRIFFITHS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have read with much interest the list of Resolutions on Organ-building as settled by the College of Organists. Founded as they are upon wide experience, they will doubtless obtain largely, and do away with much of present diversity.

This is, I fear, all that can be said for them. Their palpable deficiency is that they are purely empirical in their character, and are founded upon no intelligible principle. For this reason they will be widely challenged. However respectfully, too, one may be disposed to consider the decisions of the College, it is impossible to regard them as more than tentative, for they stereotype many arrangements that are defective in principle. Worse than all, they would, if universally adopted, bar any real progress. For instance, as to principle. The principle of radiation, as applied to the pedal clavier, is right or wrong. The College of Organists advocates it for the fronts of the pedal sharps in plan, and for the clavier generally in sectional elevation, but repudiates it as applied to the clavier generally in plan. Again, they advocate "C under C," obviously to bring the extreme bass notes nearer to the performer; yet they ask for four-feet stops "for melodic use," when the upper range should be equally within reach. Again, the composition pedals are to be p to f from left to right, "but if they are applied to the choir and solo organs" they are to "project from the right jamb," i.e., to be added to the labours of the unfortunate right foot, already overworked by its share of the pedaling and by the swell pedal on the right hand side. The composition pedals of the great are to act on proportionate combinations of the pedal organ. On what principle is this preference given to the great organ? What has the innocent and decent key-slip done that it should be discarded? I do not think that much difficulty would be experienced in bringing the swell shutters under control of the touch. A large power "bellows," supplied through a "reducing valve," can be filled with wind of greater or less density by regulating the pressure on the valve. If the valve be brought under the control of the touch, the "bellows" can be made to open the shutters to a greater or less degree. I obtained approximate results in this direction some years ago. The swell pedal can be fixed at any point by notches on the swinging rod, which should be let into the pedal, a slip being added to prevent the toes being caught and pinched. The swell shutters may be opened more gradually by means of a compound lever, or by a "cam" shaped for the purpose.

So long as pedal organs are arranged as at present, such quaint conglomerations of mechanism as those suggested in Recommendations 4, 5, and 6, are unavoidable. To secure comfort, correctness, and simplicity, a totally different system must be adopted. What that system may be the College of Organists do not apparently care to endeavour to discover. To stereotype archaisms in order to secure uniformity is to make a wilderness and call it peace.—Yours truly,

THOS. CASSON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In common, I am sure, with very many other organ-players, I have read the "Resolutions and Recommendations" respecting organ building by the College of Organists (as reported in your issue of the current month) with much interest. There is another subject which I beg leave to suggest might be a fit and proper one for consideration by the College.

The tune-book in general use at the English and Scotch churches is that known as "Hymns Ancient and Modern." Some two or three years ago a new edition of the work was issued by the publishers, which, besides containing several new and excellent tunes, had the piano and forte marks, &c., attached to the words. This is the subject which I would respectfully submit to the consideration of the College of Organists.

The main question is this—does a metrical hymn-tune admit of so many and constant changes as are indicated in this new edition of the work referred to? Take for example Hymn 172, the second and third verses—is the constant alteration of tone pleasing or not? I am very certain of this, that with small choirs singing in large churches, it is very often almost impracticable.

Your obedient servant,

N. B.

ORGAN PEDALS ATTACHED TO PIANOFORTES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Owing to the numerous correspondence respecting my letter on "Pedals to Pianofortes" in THE MUSICAL TIMES of August, I shall deem it a favour if you will kindly allow me space in reply to say that I am only waiting for communication from some practical pianoforte or action maker, or others who would be willing to assist me in patenting and bringing them out; and until this is done I must of course respectfully decline to give any particulars as to my invention, which, as I have before stated, effectually removes all the objections which must exist in ordinary pedal attachments.

I am, sir, yours respectfully,

JOSEPH SHAW,

Professor of Music, Organist of St. Luke's, Leeds.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted. Our correspondents must specifically denote the date of each concert, for without such date no notice can be taken of the performance.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all Subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music pages are always stereotyped, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

DOTTED CROCHET.—The death of Maurice Bouyges was announced in French papers in March last, and his age stated as sixty-eight, which we believe to be correct. Léon Escudier, according to Fétis's work (from which Grove's Dictionary probably obtained the information), was born in 1821; but, according to the announcement of the death made by the family, his age was sixty-five, which was what we stated in our last issue.

ANXIOUS ONE.—Apply to the Secretary of Trinity College, London.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BISHOP STORTFORD.—The annual Concert of the Bishop Stortford High School took place on Tuesday, the 2nd ult., in the Parish Church. The school and Church choirs were augmented by members of St. Paul's Cathedral, the Chapel Royal, St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Temple Church, Trinity College, Cambridge, &c. As usual, a full orchestra was employed, and band and chorus together numbering one hundred. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Dr. Stainer in A) were given with great spirit, and the anthem (Handel's Sixth Chandos, "O praise the Lord with one consent") was remarkable for the precision and steadiness with which the choruses were rendered. The principal solos were sung by Messrs. Kenningham and Kempton, of St. Paul's Cathedral. The sermon, by the Rev. Dr. Stokoe (Head-master of King's College School, London), was preceded by the Old Hundredth Psalm, and followed by the "Hallelujah" Chorus. Mr. Lewis Marcus, Precentor of the Bishop Stortford High School, and Organist of the Parish Church, conducted, and Mr. C. Warwick Jordan, Mus. Bac., presided at the organ.

BLACKPOOL.—A very successful Concert was given by Mr. Pyatt on the 9th ult. in the Pavilion of the Winter Garden, the great attraction being Mr. Sims Reeves, who was in capital voice, and sang as finely as ever. The other vocalists were Miss Spencer Jones, who was most favourably received, and Signor Foli. Mr. Sydney Naylor's accompaniment was most careful and effective. The orchestral pieces were warmly and deservedly applauded. The selections were made with judgment, and given with that precision and taste which are such marked features of the fine body of musicians making up the Winter Garden band. M. Riviere conducted with ability.

BOVEY TRACY.—Two Concerts, morning and evening, were given by Miss Kate Robinson, R.A.M., at the Town Hall on the 18th ult. The first part comprised a duet for two pianos, Sonata in D (Mozart), played by Miss Leslie Hicks (Torquay) and Miss Kate Robinson; a vocal trio, by the Misses Hicks and Mr. Albert Joll; solo violin by Mlle. Bertha Brousi; song, "Regret," by Miss G. Hicks; a vocal duet by Mr. W. Fletcher and Mr. Patey; solo violoncello, Sarabande and Gavotte (Op. 10), by M. A. Brousi; and Air with Variations, by Miss Kate Hicks. In the second part, the vocal duet "Venetian Boat-Song," by the Misses Hicks, was redemanded, as also was the song "Largo al factotum," by Mr. Patey. The playing of the concert-giver was much admired, and the concert generally was very successful.

BRECON.—The members of the Philharmonic Society gave the first of their two annual Concerts in the Town Hall on Wednesday, July 27, before a large and appreciative audience. The first part consisted of sacred music, including the 95th Psalm (Mendelssohn); and the second was a miscellaneous selection of secular music. The whole was most efficiently rendered, under the conductorship of Mr. W. S. Rawson. The principal artists were Miss S. A. Williams, R.A.M., Miss Gertrude Lewis, R.A.M., Mr. Fredericks, and Mr. A. G. Tuckwell. Miss L. Buck and Mr. R. T. Heins were the accompanists.

BRIDLINGTON QUAY.—On Monday, the 1st ult., a Brass Band and Vocal Contest, arranged by Mr. J. R. Davies, of Bridlington, took place in a large marquee erected in the Collegiate Grounds. The judge was H. R. Eyles, Esq., Professor of the Royal Academy of Music. The Huddersfield Choir was successful in the following:—Glee, "See the chariot at hand" (W. Horsley), prize £4 4s., for which there were five entries; £8 8s. for the choir of sixteen voices which should best render the glee, "When winds breathe soft" (Webbe) (two other parties competed for this prize); £20 for the choir of not fewer than fifty voices, nor more than a hundred, which should best render the "Hallelujah" Chorus from Handel's Messiah without accompaniment. Prizes for solo singing were taken by Mrs. Rhodes, Miss Smythe, Messrs. W. Martin, and Ezra Anty. Mr. Joshua Marshall conducted for the Huddersfield Choir, and to him is due in a great measure their success. Mr. J. E. Ibeson ably accompanied the Huddersfield soloists on the piano. In the Brass Band contest, open to all comers, Meltham Mills gained first prize, £30; Linthwaite, second prize, £20; Hull Orphanage Brass Band, third prize, £10. The Quickstep prize was also won by the Meltham Mills Band; Mr.

G. F. Birkenshaw, of the Meltham Mills Band, had a walk over for the Solo Cornet prize, £2 2s. The special prizes for Brass Bands within a radius of twenty-five miles round Bridlington, were won by Bridlington Artillery Band, first; Bridlington Rifle Band, second. The judge's awards in every class gave general satisfaction.

CARDIFF.—Mr. Charles Joseph Frost, Mus. Bac. Cantab., F.C.O. (of London), gave two Organ Recitals at the Fine Art Exhibition in the Drill Hall, on the 17th and 18th ult. His programmes included Fugue in G (Rheinberger); Marche Solennelle in E flat minor (Schubert); Offertoire in D and Versette in G (Salomé); Morceau de Concert on an air from Weber's Der Freischütz (Lux); Sonatina in C (Frost); Andante with Variations in F (Spohr); Schiller March (Meyerbeer); Prelude and Fugue in D minor (Mendelssohn); Barcarole in G (Spohr); Sonata in C (Sir Fredk. Ouseley); Fantasia in A flat (Frost); Pastorale (Guilmant); March in B flat (Silas), &c.—On the 12th ult. an evening Concert was given at the Drill Hall, under the auspices of the Committee of the Fine Art Exhibition. The noticeable features of the programme were songs by Miss S. A. Williams, R.A.M., and Mr. Videon Harding; and the pianoforte solos, "Carnaval Espagnol" (Delious), "Valse de Concert" (Wieniawski), "Night Winds" (Wallace), Fantasia on Gounod's Faust (Sidney Smith), by Miss Righton, Associate of the London Academy of Music. This lady's playing was much appreciated by a large audience.

CHERTSEY.—On July 28 the choir of St. Peter's Parish Church, assisted by a few ladies and gentlemen of the congregation, gave an open air Concert in the grounds of "Beomond," by permission of E. H. Coleridge, Esq. The programme included portions of Handel's Oratorios Judas Maccabeus and Messiah, and an excellent selection of glees and part-songs. The solos, "Arm, arm, ye brave," "Comfort ye" and "Every valley," were exceeding well given by Messrs. Smith and W. Mori respectively (both members of St. Peter's choir). The choir acquitted itself remarkably well, under the conductorship of the Choirmaster of the Church, Mr. Fred Monk, who was assisted in the accompaniments by Mr. Cornish, Organist of St. Michael's Church, Weybridge.

DOVER.—On Tuesday, the 9th ult., Mr. John C. Ward, Organist of Quebec Chapel, London, assisted by his daughters, Miss Evelyn Ward and Miss Clementina Ward, of the Royal Academy of Music, gave two Organ Recitals at Holy Trinity Church. The first was at three o'clock, and commenced with a selection from Handel's Oratorios as follows: Organ solo, Overture (Susannah), recitative and duet, "O Joachim!" and "When thou art nigh," and recitative and air, "O pious Chelcias!" and "Without the swain's untiring care" (Susannah), recitative and air, "He was cut off" and "But Thou didst not leave" (Messiah), air, "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (Messiah), duet, "O lovely peace" (Judas Maccabeus); organ solo, Fugue in C (Spohr); organ solo, Adagio from third Quartet (Mozart); organ solo, "Frieden's Lied" (Roedel); duet, "My song shall be always" (Lobgesang), recitative and air, "Arise, Elijah!" and "O rest in the Lord" (Elijah), organ solo, Wedding March (Mendelssohn). The second Recital was at half-past seven. The Church was well filled upon each occasion, and the music throughout was thoroughly appreciated.

DUNSTER, SOMERSET.—On the 18th ult., the fifth annual Festival of the Dunster Choral Union was held in the Parish Church. There was a very large congregation, and the whole of the music was satisfactorily rendered. There were nine choirs present, numbering about 180 voices. The Service commenced with a processional hymn, "Art thou still athirst for God?" by Dr. Stainer, which was effectively given by the surpliced choir, aided by a small band of wind instruments. The Special Psalms were sung to chants by Massey, Elvey, and Ouseley. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Dr. Stainer's arrangements of Gregorian tones; the anthem was "Lift up your heads" (Messiah); the hymn before the sermon, "Praise to the Holiest in the height" (Dr. Dykes). After the sermon Sir John Goss's Te Deum in A was sung, and the Recessional was a continuation of the opening hymn, "Art thou still athirst for God?" The Service was intoned by the Rev. J. Utten Todd, Assistant Priest of Dunster; the lessons were read by the Rev. W. W. Herringham and the Rev. J. G. Howes; and the preacher was the Rev. T. Keble, Vicar of Bisley, Gloucestershire. Mr. John Warriner, Choirmaster to the Union, and Organist of the Church, presided at the organ, and performed "Fac ut portem" (Rossini); Andante in G (Battiste); Festive March in D (Henry Smart), &c.

EDINBURGH.—Her Royal Highness the Princess Beatrice and their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh went on the morning of the 25th ult. to hear the grand organ in the University Music Class-room, where they were received by Sir Herbert Oakeley, who played a selection of music by Bach, Handel, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c., and his "Edinburgh March," dedicated to his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh. Princess Beatrice herself tried the organ, and graciously accepted from Sir Herbert a photograph of the fine instrument.

GOLCAR.—On Saturday afternoon, the 13th ult., a Demonstration took place in aid of the funds of Huddersfield Infirmary. The musical arrangements were under the management of Mr. Henry Pearson, Conductor of the Golcar Choral Society. The programme, which consisted of selections from Handel's Messiah and some hymns, was very effectively carried out. The Linthwaite band, for which parts were specially written by Mr. H. Pearson, rendered excellent service, and some of the trumpet parts were very well played on the cornet. The choruses were sung with the heartiness, accuracy, and precision for which the singers of the district are famous.

HUNSTANTON.—A successful Concert was given by the Choral Society on July 27. Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise formed the first part, the solos being taken by Miss Margaret Buntine, Mr. A. H. Cross, and Mr. Allen, and the opening symphony played by Messrs. Cross and Allen (piano) and Mrs. Newsham (organ). The choruses were satisfactorily rendered. The second part was miscellaneous, and comprised songs, part-songs, pianoforte solos, &c., excellently performed by Miss Buntine, Miss M. Fleming, Miss H. Dunn, Mrs. Dunn, and Messrs. Cross, Allen, Scarborough, Thompson, and the Rev. R. F. Manclark.

LEEDS.—On Sunday afternoon, the 14th ult., a service took place at Salem Chapel, Hunslet Lane, on the occasion of the choir anniversary, when Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's sacred Cantata, The Woman of Samaria, was performed by an efficient band and chorus. Much interest was taken in the service, the chapel being crowded in every part, the work in its entirety not having previously been heard in Leeds. The Misses Tetley, Mr. Joshua Tetley, and Mr. Herbert Rhodes sang the solos with artistic feeling and precision. The Quartet "God is a Spirit" was pathetically rendered, and the choruses were on the whole admirably given. Mr. A. Harry ably led the band. Mr. John Burnistor gave valuable aid by his judicious accompaniments on the organ, and Mr. W. Toothill conducted. The Rev. George Hinds, the pastor, presided, and read the story from St. John iv. at the commencement of the Service.

MELKSHAM.—The Parish Church was reopened for Divine Service on Thursday, the 4th ult., after the completion of sundry improvements to the interior, and the erection of a new organ. Full choral music was used throughout; the local choir being aided by the chorists of Salisbury, who, with the cathedral Organist, Mr. Selby, were present, by the Dean's permission. The Magnificat, &c., was Wesley in F, and the anthem, "O praise the Lord," Oakeley. These and the hymns were very creditably sung. Sir Herbert Oakeley, LL.D., Mus. Doc., under whose direction the organ has been built, presided on the occasion. The instrument, which was entrusted to the firm of P. Conacher and Co., of Huddersfield, is highly successful as to quality of tone and ensemble. The softer stops are exquisite, and the pedal department rich and full. Its powers and characteristics were fully displayed in a selection of solos from the great masters played by Sir Herbert, both as "voluntaries" and also after the service. The instrument has three manuals, thirty stops, and complete compass, and is said to have cost some £600, the result of a fund commenced by the Rev. Dr. Wilkinson, late vicar. A vote of thanks from the vicar and churchwardens of Melksham (on behalf of the parishioners) has been forwarded to Sir Herbert Oakeley.

NORTH TAWTON.—The fourth Festival of the Mid-Devon Choral Union was held at St. Peter's Church on July 26. It was unfortunate that the organ (which has been restored by Mr. J. Philpott, of Exeter) was not quite completed, the Organist, Mr. G. J. Robertson, being only able to use the great organ on the occasion. In the afternoon there was a rehearsal of the associated Choirs, and at four the Service commenced. Mr. Farley Sinkins, of Exeter, was the Conductor, and the choirs represented were North Tawton, Sampford Courtenay, Winkleigh, Drewsteignton, Throwleigh, Wembworthy, Exborne, Hatherleigh, Idlesleigh, Monk-Okehampton, and Broadwood-Kelly, two hundred voices in all. The Service was by the Rev. B. H. Wortham, and "The heavens are telling" was the anthem.

OLDHAM.—On Wednesday evening, the 3rd ult., the second of a series of Popular Concerts was given in the Henshaw Street Coffee Tavern, which was well patronised. Mr. Tom Smith, Mr. G. E. Fitton, and Mr. Springthorpe were highly successful in their solos. Several local amateurs assisted. Mr. J. Greaves accompanied.

PENZANCE.—A Musical Fête and Fancy Fair in connection with the Penzance Choral Society was held on the 1st ult. at Polwithe, the seat of Mr. W. Bolitho, who kindly placed his grounds at the disposal of the Society. At the first Concert, an excellent selection of madrigals and part-songs was finely rendered by the members of the Camborne Choral, Truro Philharmonic, and Penzance Choral Societies, conducted by Mr. Nunn, the Royal Marine Band (under Mr. Froehner's able direction) giving valuable aid. The programme of the second Concert was replete with high-class music, which was performed in a masterly manner.

RIPON.—An appropriate testimonial to the memory of the late Organist, Mr. George Bates, has been recently erected, by subscriptions of the old friends and pupils of the deceased, in the north aisle of the nave of the Cathedral. It is a memorial brass, very artistically designed, and enamelled with the following inscription: "To the glory of God, and in memory of George Bates, who was for forty-two years Organist of this Cathedral, this brass is erected. Born July 6th, 1802; died January 22nd, 1881." Around this inscription is the music set to the Veni, Creator, composed by Mr. Bates, and always sung at the Ordination Service in Ripon Cathedral. Over the inscription is a cross, in the four arms of which are enamelled the symbols of the four Evangelists, and around the cross is a scroll, bearing the following words: "He, being dead, yet speaketh." The initial letter of the inscription contains the figure of St. Cecilia, seated at an organ, and the corners are filled in with musical instruments.

WEST LISLEY.—A special interest was given to the Service of Thanksgiving held in this Berkshire village on July 23, on the occasion of the completion of the Parish Church, by the introduction of a small orchestra of strings, conducted by Sir G. Elvey, and led by Mr. T. S. Liddle, Mus. Bac. The anthem was Sir G. Elvey's "I was glad," scored by the composer for the occasion for strings, clarinet, and harmonium. The effect of this and of the "Hallelujah" Chorus after the sermon was extremely good. The congregation was a very large one, and too great credit cannot be given to the ladies and gentlemen of the West Ilsley Choral Society for the way in which all the choral portions of the Service were rendered.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A careful and judicious abridgment of the larger work, and will be found useful by those to whom the original is inaccessible."—Athenæum."A most serviceable abridgment of Stainer and Barrett's well-known Dictionary. Few, if any, words that the student can wish explained are absent from this little volume, which should be in every amateur's library."—Daily Telegraph."Of even more general utility is 'Musical Terms.' As a dictionary of reference this little volume should be on the table or shelf of every musician."—Graphic."Most of the special information contained in the large volume has been reproduced in this shilling pamphlet, the compression having been judiciously made by Mr. K. M. Ross."—Illustrated London News."In its condensed form the work contains a mass of information which is rarely to be met with in books of the class. It is particularly copious in German terms, which are now becoming of nearly as much use as the Italian."—British Mail."The musical learner will find much useful information on the principles of music and on many technicalities of the art only to be found in high-priced productions."—Pertshire Advertiser."No individual with any pretensions to a musical taste should be without this excellent book of reference."—Perth Citizen.

LETTERS FROM BAYREUTH

WAGNER'S

DER RING DES NIBELUNGEN

JOSEPH BENNETT

Special Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Bennett is well-known to English musicians as one of our ablest critics. A musician himself, he adds to remarkable insight and critical judgment—intensified by long experience—the gift of a fine, lucid, and nervous English style. . . . As a permanent record of these famous performances, Mr. Bennett's little book cannot be too highly recommended, and those amateurs who wish to have a general idea of Wagner's theories will find them described in language less enthusiastic certainly than in the letters of the composer's avowed disciples, but without prejudice, and above all without a trace of intention to ridicule. . . . In the appendix are interesting sketches of Nuremberg and Salzburg, and an account of a visit to the graves of Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert."—Manchester Examiner.

"We find so much which we can cordially indorse that we have great pleasure in recommending the little volume as an interesting record of the important events which it describes."—Academy.

STORY OF MOZART'S REQUIEM.

Carefully compiled from the best and most authentic sources,

By WM. POLE, F.R.S., Mus. Doc.

This immortal work, independently of its value as a musical composition, has great interest on account of its very remarkable history. The mysterious commission given for it, the supernatural impression made by this on Mozart, his composition of the work under such pathetic circumstances, partly on his deathbed, the difficulties as to its publication, the fierce controversy as to its authorship, which for fourteen years engaged the attention of some of the most learned men and profound musicians of Europe, the extraordinary disappearance and long concealment of the manuscripts, their ultimate discovery, the difficult and perplexing questions as to their genuineness, the strange revelations gradually made as to the secret history of the various transactions, and the doubts which, after all possible information has been obtained, still hang over the authorship of some parts of the work; all these things, spread over seventy or eighty years, form a story of unparalleled interest in the annals of music.

The object of the present essay is to tell this story, which is hitherto but little known in England; and it will form, it is hoped, an appropriate companion to the various editions of the "Requiem" published by Messrs. Novello and Co.

"Dr. Pole's little book is the result of much careful and painstaking investigation, the conclusions from which are given in the most logical and clear manner, and embody perhaps the most extraordinary story ever heard of in connection with a musical composition, and one which really has all the interest of a romance."—Edinburgh Review.

BOADICEA

QUEEN OF THE ICENI

CANTATA

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY G. E. TROUTBECK

COMPOSED BY

J. F. BRIDGE, Mus. Doc.

Vocal Score, 8vo, 2s. 6d.; Vocal Parts, 2s.; String Parts, gs.; Wind Parts, MS.

"The work, which is in twelve movements, and occupies rather less than an hour in performance, is very decidedly in advance of anything Dr. Bridge has previously written. The orchestration of the work deserves much praise, being neither over-laboured on the one hand nor on the other deficient in variety and colour. 'Boadicea' deserves, and will doubtless obtain, frequent performances."—Athenæum.

"The librettist has succeeded in clothing the story, so full of incident and emotion, in adequate language. The lines are free and flowing, and are, besides, admirably adapted for vocalisation. In the setting of the poem Dr. Bridge has revealed qualities other than those previously manifested by him. The overture is constructed skilfully, and the happy use made of subjects afterwards heard in Nos. 6, 8, and 12, reveals not only excellent workmanship, but also artistic power. The choral numbers have all appropriate themes and masterly treatment; but the Dirge is certainly the most noteworthy, for the lament of the women over the sad fate of their heroic queen is touching in its tenderness, as well as attractive by its quaintness. The tenor solo (No. 8) is a broadly phrased melody; and sung as it was by Mr. Maas, who seemed to revel in its exalted accents, it made a great impression on the audience."—Musical Times.

"So far as can be judged from the vocal score, Dr. Bridge's music is a remarkable specimen of sound musicianship, combined with a lack of any special difficulty. It seems to be an admirable example of a work, written for a local choir, and similarly suitable for other choirs, and in which the composer, without seeking for difficulties, puts forward music worthy his own celebrity, and that of the office he holds."—London Figaro.

"The flattering reception accorded to 'Boadicea' augurs well for the general success of the work; and that it will become a great favourite with musical societies is beyond question."—Manchester Courier.

"The Cantata as a whole is a sound and musicianly work. The solos are of a very high order, and the choruses exceedingly bold and vigorous where vigour is called for."—Musical Standard.

"It is rarely that our church writers essay a secular work of large dimensions. Dr. Bridge is therefore to be commended for his courage; and he is entitled to be not only commended for this, but to be congratulated on his success. His choice of a subject was happy. The tale of the unfortunate Queen Boadicea stands out from the mists of our early history. The subject is national, and far more interest is evoked in such a theme than can be expected over fairies, roses, and other semi-German or mere local legends. . . . No. 11 is a dirge sung by soprano and alto; it is probably the best, as it certainly is the most original number of the work. In No. 12, 'Rest, O noble heart,' a concluding chorus, there are some effective changes of key and time, and a clever fughetto towards the close. The last phrase, as if to presage what was to come, cleverly introduces the first section of our national hymn, 'Rule, Britannia.' The Cantata occupies about an hour in performance, and will form a fresh and useful item in the repertoire of our numerous choral societies."—The Choir.

"It is a work written in the purest taste, and affords a lesson to those who are unaware how excellent effects may be gained by the use of plain and straightforward materials."—Music Trade Review.

"Learned and effective."—Birmingham Gazette.

"Excellent practice for cultivated and diligent choral societies who are in search of novelties for the coming season will be found in 'Boadicea.' The music is appropriate to the theme, and shows decided talent on the part of the composer."—The Graphic.

NOVELLO, EWER & CO.'S MUSIC PRIMERS

DR. STAINER.

In issuing this series of Music Primers the Editor sees with pleasure the realisation of a desire he has long felt, to place in the hands of teachers and students of music a set of educational works of a high standard at a price so low as to render them attainable by all.

The growing interest in music generally, and rapid spread of its study, so very evident in this country, render it of the utmost importance that the student's first steps in every branch should be directed with skill and based on sound principles. The Editor has kept this object steadily in view, and he believes that each one of these Primers will prove to be as carefully constructed in detail as it is comprehensive in design.

Such a result would have been impossible but for the hearty support and sympathy of those authors, men of known ability in their special branches of art, who have embodied the results of their long and valuable experience in their respective contributions.

While gratefully acknowledging the kindness of these gentlemen, the Editor cannot but express a hope that the Primers may prove as useful to the public, and as beneficial to art, as both authors and publishers have endeavoured to make them.

MELBOURNE EXHIBITION, 1881.

HAVE BEEN ADJUDGED THE

GOLD MEDAL

FOR UPRIGHT IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

MELBOURNE, March, 1881.

We, the undersigned Jurors for Musical Instruments at the Melbourne International Exhibition, have no hesitation in certifying that Messrs. Challen & Son, of London, have obtained the highest number of points for Cottage Pianos, in the British Court.

The award was based on the excellence of the quality, combined with the cheapness and solidity of the instruments exhibited, which we consider to be well adapted to the requirements of the Colonies.

PARIS EXHIBITION, 1878,

the highest distinction was conferred upon Messrs. HOPKINSON by the Musical Jurors—viz., the only Gold Medal awarded to any British Manufacturer.

MESSRS. HOPKINSON, therefore, feel fairly entitled to repeat the opinions expressed in the year 1845, by the most celebrated Pianists and Musicians then living—viz., THALBERG, Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, Madame DÜLCKEN, Sir HENRY BISHOP, and others, as still being correct—that their Pianofortes are "unsurpassed in tone and touch by those of any other maker."

Since these opinions were expressed, the leading musical judges in all parts of the world have confirmed them.

Messrs. H. having also, after carefully conducted experiments, introduced improvements of great value, with confidence invite the Trade, Professors, and the Musical Public, specially to inspect and judge of their Metal-framed Grand and Cottage Pianofortes, which they believe to deserve the eulogium passed upon them by the President of the Musical Jurors at Paris, 1878, that—

"THEY ARE FAULTLESS."

A NOVELLO CENTENARY

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

EXACTLY a hundred years from the 6th of the month just passed, a son was born to Giuseppe Novello, an Italian who had migrated to this country and taken an English wife. The couple had had several children already, but doubtless there was joy throughout the little house, numbered 240 in Oxford Street, then called Oxford Road, when the new-comer arrived. Baby Novello in due time received at the font the name of Vincent, and entered upon that initial stage of human life throughout which the future remains a sealed book. It is the centenary of Vincent Novello's birth I now desire to celebrate, in my own fashion, with all the heartiness that comes of reverence and gratitude. Amid the continuous flow of great events in this fast-going world there is danger of overlooking much that deserves a better fate than oblivion. It should be the duty of those who have in any way gained the public ear to act as remembrancers in all such cases, and say, as the shadows of long-gone men and their deeds fly past with the revolution of the centuries, "There, and there, and there are recollections of human souls and human achievements over which let us sing 'Te Deum.'"

Concerning the man Vincent Novello, his person, character, and what would be generally understood as his life, I do not intend to write a great deal. All that can be said is easy to find in a charming little book, "The Life and Labours of Vincent Novello, by his daughter, Mary Cowden-Clarke." The subject, however, should not be entirely passed over—could not be passed over, in fact, without grave damage to the purpose of this writing. The career of Vincent Novello may be summed up, as far as it was determined by himself, in one word—perseverance. Many men less entitled to a niche in the temple of Fame have been endowed with more brilliant parts. Scarcely one of my musical readers, perhaps, would be at a loss to cite examples of those who in the race for the prize of high achievement started with the odds in their favour. But if they played the part of the hare, Novello was a remarkable illustration of the tortoise. He had the genius which Dr. Johnson defined as "the faculty of taking pains"; he won the race, and—himself to some extent, his memory for the greater part—received and is receiving the reward.

Vincent Novello was a born musician. A certain Signor Quellici, concerning whom history remains otherwise silent, is said to have taught him his "notes." For the rest, the boy picked out chords on an old pianoforte, and picked them out so well that, while yet a lad, he became a deputy of Samuel Webbe the elder at the Sardinian Embassy's Chapel, and of Danby at that of the Spanish Embassy in Manchester Square. At the age of sixteen he was organist at the chapel of the Portuguese Embassy, and soon after filled the post of pianist and conductor at the Pantheon, where, it is said, he acquired a remarkable facility of reading from "score." On August 17, 1808, he married Mary Sabilla Hehl, who was for forty-six years his true helpmeet in all things, especially in the training of a family of eleven children, and in the general ordering of a household which, from the nature of the master's avocations, demanded from its mistress a comprehensive superintendence. The modest home at 240, Oxford Street, must have been an attractive place, otherwise the roll of its frequent guests would not have included such names as those of Shelley, Keats, Charles Lamb and his sister, Leigh Hunt, and Hazlitt. In 1812 he became one of the original members of the Philharmonic Society, and presided at the organ when Beethoven's great Second Mass was first performed under the auspices of that body. Subsequently he joined the Royal Society of Musicians, and played the viola at the Festival Services of the Sons of the Clergy, in St. Paul's Cathedral. In 1834, a great honour was conferred upon him by an appointment as Organist at the Musical Festival in Westminster Abbey; and from 1840 to 1843 he was organist of the Catholic pro-Cathedral in Moorfields. Six years later he left England for Nice, and in 1861 entered, through the gate of death, into the reward of his labours. Novello's original compositions, during the years of his long life, bore no comparison to the extent of his industry. He wrote a Cantata, "Rosalba," for the Philharmonic Society, and a large number of pieces for use in Catholic worship. All these witnessed the hand of a sound musician, just as his organ-playing evidenced the taste of an accomplished artist. But it was neither as composer nor as executant that he preferred his chief claim to what Tennyson calls "ever-ringing avenues of song."

I quite expect to be told by the superficial people whose preponderating votes—alas!—decide public opinion, that I am trying to make a hero out of a small personage. Not so fast, good public, if you please. Granted that Vincent Novello's name has no place in the roll of illustrious composers. Granted, also, that his powers as an organist have not become traditional, like those of Paganini as a violinist. Do you not know that the most essential part of a building is always under ground? that the fairest islands of the South Seas are based upon the results of labour carried on for generations beneath the level of the waves? and that, to use the words of Emerson, "every revolution was once a thought in one man's mind," who is not less its author though all trace of the original impulse vanishes ere he is reached? I say that much now regarded as most excellent in the condition of musical culture amongst us owes its existence to Vincent Novello—that he was essentially a pioneer of music, and that few men who have made that art their profession better deserve to have the centenary of their birth kept as a feast.

If I lay this down by way of thesis, nobody acquainted with the matter will dispute it. But a good many people in this age of absorbing subjects are not acquainted with the matter. For such as these I write. Do they know, any of them, what was the state of things as regards the dissemination of musical works fifty years ago? If not, let me tell them that publications of classical music were impossible save as the private venture of enthusiastic individuals. "The difficulty of publishing such works as were the early compositions and arrangements of Vincent Novello," says Mrs. Cowden-Clarke, "can hardly be appreciated at the present day. Publishers could not then be found to run the risk, and the expenses of engraving and printing had to be provided for himself out of his hard earnings." The works of great acknowledged masters were also hard to obtain. As to this, the same authority remarks that when Vincent Novello began his edition of Mozart's and Haydn's masses, "the published masses of Mozart were eight, and of Haydn seven. These works were to be had only in full orchestral score, without separate accompaniment for the organ (that is to say, with merely a figured bass), and these full scores were printed only abroad. . . . Nothing has contributed more to the diffusion of good music than the printing of parts for orchestras; and those who revel in the abundance of the present day (who may be supplied by the publisher at the last moment for a few pence), are not aware what were the previous difficulties of getting up even a small performance of classical music with accompaniment; when manuscript parts had to be made, with much labour, uncertainty, and delay, from scores to be procured only by favour from a few amateur libraries." With the scarcity of music in the land there was, as a matter of course, dearness. Even such works as were published stood at a price almost prohibitive, save to those whose means were above the common sort. It is to the everlasting honour of Vincent Novello that he led the way in putting an end to this state of things. Surely he could have done no better work! In vain is genius of whatsoever order sent upon the earth if it cannot reach the perceptions of men. It is useless for the most eloquent tongue to preach to deaf ears. Raphael himself is powerless with the blind, and tomes full of wisdom avail little if they remain in the seclusion of a few private libraries. A man was obviously needed to foster a taste for good music, and to scatter it broadcast over the land—a man of patience and industry, one not easily discouraged, but perennially inspired by devotion to his art; one, moreover, not too eager for great and rapid results. Such was he whom I now desire to honour as best I may. "No man was more successful than Vincent Novello," writes Mrs. Cowden-Clarke, "in producing music in forms that placed it within reach of the least wealthy. He may be said to have created both demand and supply; for, by his early efforts, he introduced little-known works of great masters, thereby originating a taste and desire, and, by his persevering toil, continued to bring them forth in such abundance and usable shape, that they became necessities not only to musicians, but aspirants in musical cultivation. Out of this abundance and usability grew the requisite cheapness which should place these sterling works within command of the large class of users that had been rendered so extensive; and thus numerous demand and numerous supply alike arose from Vincent Novello's devotion to his art."

Novello's first published work made its appearance in 1811. It was a "Collection of Sacred Music," principally masses and motetts, many of which were from his own pen. The rest he found existing in manuscript at the Portuguese Embassy's Chapel. The very nature of this publication showed the bent of the man's mind, and foreshadowed the sort of work he had been sent into the world to do. Probably he himself never dreamed of what was to follow this modest beginning. He simply obeyed his instinct. There before his eyes were a number of musical works concerning which English amateurs knew little or nothing, and it was, perhaps, as natural for him to set about editing, printing, and publishing them, as for certain flowers to turn their faces to the sun. I do not know for sure, but it would appear that the "Collection of Sacred Music" (which reached a second edition in 1825), was published in the then common form known as "by subscription," and was a purely private venture. If so, the first copy, wherever it may be, is a book of historic interest as the first-fruits of an enterprise which has since attained colossal proportions, and flooded every English-speaking country with the masterpieces of musical art. Happily, the "Collection" was favourably received, and thus encouraged Novello brought out, five years later, "Twelve Easy Masses," in three volumes. Of these works three were written by himself, the remainder bearing the altogether unknown names of Spanish and Portuguese composers, with whom the editor had come in contact through his engagements in the ambassadorial chapels. Subsequently Novello brought out two other works filled with music for use in Catholic worship. These were "Motetts for the Morning Service" and "The Evening Service," and here also his own pen contributed liberally to the interest of the general collection. So far Novello had limited himself to a particular class of work. He did with all his might that which his hand found nearest to it, and, as the organist of a Catholic congregation, naturally sought to gratify that which must have been a personal as well as an artistic inclination. Presently, however, the time came for him to work in a larger and more comprehensive field than the choir-books of a few small places of worship. Knowing his value as a musician of learning and industry, the authorities of the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge invited him to inspect and report upon the mass of MSS. in their collection. Probably those same authorities needed a good deal of enlightenment on the point. Musical MSS. in those days were esteemed as little better than lumber—how long did the priceless autographs of Handel's oratorios remain somewhere in a loft at Buckingham Palace?—and the chances are that the Fitzwilliam treasures were not even catalogued. Whatever the uncertainty on this point, there can be no doubt at all as to Vincent Novello's delight in being, so to speak, turned loose among them. Most of us can sympathise with his feeling and with the enthusiasm which prompted him, in pre-railway days, to visit Cambridge again and again, paying his own expenses; for though the Fitzwilliam authorities were on knowledge bent, they seem to have had, like John Gilpin's spouse, a "frugal mind." It was natural in the son of an Italian to turn with special zest towards the many works by Italian composers contained in the Cambridge library. These we may assume our zealous inspector and reporter to have seen for the first time, and, with a faint reflex of his own delight, we can imagine him turning over precious treasures by Carissimi and Clari, Jomelli and Leo, Orlando di Lasso and Palestrina, Pergolesi and Stradella. That these things made a profound impression upon him we know full well, else would he not have taken upon himself the labour and incurred the risk of publishing (1825) five volumes of selections. We gain some idea of the man's unwearied industry and unquenchable enthusiasm by looking upon those volumes, and remembering that every bar of the music, copied with his own hand, passed under his eye as a subject of careful and loving inspection. But the published selections are, Mrs. Cowden-Clarke informs us, no more than a third of those actually made by this patient worker. "Fine specimens," writes Vincent Novello's daughter "calculated to fill ten volumes more, were copied from the library and still remain in manuscript." Even if these be never published Novello may claim credit for having obtained a large meed of justice for the old ecclesiastical composers of Italy, while he certainly earned the thanks of every amateur by opening a heretofore sealed-up source of enjoyment and profitable study.

The Fitzwilliam task achieved, Vincent Novello proceeded to do for the greatest musician of his own country that which he had accomplished for the masters of his ancestral land. At the time of which I now speak the works of Purcell were difficult to obtain. Most of them existed in the form of manuscript copies, found in cathedral libraries, or in private collections, and therefore of little use from a public point of view. It would be interesting to know what so forcibly drew the attention of Novello to our English master, and inspired him with the zeal requisite for the long, laborious, and, in some respects, thankless task of collecting, editing, and publishing his scattered works. Hearty admiration, the offspring of sympathetic discernment, lay unquestionably at the bottom of the whole endeavour, and sweetened the labour as nothing else could. Little by little, inquiry and importunity brought Purcell's music within Novello's reach, and little by little the work of transcription went on—together with the writing of a "separate accompaniment" instead of the old figured bass—till the material for five volumes lay upon his desk. These were published in 1829, and for the first time Purcell's genius became the common property of the nation. Many of the anthems, services, &c., had never before been printed, which fact alone makes the publication an event in musical history, and entitles the editor to link his name for all time with that of the greatest musical genius of British birth. I need hardly point out that "Purcell's Sacred Music," as published by Vincent Novello, remains to this day not only a standard work, but the only one truly representative of the master as a composer for the Church.

One year after the appearance of Purcell's music, an event happened which should on no account be passed over. This was the first appearance of a Novello as the proprietor of a music-shop. Let me record this fact in the words of a Novello: "It was in the following year (1830) that the family removed to 67, Frith Street, and it was here that Vincent Novello's eldest son, Alfred, first commenced business. A very modest beginning in appearance—a couple of parlour-windows and a glass-door, with a few title-pages bearing composers' names of sterling merit, and Vincent Novello's as editor—but conscientious faith in promoting the diffusion of the best music on the part of him who edited; industry, punctuality, and zeal on the part of the young publisher; with practical counsel, moral encouragement, and untiring sympathy on the part of her who aided husband and son in their public endeavours as in their private hopes and aims, made that original simple parlour-shop the germ of the mart for supplying England—nay, the world—with high-class music." The lesson of the "simple parlour-shop" is an obvious one, but may be few were able to foresee it as they passed the little establishment; may be, indeed, that some sneered at the modest beginning. But it is always dangerous to "despise the day of small things," seeing how often it turns out to be the yesterday of that which is great. "Rivers from bubbling springs have rise at first."

Having now a direct means of communication with the purchasing public, Vincent Novello entered upon another and most useful task. At this time, let me repeat, no more than eight of Mozart's masses were available in a printed form, and of Haydn's only seven. Here, then, was a noble field for the energies of our indomitable musician, who entered into it none the less warmly because knowing that he was in effect putting into the hands of the public music which had been virtually withheld, though accessible after a manner. The existing editions of the masses were all of foreign publication, all in full score, and without a separate organ accompaniment. In other words, they were sealed books even to many of the few who could afford to purchase them. Novello changed all that by persistent and patient labour. From giving the masses of Haydn and Mozart to English amateurs, Vincent Novello went on to the preparation of two volumes, entitled "Convent Music" (1834), all, as a matter of course, for female voices; after which came in unwearied succession editions of Boyce's "Collection of Cathedral Music" as well as of that composer's own anthems; similar works by Greene, Croft, Kent, Clarke-Whitfield, Nares, &c., being also reproduced with, in each case, a separate part for the organ, till then unknown in their history. Not to dwell upon this, since the list of works stretches on and on till the brain becomes giddy with the idea that one man was sufficient for all—let me speak to the editing of fourteen Handelian oratorios; to the editing also of oratorios by Haydn, Romberg, Spohr, and Himmel; of masses and other sacred works by Beethoven, Hummel, Cherubini, Weber, Spohr, &c.; to the issue of a series of pianoforte arrangements for four hands; to the preparation of the "Psalmist"; to the issue of several volumes of organ music which met with enormous favour, and—but there is no need to go into further detail, since I cannot hope to excite in the mind of my reader any deeper sense of astonishment or any stronger conviction of surprising usefulness. Some of those who read this paper are, no doubt, old enough to remember the issue by the house of Novello (1846) of standard oratorios in sixpenny numbers. The writer of these lines recalls the fact with as much vividness as though it were a thing of yesterday. A raw country lad, with an omnivorous appetite for paper on which music was printed, and with very small means of satisfying it, he awaited the arrival of his sixpenny instalments of the "Creation" with a keener impatience than has ever harassed him since; and he is now proud and glad, in his own name and in the names of thousands of amateurs then as young and impecunious as himself, to pay a tribute of grateful thanks to those whose enterprise gave so much enjoyment and imparted so much knowledge. Surely it may be said of Vincent Novello that he neither laboured in vain nor spent his strength for naught.

The time at last came when this hard worker needed rest. In 1849 he laid down the pen and removed to Nice, where he remained in dignified retirement, enjoying all the blessings that "honour, love, obedience, troops of friends" could secure, till his death in 1861, at the age of near upon fourscore years. His last illness was without pain, and, says his daughter, "he was patient, gentle, affectionate, longing for rest. . . . After a life of unsparing industry, with the blessing of beholding his labours achieve honourable success in advancing the art he loved so devotedly, his end was crowned by peace." But, being dead, he yet speaketh, if indeed the best part of him may not be said to live in the enterprise he originated so modestly. Beyond question his councils have prevailed till the present day in the management of that "Sacred Music Warehouse" the name of which is known the world over. The bold reliance upon popular support which led Mr. J. Alfred Novello to cheapen his editions of classical works to a point which even sanguine men thought unsafe, strikes observers as but a legitimate development of his father's course, as, no doubt, it was the realisation of his father's wish. There can be no need to tell how, since then, further expansion of the same principle has worked to the public advantage. These matters, and all they involve, are before every eye, and in full view of them, let us turn again to the devoted musician who made them possible, and whose best monument they are. What is the lesson to be drawn from the patient and unwearied career of him whose birth-centenary I have here called to remembrance? Let the poet of the "Seasons" answer:—

Still to employ
The mind's brave ardour in heroic aims,
Such as may raise us o'er the grovelling herd
And make us shine for ever—that is life.

That, at any rate, was Vincent Novello's life.

CRITICAL EXCURSIONS

By FR. NIECKS.

SCHUMANN.

Is Schumann really the unhealthy, impotent, and skillless composer some critics represent him to be? It seems to me that one consideration suffices to answer this question conclusively. An author of little or no intrinsic worth may engage the public's attention and obtain its favour, but he can do so only for a short time, and unless he is able to win this attention and favour at once he will never win them. Now Schumann's first publications were by no means enthusiastically hailed even in Germany—indeed, the number of his admirers there remained for a considerable time very small; by-and-by, however, his reputation began to grow, continued to grow steadily for forty years, and in the last ten years has at least lost nothing of its solidity and brilliance. In this country Schumann's genius was much later and much more reluctantly recognised; and the shruggings of shoulders and sceptical utterances of musicians, even of high standing, the coldness and the damning, with and without faint praise, with which his compositions, more especially his symphonies, were received, may be instanced as striking manifestations of the vis inertiae—the resistance of habit against novelty. Outside his own country Schumann's compositions were first welcomed by the Dutch. They found most sympathy among the Teutonic nations, and next to them among the Slavonians. Not being congenial to the character of the Romanic races, they were little understood and relished by them. A distinguished French lady pianist informed me that in 1848 Schumann was still absolutely unknown in Paris, and that when some years afterwards, probably in 1851, his Quintet was tried one evening at the house of Mdlle. Wilhelmine Clauss (now Madame Szarvady), it was declared to be obscure and hopelessly incomprehensible. Since then Schumann's works have made some way in France, though only to a very limited extent. In short, as regards Europe, the composer's fame spread in the main northward and eastward rather than southward and westward.

The vicissitudes of literary and artistic reputations are so interesting and instructive that the reader will no doubt forgive a slight digression from the chosen ground of our excursions, and permit me to lay before him a few things worth knowing, remembering, and pondering on, which I picked up while turning over the leaves of some old journals.

On February 6, 1869, the late Mr. Chorley, for many years one of the most influential critics in England, wrote in the Athenæum as follows: "Schumann, the spoilt child of the Crystal Palace directors, was prominently represented on the programme. . . . [The B flat major Symphony] is clearer and brighter than most of the author's works, and as full of earnest intention as any. But yet it evidently did not touch any hearers out of the circle of Schumann's worshippers." The critic speaks his mind more fully with regard to the composer, whose genius he describes as "fantastic and unequal," in the same journal on March 12, 1870. The style of the notice reminds one here and there of a schoolmaster discussing the ill-accomplished task of a too-presumptuous pupil. "This work [the A minor Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra] still remains a subject of dispute; merits being extolled on the one hand as loudly as defects on the other. The character of the music is ostentatiously original, and even what we regard as its beauties do not commend themselves at once to the orthodox ear. Its true worth, however, is in danger of non-discovery amid the smoke of battle. Very naturally the combatants on both sides exaggerate their case, and both may be wrong; in other words, the concerto may be neither so good nor so bad as represented. For ourselves, we fail to see the merit which raises it to the level of Beethoven, and we equally fail to see no merit at all. It is the production of a respectable musician, whose boldness is greater than his genius; and it as little deserves extravagant praise as extravagant censure." In fact, Mr. Chorley thought that Schumann's reputation was dependent on his wife's championship. "Let any one ask himself," he says, "how Schumann's masterpiece* is likely to fare when his widow retires from public life. The answer cannot be encouraging to the composer's strong partisans." How completely time has discredited the critic's prophecy we all know. Would that the example served his hasty confères as a warning to be more cautious in their oracular utterances! I have italicised the most characteristic passages in the above notice; the rest is unimportant, and a mere show of fairness. One other quotation from the same source, and I have done with Mr. Chorley. A propos of one of the Philharmonic Concerts, he writes on April 30, 1870: "Mendelssohn's 'Melusine' gave unqualified satisfaction. Some such result the compiler of the annotated programme must have assumed, as he thought unnecessary even a portion of the elaborate puffing with which Schumann's work [the Rhenish Symphony] was supported."

It requires some effort to realise at this time of day the fact that what we have just now read was actually printed in one of the chief literary and artistic journals, and written by a highly esteemed critic, little more than ten years ago. So strange are the vicissitudes of reputations!

The ways of opinions are not unlike those of pendulums, which, on being set in motion, swing to the right or left, return and swing in the opposite direction, and do not settle down in their position of equilibrium till after a series of oscillations. That is to say, this is what happens if opinions and pendulums are left alone after the first impulse is given. In their judgments on works of art, as in all matters which appeal to their feelings, men are prone to indulge in hyperbole. If pleased, they are lavish with their praise and affection; if displeased, they are equally lavish with their blame and spite. They almost always give either too much or too little; rarely, and only after many mistakes, they give what is due. Mendelssohn was at first overrated, Schumann underrated. As time went on there followed a gradual reversal of the public feeling, and Schumann rose in estimation, while Mendelssohn fell. The opinions regarding these two composers seem to be always moving in different directions, so that when the one is at one end of the arc of oscillation, the other is sure to be at the opposite end. Hans von Bülow, in speaking of the danger in which Mendelssohn's music was of becoming old-fashioned, remarks (in the preface to his edition of the master's "Rondo Capriccioso"): "It has passed through a similar peril already once before, having 'gone' quite 'out of fashion' at one time in Germany, i.e., in Germany's musical metropolis, Vienna (the new German empire has none). The Schumann mania had as completely taken the place of the Felix rage from 1860-1870, as the latter had reigned supreme during the ten preceding years, till local patriotism thought fit to place Schubert on the throne, as Beethoven II." He ascribes the estrangement of the public from Mendelssohn's music to the romanticising influence of Schumann's, and thinks that in this process Chopin had no small share. That he adds "and not the best part of Chopin" is significant, and ought to be noted.

* The Concerto in A minor.

"The process itself," Von Bülow goes on to say, "was simple enough. Any one who plays Schumann tolerably is sure to play Mendelssohn intolerably; things reversed bear a slightly better aspect. Schumann belongs to the 'sentimental,' Mendelssohn to the 'naïf' school.* An æsthetician might carry out the contrast in them of 'Nazarenism' and 'Hellenism' from different points of view still further, provided it be cum grano salis. Now in poetry, it is true, sentimentality cannot exactly be deemed a vice. Even Schiller himself recognised it as a peculiar attribute of the Roman, as opposed to the Greek poets; still a too close intercourse with masters of the 'sentimental' school is apt not only to blunt the comprehension of those of the opposite school, but even to make them distasteful. The whole range of sentimental feelings which are awakened and fostered by a dreamy enthusiasm for the so-called 'sentimentalisms,' when applied to the performance of works belonging to the naïf school, gives a shallow, insipid, jejune, insignificant—in short, unbearable—rendering. By playing Mendelssohn in the same style as Schumann may, nay sometimes must, be played—if the word 'style' may be used where personal caprice reigns uncontrolled—a caricature is produced, which is the more revolting as it does not allow even of an approximate perception of those qualities which form the composer's chief characteristics: beauty and purity of form." If Von Bülow had confined himself to pointing out the excellences of Mendelssohn's music, and the inapplicability to it of the style of execution suited to Schumann's, right-thinking musicians would have been unanimous in giving him thanks for the good service done by him. Nor would any one have quarrelled with him for recommending to learners the study rather of the definite and flowing lines of the former master than of the crabbed scratching and stippling of the latter; the study rather of the perspicuity, the homeliness and sobriety, of the one, than of the intricacy, the dreaminess and enthusiasm of the other. But why visit on Schumann the faults and foolishness of those who swear only by him and ignore or outrage Mendelssohn? What necessity was there to assault one of them in doing battle for the other? Surely von Bülow cannot be of opinion that we ought to throw overboard Schumann's pianoforte compositions in order that Mendelssohn's might be less neglected and better played! Suppose such an act of insanity to be committed: which would be greater, the gain or the loss? The "Songs without Words," the "Rondo Capriccioso," and some other pieces which have still living power in them, excepted, Mendelssohn's pianoforte music has fallen a prey to time—in short, has become "old-fashioned." I do not use the word inconsiderately; indeed Mendelssohn's own opinion of his pianoforte works supports me in what I state.

Von Bülow, on being remonstrated with on account of the reproach of sentimentalism brought by him against Schumann, is said to have tried to justify himself by explaining that he used the word "Sentimentaler" not in the sense of "one having affected sensibility," but in the sense in which Schiller uses the word "sentimentalisch" in the essay "Ueber naive und sentimentalische Dichtung" ("On Naïve and Sentimental Poetry"). But how does Schiller define the word? He tells us that the naïve poet solely follows simple nature and feeling, and confines himself solely to imitation of reality; that the sentimental poet, on the other hand, reflects on the impression which objects make upon him, and that the emotion into which he himself is transported and into which he transports us is founded only on that reflection. In short, the art of the former is objective, that of the latter subjective. It would be interesting to inquire to what extent the words "naïve" and "sentimental," as understood by Schiller, characterise Mendelssohn and Schumann respectively; it would be still more interesting to gauge the relative importance which the two ways of viewing things indicated by these words have in music, the most subjective, as it has been called, of all the arts. But, as subjects like these can only be satisfactorily treated in separate essays, I shall pass on, observing merely, in reference to the second of them, that to leave out of consideration the individuality of the various arts, and to judge them by one common code, has led, and will always lead, to much false teaching in æsthetics, and a lamentable waste of energy in practice.

To return to Von Bülow. It is unmistakably evident that he uses the word "sentimental" disparagingly, and, unlike Schiller, considers the sentimental a thing hardly to be tolerated in art. How meanly he thinks of Schumann's sentimentalism is most clearly seen in the remark that the romanticising influence of Schumann, which led the Viennese away from Mendelssohn, was reinforced by Chopin, but "not by his best part." Two things prevent the great pianist from being an impartial judge in the case under discussion: his cherished recollections of Mendelssohn's fascinating personality, and the temper of his own individuality. Composers of the stamp of Bach, Beethoven, and Liszt, in whom the intellectual element is strongly pronounced, are most congenial to him; the pre-eminently emotional composers, Schumann and Chopin, on the other hand, engage his sympathies but partially and faintly. Von Bülow is not a critic of the Sainte-Beuve type. If he had the Frenchman's flexibility of mind and universality of sympathy he probably would have censured Schumann's faults and shortcomings less harshly, and certainly would not have omitted to do justice to his virtues and excellences. For whatever objections we may rightly urge against the master, he was a man of genius whose works were apocalyptic, revealing to us, if not new worlds, at least new isles and continents.

The allusion to "Nazarenism" and "Hellenism" is, I think, less happy than that to Schiller's distinctions between "naïve" and "sentimental." It is ornamental rather than useful; a pretty blossom, but a barren one. The aims and relative positions of the two composers differed markedly from those of the two parties in the sister-art. Ingenuity may, perhaps, succeed in discovering some resemblance between Mendelssohn and the "Greeks." But what resemblance can possibly exist between Schumann and the "Nazarenes"?—the German Pre-Raphaelites who formed the romantic-religious school of painting of which Overbeck was the chief light, and the beginnings of which Cesar Masini describes characteristically, though not quite justly, in his work, "Dei Puristi in Pittura," as follows: "Several young men came to Rome from Northern Germany in 1809. They abjured Protestantism, adopted the costume of the Middle Ages, and began to preach the doctrine that painting had died out with Giotto, and to revive it, a recurrence to the old style was necessary. Under such a mask of piety they concealed their nullity. Servile admirers of the rudest periods in Art, they declared the pigmies were giants, and wanted to bring us back to the dry, hard style and barbarous imperfection of a Buffalmacco, Calandrino, Paola Uccello, when we had a Raphael, a Titian, and a Correggio."

The most remarkable criticism on Schumann that has as yet been written bears the signature of Joseph Rubinstein, who must not be confounded with either Anton or Nicholas Rubinstein. It is a performance that will go down to posterity, and assures to its author fame—fame such as distinguished madmen and criminals enjoy. As Wagner is believed to have inspired the criticism in question—and, whether he really did so or not, he is to some extent responsible for its publication, seeing that it appeared in the mouth-piece of his opinions, the Bayreuther Blätter (August, 1879), in the editing of which he co-operates with H. von Wolzogen—it may be worth while to inquire what opinion the great poet-musician expressed of Schumann in his own writings. Let us open his “Gesammelte Schriften” at p. 317, vol. viii. There, in the course of his “Elucidations concerning Judaism in Music” (“Aufklärungen über das Judenthum in der Musik”), an open letter addressed to Madame Marie Muchanoff, née Countess Nesselrode, and dated January 1, 1869, he remarks that the influence which the intermingling of the Jewish element exercised on the art is clearly demonstrable from the development of Schumann—one of the most gifted and thoughtful musicians of the post-Beethoven period—as a composer. “Compare,” he says, “the Robert Schumann of the first half of his creative activity with that of the second: there, plastic formative instinct (Gestaltungstrieb), here, diffidence into turgid flatness even to mysterious-seeming shallowness.” If what Wagner adds to the words just now quoted is too fanciful to be accepted as a true history of Schumann’s development as a composer, it undoubtedly furnishes us with a key to his own feelings towards this brother-artist—leads us, in fact, to the root of his opinion of him. “It is in accordance with this that Schumann in the second period looked enviously, sulkily, and peevishly on those to whom in the first period he had, as editor of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, held out his hand so warmly and with such German amiability.” From the attitude of this journal and its language, so unlike “the dialectical Jewish jargon which has crept into modern æsthetics,” Wagner concludes that he would have come to an understanding with Schumann on the problems which engaged him if he had had to discuss them with this artist alone. What gave to the Jewish influence this great power was, according to Wagner, the calm, composed, and imperturbable self-confidence of the Germans—their chief virtue, and, at the same time, the source of their weakness—which, for want of sufficient fire, often degenerates into inertness. “Into this inertness sank also Schumann’s genius, when he found it vexatious to keep his ground against the active, restless Jewish spirit; it was wearisome to him to have always, in the thousand individual traits which first of all presented themselves to him, to make clear to himself what was here going on. Thus he lost unwittingly his noble liberty, and his old friends, whom he had latterly disowned, live to see him carried about in triumph as one of theirs by the music-Jews.”

From the master we will now turn to the disciple. Were I not afraid of hurting delicate susceptibilities, I would address him with an imitation of Horace’s O matre pulchra filia pulchrior. Joseph Rubinstein assumes the rôle of a missionary, and may be instanced as one of that rather numerous class among missionaries—the blind who wish to lead the seeing. Holding that the continuance of Schumann’s popularity would render more and more difficult, and perhaps even impossible, the appreciation of the musical classics, he forthwith commenced to do his utmost to bring into discredit the idol before which, as he thought, a stultified multitude was prostrating itself. But as his loud denunciations and startling vilifications were unsupported by truth and reason, they failed to convince. The blind fanaticism and reckless malice of the preacher did no more than strike the ear and tickle the fancy of his hearers. Bad reasoning may be forgiven when it has for excuse a poor intelligence and defective culture; the case is different when it proceeds from flippancy and downright dishonesty. Joseph Rubinstein takes up his task with the settled determination to do his worst—he goes to work with malice prepense. While the honest critic endeavours to discover the good as well as the bad qualities of his author, he searches for nothing but what is censurable. And if on one or two occasions he doles out a modicum of praise, he does so only to give more point to his blame. His favourite mode of procedure is to lay down an arbitrary rule, show that Schumann did not conform to it, and straightway condemn the culprit. He is also strong in making assumptions, and in discovering the working of the innermost man—seeing, as it were, the invisible. A few of his dicta may serve as a prelude to the quotations from “Ueber Schumann’s Musik” (“On Schumann’s Music”) on which I wish to comment. To be a romanticist and write symphonies Joseph Rubinstein seems to consider a contradiction. According to him the logical consequence of Schumann’s striving after individualisation and descriptiveness would have been the so-called “programme music,” and he blames the composer for having stopped half-way. Schumann having given to some of his pianoforte pieces titles such as “Blumenstück,” “Nachtstücke,” “Kreisleriana,” &c., evidently suggested by the works of E. T. A. Hoffmann and J. P. Richter, the critic concludes that the composer intended to reproduce certain impressions received from these authors. The conclusion is rather hazardous, considering the general nature of these designations and to what service they were put by Richter and Hoffmann. Acquaintance with a few biographical dates would have probably deterred Joseph Rubinstein from stating that Schumann’s resolve to become a virtuoso was owing to the strong incitement which Chopin’s individuality exercised over him; for till 1833 nothing of Chopin was published in Germany except the variations on “Là ci darem” (Op. 2), and these would hardly suffice to determine the career of the young musician. Moreover Schumann had probably begun his serious pianoforte studies with Wieck before he knew even this work; and one of his hands having been injured in 1831, there was henceforth an end to the dream of shining one day as a virtuoso. The uncompromising nature of Joseph Rubinstein’s criticisms may be understood from his description of the first subject of the last movement of the B flat Symphony as “a theme of childish nullity”; the Larghetto of the same work as a watery song-without-words cantilena; the trio (D flat major, 2-4) of the Scherzo from “Overture, Scherzo, and Finale,” as “trivialities.” He attributes Schumann’s success as a composer to certain external trickeries and piquancies, by the profuse use of which he concealed the fundamental shortcomings of his music. Schubert, too honest not to give himself always as he was, is sometimes flat and trivial, but Schumann continually endeavours to keep up the appearance of profundity, superlative originality, and startling novelty. And now listen patiently, if you can, to the following venomous exhortations: “He (Schumann) makes it possible to place after the first graceful, coquettish part of a little salon pianoforte piece a second which consists only of modulating chords and profound successions of harmonies which make one’s hair stand on end (see ‘Traumeswirren,’ Op. 12); or attains at another time the effect of unheard-of novelty by unexpectedly inflicting (as, for instance, in the ‘Kreisleriana,’ No. V., Part 4) on the hearer a series of twenty-two bars full of syncopations, and thereby, if the latter has any feeling for rhythm, taking away his breath to such an extent that with the continuous accenting of the weak parts of the bar and the complete neglect of the strong ones he soon does not know to which this or that belongs, and thus he reels unsupported from one marcato to another, and must be at last glad if, as in the passage indicated by us, the accustomed trot of the rosalias begins again. At other times tormented harmonisations and continuous syncopations are placed in happy combination, as is the case, for instance, in the theme of sixteen bars of the trio in the Scherzo from the Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 47). These sixteen bars, in which is discoverable neither melody, nor even any kind of rhythm, because the whole hangs in the most ridiculous manner in the air, are nevertheless played like everything else." This needs no comment. To read it is quite enough.

By JOSEPH BENNETT.

DURING his stay at Moscow Berlioz put "Faust" in rehearsal, and had a passage of arms with the official censor. That worthy seems to have understood "a little Latin," and when he came to the words of the students' chorus, "Nobis subridente lunâ, per urben quærentes puellas eamus, ut cras fortunati Cæsares dicamus: Veni, vidi, vici," he shook his official head and concluded, "This will not do at all." Berlioz replied that the censor at St. Petersburg had raised no objection, and took nothing by the motion. "The St. Petersburg censor did what he thought right," said the stern Muscovite; "but I am not obliged to imitate him. The passage in question is immoral; it must be suppressed." Berlioz adds: "And it was—in the book. . . . The prohibited couplet was sung all the same at the concert, but in such a fashion that nobody understood it." We may observe here that this was not the only occasion on which the words of the students' chorus excited remark. In 1854 a Dresden critic solemnly protested against them, on the ground that German students are nice young men, of good manners and behaviour. This called forth hardly less laughter than a subsequent complaint by the same sapient scribe, that Berlioz libelled Mephistopheles when he made him tell a lie in order to bring about the death-ride of Faust.

On the return of Berlioz to St. Petersburg, preparations were made for two grand performances of "Roméo et Juliette." In regard to these the imperial intendant was complaisance itself. "How many rehearsals will you give me?" asked the master. "How many?" responded the official, "As many as you like. They shall rehearse every day, and when you come to me saying, 'All goes well,' we will announce the concert, not before." Berlioz took him at his word, and the performance was "marvellous."

"I recall it as one of the happiest events of my life, the more because I was in such good form that, in conducting, I had the happiness not to make a single mistake—which seldom happens. The great theatre was full. . . . I was recalled I do not know how many times. Let me declare, however, that I paid little attention to the public that day; and the effect of the divine Shakespearian poem, which I sang to myself, was such that after the finale I ran, all quivering, to take refuge in a private room, where Ernst found me, shortly after, in floods of tears.

"Ah!" said he, 'nerves! I understand that.' Coming to me, he held my head, and let me weep like a hysterical girl for a quarter of an hour."

Leaving Russia, Berlioz proceeded to Berlin, the King of Prussia having expressed a desire to hear "Faust" and make the acquaintance of its author. During his stay in that capital, the master was invited to dine at the palace of Sans Souci, and after the repast all adjourned to the gardens for coffee. Then the king called to the musician: "Eh! Berlioz, come and give me news of my sister, and tell me about your Russian trip." Presently Frederic William was seen to be shaking with laughter.

"This hilarity, in which I joined without ceremony, made me all at once an important personage. Several courtiers and officers observed it from the pavilion where they were seated, and saw good reason for being on terms with a man who could make the king laugh so much, and who laughed with him so familiarly. On returning to the pavilion soon after, I was surrounded by grands seigneurs to me perfectly unknown, who made profound salutations while modestly introducing themselves. 'Sir, I am the Prince of —, and feel happy to make your acquaintance.' 'Sir, I am the Count of —, allow me to congratulate you upon the great success you have just obtained.' 'Sir, I am the Baron —, I had the honour of seeing you six years ago at Brunswick, and I am enchanted,' &c., &c. I did not understand whence such honour could so suddenly come to me at the Prussian Court, till I at last recalled the scene in the first act of 'Les Huguenots,' where Raoul, after having received Queen Marguerite's letter, finds himself surrounded by men who sing to him in canon on all degrees of the scale: 'You know whether I am a sure and faithful friend.' They took me for a powerful favourite of the king. What a funny world is that of a Court!"

On reaching France, Berlioz paid a visit to his relatives, and introduced to them his son Louis; soon, however, returning to Paris, where MM. Roquelain and Duponchel, joint candidates for the direction of the Grand-Opéra, sought to enlist his influence in their cause, by offering him a joint conductorship with M. Girard. The bait took: Berlioz worked for the two applicants, and they, when duly appointed, proceeded to kick down the ladder by which they had climbed. No place could be found for Berlioz, since Girard would reign alone or not at all, and the indignant master at once accepted an offer from Jullien to conduct a season of opera at Drury Lane Theatre.

Berlioz entered upon his English career in a very sanguine spirit. He saw everything through rose-coloured spectacles. Writing to a friend in St. Petersburg (November 10, 1847), he said:—

"Behold me in England with an independent position (financially speaking), and such as I had not dared to dream of. I am charged with the direction of the grand English Opera, which will begin at Drury Lane in a month; more, I am engaged for four concerts, composed exclusively of my works, and, in the third place, to write an opera in three acts for the season of 1848. . . . The director is ready for any sacrifice, and counts only upon the second year. The chorus and orchestra are splendid. As for my concerts, we shall not begin them till January; I believe they will turn out well. Jullien (the director) is a man of audacity and intelligence, who knows London and the English better than anybody, be he who he may. He has already made his fortune, and has it in his head to build up mine."

Berlioz, writing in his memoirs, bears witness to the excellence of the means which Jullien, "in his incontestable and uncontested quality as a fool," provided for his venture; but adds that one thing had been forgotten—a repertory. Balfe's "Maid of Honour" was somewhere in prospective, and an English version of "Lucia" had the duty assigned to it of bringing in £400 per night, that mere expenses might be paid pending the arrival of a novelty. For the performance of Donizetti's work, Madame Dorus Gras and Mr. Sims Reeves were engaged. "Reeves has a fine natural voice, and sings as well as the frightful English language will allow." But no merit in performance could save an enterprise depending upon "Lucia." The receipts were less than £100 per night, Balfe's opera turned out indifferently, and "in a little while Jullien was completely ruined," while his conductor had only touched a month's salary. Upon the details of this failure it is unnecessary to dwell, but we may present a few extracts from Berlioz' London letters with advantage. They show us, for example, that the master once dreamed of taking Mendelssohn's place in English public opinion.

"There is here a good position for me to take—that left vacant by poor Mendelssohn. Every one tells me this from morning till night; while the press and the profession are well-disposed towards me. Already the two rehearsals I have given of 'Harold,' 'Le Carnaval Romain,' and two parts of 'Faust' have made them open eyes and ears. I am warranted in believing that it is here I ought to make a good position."

On another occasion he writes:—

"My music has worked upon the English public like fire upon a train of powder. . . . Everybody of any musical importance in London was at Drury Lane that evening, and many artists of standing came after the concert to congratulate me. They expected nothing like it, but looked for music diabolical, incomprehensible, hard, without charm. You should see, moreover, how they arraign our Parisian critics. Davison himself wrote an article for the Times, half of which was left out through want of space, nevertheless that which appeared made its mark. But I do not know what he thinks at bottom; with opinions like his it is needful to wait developments. Old Hogarth of the Daily News was in a state of most comical agitation: 'All my blood is on fire' he said to me, 'never have I been excited in such a way by music.'"

In a third letter, we read:—

"Thou knowest more or less well the brusque and violent success of my Drury Lane concert. It has disconcerted in a few hours all previsions favourable or hostile, and upset the edifice of theories which each built here upon my music as described by the three-horned critics of the Continent. God be thanked! the entire English press has spoken with extraordinary warmth, yet, besides Davison and Gruneisen, I knew none of the writers. It is different now; the chief among them have come to see me, or have written to me, and our relations are frequent and cordial. It is long since I experienced such satisfaction as in reading the article in the Atlas, which I sent to Brandus, who has not translated it. The writer is Mr. Holmes, author of a 'Life of Mozart' extremely admired here."

Finally, with regard to the coveted English success, the master says:—

"I shall remain here as long as I can, for time is needed to make a place and secure a position. Happily, circumstances are favourable. Sooner or later that position will arrive, and will be, they tell me, solid. For my musical career I have only to think of England and Russia."

All this time, however, Berlioz had his Mordecai in England—none other than the Philharmonic Society, which would not do him honour. Speaking of the opening concert of the season 1848, he says:—

"Nobody would believe that evening that the Society had, as yet, asked nothing from me for its concerts. It was true, nevertheless. Some say they will be forced to do so by the journals and by their committee. But I shall deliver myself only with great precautions into the velvet paws of the old bald-heads who manage this institution. Here we have a repetition of the manières of the Paris Conservatoire."

The Philharmonic Society is again referred to in another letter:—

"The journals here occupy themselves a good deal with me, but the opposition of the committee of the Philharmonic Society is something curious. They are all English composers, and Costa is at their head. They engage Herr Molique! they play the new symphonies of Herr Hesse and others, but I inspire them, so it appears, with incredible terror. Beale, Davison, Rosenberg, and some others have put their heads together to compel them to engage me. . . . Here is an old wall which I must knock over, and behind which I find the public and the press wholly with me."

Another of Berlioz' English experiences was not quite satisfactory. He stood amazed at the lack of discipline among our orchestral players:—

"We have not been able to have the complete orchestra at rehearsal. These gentlemen come when they please and go about their business, some when the work is half, others when it is only a quarter, done. The first day I had no horns at all, the second I had three, the third I had two, who vanished after the fourth piece. You see how they understand subordination in this country. The chorus, however, are nearly as devoted to me as were those of St. Petersburg. . . . I have been five days ill in bed with violent bronchitis; rage and disgust gave it to me. However, there is much to be done here, on account of the public, who are attentive, intelligent, and really devoted to serious works."

At the close of the season of 1848 Berlioz returned to Paris, and soon after suffered the loss of his father, to whom he was attached by more than filial bonds. With regard to this event, and also the subsequent death of his favourite sister and his wife, the master has much to say in his memoirs. Otherwise he is very reticent indeed, and appears to have grown tired of discoursing with himself as the theme. Else we should have been told at full length how, in 1849, he was presented by Baron Taylor with a gold medal, struck in honour of "La Damnation de Faust"; how he produced the second part of "L'Enfance du Christ," palming it off as the work of Pierre Ducré, an imaginary composer of the sixteenth century; how, in 1851, he was appointed a juror in connection with the Great Exhibition; how, in 1852, he revisited this country to conduct the performances of the New Philharmonic Society; and how "Benvenuto Cellini" failed at Covent Garden. To some of these matters, however, he makes reference in his letters, and from one addressed to Mr. Ella (published in Les Grotesques de la Musique), we learn all that is necessary concerning his whimsical appearance à la Chatterton and Horace Walpole:—

"My dear Ella, you ask why the mystery, 'La Fuite en Egypte,' bears this indication: 'attributed to Pierre Ducré, imaginary chapel-master.' It is by consequence of a fault I committed—a grave fault for which I have been severely punished, and concerning which I always reproach myself. Here are the facts: I found myself one evening at the house of Baron de M., an intelligent and sincere friend of art, with one of my fellow-students of the Academy of Rome, the learned architect Duc. Everybody played at écarté, whist, or brelan, save myself. . . . I was bored in a manner sufficiently evident, when Duc said, turning to me, 'Since thou dost nothing, why not write a piece of music for my album?' 'Willingly.' I took a piece of paper, and traced some lines, upon which soon appeared an andantino in four parts for the organ. Recognising in it a certain character of naïve mysticism, the idea struck me to apply words of the same kind. The organ piece disappeared and became the chorus in which the shepherds at Bethlehem take farewell of the infant Jesus, at the moment when the Holy Family set out for Egypt. Whist and brelan were interrupted to hear my holy effusion, and the company were as much amused by the antique turn of the verse as of the music. 'Now,' said I to Duc, 'I shall put thy name at the bottom. I mean to compromise thee.' 'What an idea! My friends very well know that I am entirely ignorant of composition.' 'Ah! that is a good reason, truly, for not composing; but, since thy vanity refuses to adopt my piece, I will create a name of which thine shall make part. It shall be Pierre Ducré, whom I institute music-master at the Sainte-Chapelle of Paris in the seventeenth century. That will give to my manuscript all the value of an archæological curiosity.' . . . Some days after, I wrote, at home, the piece called 'Repose of the Holy Family,' beginning this time with the words, and a small overture for a small orchestra in a small innocent style, in F sharp minor without the note sensible. . . . A month later, when I thought no more about my retrospective score, a chorus was wanted for the programme of a concert I had to conduct, and it amused me to insert that of the shepherds from my Mystery, leaving it under the name of Pierre Ducré, Music-master at the Sainte-Chapelle of Paris (1679). The choristers at rehearsals conceived a lively affection for this ancestral music. 'Where did you disinter it?' they said to me. 'Disinter is nearly the word' I answered without hesitation, 'it was found in an old walled-up chest during the recent restoration of the Sainte-Chapelle.' The concert took place; Pierre Ducré's piece was well-rendered and still better received, while the critics praised it the next day and congratulated me on my discovery. Only one expressed doubts concerning its authenticity and age. . . . On the following Sunday, Duc was at the house of a young and beautiful lady who greatly loved ancient music, and professed much contempt for modern productions of known date. 'Well, madame, how did you find our last concert?' 'Oh! very mixed, as usual.' 'And the piece of Pierre Ducré?' 'Perfect! delicious! there is music! time has removed none of its freshness. It has true melody, of which contemporary composers force us to remark the rarity. It is not your M. Berlioz, in any case, who could even produce its equal.' At these words Duc was compelled to laugh, and had the imprudence to answer, 'Alas, madame, it was my M. Berlioz nevertheless, who composed the Shepherds' Adieu, and who did it in my presence, one evening, on the corner of a card-table.' The lady bit her lips, the blush of confusion tinged her face, and turning her back on Duc, she threw out with temper the cruel phrase, 'M. Berlioz is an impertinent.' Judge of my shame, my dear Ella, when Duc repeated these words to me. I hastened to make atonement by humbly publishing in my own name that poor little work, retaining however under the title the words 'Attributed to Pierre Ducré, imaginary chapel-master' to recall this my culpable freak."

Concerning the incidents connected with his visit to London in 1852 the master does not speak at such length as of his Ducré joke. He naturally attributed the failure of "Benvenuto Cellini" to intrigue, but in the midst of bitterness did not lose a sense of discretion. After remarking that the popular operatic composers hated him because his rise inevitably meant their downfall, he adds:—

"I had proof of this fact in London, where a band of Italians made nearly impossible the representation of 'Benvenuto Cellini' at Covent Garden. They shouted and hissed from beginning to end, and even sought to prevent the execution of my overture to 'Le Carnaval Romain,' which prefaced the second act, and had been applauded in London at various concerts, among others at that of the Philharmonic Society a fortnight before. In its anger, public opinion, if not mine, placed at the head of this comical cabal Mr. Costa, chef d'orchestre at Covent Garden, whom I had several times attacked in my feuilletons because of the liberties which he takes with the scores of the great masters, cutting them, lengthening them, instrumenting and mutilating them in all ways. If Mr. Costa be guilty, which is very possible, he has known how to put my suspicions to sleep by his eagerness to serve me and to help me during rehearsal."

Defeated at Covent Garden, Berlioz triumphed all along the line at Exeter Hall. Writing, March 25, 1852, to a friend, he says of his first concert in Exeter Hall:—

"I address three lines to thee to let thee know that I obtained last evening an astonishing success, being recalled I know not how many times, and applauded both as composer and conductor. This morning I read in Times, Morning Post, Morning Herald, Advertiser, and others, such dithyrambs as had never before been written about me. . . . There is consternation in the camp of the Old Philharmonic Society. Costa and Anderson drink their bile out of full glasses. . . . I have a famous orchestra, and an admirable entrepreneur (Beale). . . . Since yesterday he has been half-mad with joy. This success is a great event for musical art here and for me."

On April 30, he writes:—

"The journals continue to belaud me, except the Daily News, which is contributed to by Mr. Hogarth, an excellent old man who was, till lately, one of my best friends, but who has for some years acted as secretary to the Philharmonic Society. Inde ira. There is also X—, who plays a kind of small Scudo because he has not been able to extract from Beale the scudi he asked for English translations of the new works we produce. But this counts for little; success is general, and my heart is in the place. At this moment I am getting up the Choral Symphony, which till now has only been lost here."

Concerning the performance of Beethoven's great work, he reported as follows to his friend:—

"The Choral Symphony, which had never been better given here, produced a miraculous effect, and my success as a conductor was very great; they recalled me after the first part of the concert."

Finally we read:—

"... Our last concert took place on Wednesday, with extraordinary success; the crowd was immense, and the receipts large. I was recalled four or five times. . . . After the chorus of sylphs they threw me a laurel crown. . . . I shall much regret my splendid orchestra and chorus. What beautiful female voices! I could have wished thee to hear the Choral Symphony of Beethoven, which we gave for the second time on Wednesday. Truly the ensemble in the immense Exeter Hall was grandiose and imposing."

In the letter just quoted reference is made to a certain degree of financial straitness, which accentuates another addressed by the master from London to his son Louis, then an officer in the French navy. The tone of the epistle shows considerable provocation, and is marvellously cold and stern for a man of the writer's temperament.

"Thou sayest that thou art becoming a fool. Thou art one. Thou must be either a fool or an imbecile to write me such letters, and it only needed this in the midst of the daily and nightly fatigues I have to endure here. In thy last letter from Havannah I read that thou wouldst arrive with a hundred francs, nevertheless thou owest forty!!! Who told thee to pay fifteen francs duty on a box of cigars? Couldst thou not throw them into the sea? . . . I advise thee to measure thy terms when thou writest to me; that style does not suit me. If thou thinkest that life is strewn with roses, it is time to begin learning the contrary. In any case, and in three words, I have no idea of putting thee into any other position than that thou hast chosen. It is too late. At thy age one ought to know enough of the world to take a different line of conduct from that thou appearest to follow. When thou hast sent me a reasonable letter in acknowledging receipt of the half bank-note, thou wilt receive the rest of my instructions. Till then remain at Havre. Adieu."

It was only on rare occasions that Berlioz turned this rough side of his nature towards his son. We shall see, by-and-by, how tender he could be under circumstances of the gravest trial.

The master was not engaged for the second season of the New Philharmonic Society, and in a letter to a friend (December 19, 1852) he gives us a glimpse of the reason:—

"Beale, after having advised me, a month ago, that I should receive my engagement for the next season, wrote, eight days back, that he had retired from the Committee because one of my chefs d'orchestre had contrived to secure that I should be dropped. He had been so annoyed last year by the artists, the public, and the press, that he desired, as he said, to obtain for next year a partner less inconvenient. He wished to engage old Spohr. I could not, however, in order to please that gentleman, conduct in defiance of good sense—that is to say, as he conducts himself. . . . This is fatal, but neither myself nor my friends in London can do anything. They speak, however, of other projects in England, always in England; and these will soon be decided. Here there is nothing; always nothing."

The same letter shows us the master at Weimar, whither he had gone to attend the production of his "Benvenuto Cellini" by Liszt:—

"I will only say to you that this little trip to Germany has been the most charming that I have made in any country. . . . All the orchestra, singers, actors, comedians, tragedians, directors, intendants, dined together at the Town Hall on the night of my departure, representing an order of ideas and sentiments which in France they have no notion of. I finished by weeping like two dozen calves, thinking what chagrin the same 'Benvenuto' had been worth to me in Paris. That excellent Liszt was everything adorable in the way of goodness, abnegation, zeal and devotion. The ducal family overwhelmed me with attention in all ways."

It was probably at this dinner that a pièce d'occasion was sung to Raff's music by a select choir of Weimar amateurs. The jeu d'esprit may be worth quoting:—

Nostrum desiderium
Tandem implevisti:
Venit nobis gaudium
Quia tu venisti.

Sicuti coloribus
Pingit nobis pictor;
Pictor es eximius
Harmoniæ victor.

Vives, crescas, floreas,
Hospes Germanorum
Et amicus maneat
Neo-Wimanorum.

Returning to Paris, Berlioz fell again a prey to the profound depression which had for some time afflicted him. He longed above all for the recognition and honour of the only city whose favourable verdict is in the esteem of a Frenchman worth having. London and the cities of Germany were very well in their way and not to be despised, but while Paris frowned the whole world was dark. Out of this state of things arose a condition of irresoluteness that led almost to despair. The master worked slowly on at his "Enfance du Christ," the novel style of which seems to have interested him; but he was "tormented" all the time by the idea of a vast opera. "I resist the temptation to realise this project; and I shall resist, I hope, to the end." Nevertheless, out of it came, eventually, that unhappy "Troïens," the failure of which almost broke his heart. Next he was haunted by dreams of a new symphony—literally by dreams, the themes coming to him in his sleep and disturbing the repose for which his mind, then sorely harassed by the condition of his dying wife, craved as a famished man for food. But he had not the heart to follow up these instinctive promptings, and his remarks upon himself thereanent are pathetic almost to tears:—

"'Coward,' will say some young fanatic, whom I pardon in advance for the injury, 'one should dare! one should compose! one should even ruin oneself! Nobody has a right to chase away thoughts thus, and to force back into nothingness a work which desires to come forth, and which begs for life.' Ah! young man who calls me coward, . . . I have the conscience to be no more than human, and, while believing myself to be as devoted to the art as thee or any others, I believe also that I honour art in not treating it as a monster hungry for human victims, and in proving that it has left me reason enough to distinguish courage from ferocity."

Repeated visits to Germany gave the master some relief from his depression. In the principal cities of that country, princes and people alike did him honour, and to them he went for relief from the miseries of Paris, and the hopelessness of his life there.

The wife of Berlioz died, after a long and painful illness, on March 3, 1854. In contemplation of this event, he confesses to a predominant feeling of "immense, frightful, immeasurable, infinite pity." He was confronted by the problem which has remained unsolved since the beginning of the world, and could not "justify the ways of God to man." He thought of her once glory as an artist, of her accident, her failure on reappearing, her inextinguishable jealousy, their separation, the death of all her relatives, of her broken heart, her vanished beauty, her destroyed health, her physical sufferings, her loss of movement and of speech, and her long perspective of death and forgetfulness. All these things drove him out of himself, and he exclaims: "Destruction! fire and thunders! blood and tears! my brain curdles in my head as I contemplate these horrors." A few friends attended the "poor Ophelia" to her grave, and Berlioz morbidly contrasted the scanty train with what it would have been had she died twenty-five years before:—

"To-day, while she goes thus, nearly alone, to the cemetery, ungrateful and forgetful Paris growls below there under her smoke; he who loved her, and has not the courage to follow her to her tomb, weeps in a corner of a deserted garden; and her young son, struggling far off against the tempest, is rocking high up on a mast amid the sombre ocean."

We must refer our readers to M. Douen's work for a detailed account of the harmonized editions of the Genevan psalter. With two or three exceptions the names of their authors are now little known, and a brief record will be sufficient for our present purpose.

Pierre Certon, master of the children of the Sainte-Chapelle at Paris, is said by Fétis to have published in 1546 a collection of thirty-one psalms in four parts. The psalms appear to be those of Marot, but the music is wholly original. The only point worthy of notice in this collection is that Marot's psalms should have been at that time selected for musical treatment by a member of the Sainte-Chapelle.

Jean Louis, probably a native of Flanders, published at Antwerp "Pseaumes cinquante de David . . . composez . . . a cinq parties. 1555." The melodies are those of Geneva. Bovet erroneously assigns this work to Bourgeois. Louis seems to have been afterwards chapelmaster to the emperors Ferdinand I. and Maximilian II.

Clément Jannequin, probably a convert to the reformed doctrines, published in 1559 "Octante-deux pseaumes de David, traduits . . . par Clement Marot et autres . . . composés en musique à quatre parties."

Thomas Champion published at Paris "Premier liure contenant soixante pseaumes de David mis en musique par Thomas Champion, dit Mithou, organiste du chambre du Roy,* 1561."

Philibert Jambe-de-Fer, a native of Lyons, was, says M. Douen, doubtless a member of the choir of Ste. Radegonde at Poitiers under the direction of the chanter, Jean Poitevin, whom we have already mentioned as a translator of the psalms to supplement those of Marot. After setting Poitevin's psalms to music in four parts in 1549, Jambe-de-Fer, who had joined the Reformers, published in 1562 "Les cent cinquante Pseaumes de David . . . par Cl. Marot et Th. de Beze, à quatre et cinq parties." Two later editions appeared in 1564.

The name of Goudimel demands a more particular notice. This eminent musician was born at Besançon† about 1510. Before 1540 he settled in Rome, where he opened the first public school of music as distinguished from the "psallettes" of the cathedrals, and thus laid the foundation of Italian melodic music. From this school proceeded many distinguished composers, including Animuccia, Nanini, and Palestrina.‡ We find Goudimel at Paris from 1555 to 1562, and it was between 1558 and 1561 that he joined the ranks of the Reformers, possibly, M. Douen suggests, as the result of some intercourse with Bourgeois. He subsequently retired to Lyons, then a stronghold of the Huguenots, and perished in the massacre of August 29, 1572.§ Before 1558 he produced a large number of masses, motets, and other works,|| lists of which will be found in the musical bibliographies of Becker and Eitner; but from 1562, immediately after the completion of the Genevan psalter, he appears to have devoted himself to the propagation of that work, and published those harmonized editions of it by which his name became so intimately associated with its melodies as to lead to the belief that their authorship was due to him. In 1562 he published at Paris "Pseaumes de David mis en musique à quatre parties en forme de motets par Claude Goudimel"* According to Fétis the number of psalms in this work was sixteen. The whole psalter followed in 1564† under the title "Les cent cinquante Pseaumes de David, nouvellement mis en musique à quatre parties par C. Govdimel, Paris, Ballart, 1564."‡ This edition has the tunes harmonized in double counterpoint, and thus holds a middle place between the editions of 1562 and 1565. The melody is in the superius except in fifteen§ psalms, where it is assigned to the tenor. The first verse alone of each psalm|| is quoted, and the psalms are not arranged in their numerical order. Where the same melody is repeated the harmony is varied.

In the following year there appeared "Les Pseaumes mis en rime françoise par Clement Marot et Theodore de Beze, mis en musique à quatre parties par Claude Goudimel. Par les heritiers de François Jaqui, 1565." Small 18mo. The four parts are printed opposite to one another.¶ This psalter is complete in all respects, containing the prefaces of Calvin and Beza, tables of the psalms, the Form of prayers, etc. It might therefore, observes M. Douen, seem intended for public worship, but Goudimel expressly states that it was meant for private use. The tunes are for the most part harmonized in simple counterpoint, and the words of the psalms are given in full. No place of publication is mentioned on the title-page, but the name of Jaqui shows that this volume was printed at Geneva. The melody is in the tenor excepting in seventeen†† psalms, where it is placed in the superius.

In the same year another edition‡‡ of the same work was published at Paris by Ballard, entitled "Les cl. Pseaumes de David nouvellement mis en musique à quatre parties par Claude Goudimel," in four oblong volumes. In the edition of 1565, as in that of 1564, a melody when repeated is harmonized in a different manner, and thus the tune of psalm 24, to which the psalms 62, 95, and 111 are also sung, appears in no less than seven different forms in the two editions, the arrangement of psalm 62 being the same in both.

Not content with producing the two harmonized psalters described above, Goudimel had undertaken another work of still greater extent, in which his learning and invention might find full scope, and in || Psalm 18 excepted, where the second verse is also given, but with the harmony changed.

 AUX LECTEURS.

"Nous auons adiousté au chât des Pseaumes, en ce petit volume, trois parties: non pas pour induire à les chanter en l'Eglise, mais pour s'esioier en Dieu particulièrement ès maisons. Ce qui ne doit estre trouué mauuais, d'autant que le chant duquel on use en l'Eglise demeure en son entier, comme s'il estoit seul."

At the end of the preface, however, Goudimel points out that his psalter may be used in public worship, when the part containing the melody would alone be sung.

Goudimel's harmonies seem to have long maintained their ground in the family. Rousseau, speaking of the peasants of Neuchâtel, says: "One of their common amusements is to sing the psalms in four parts, with their wives and children, and one is astonished to hear the vigorous and manly harmonies of Goudimel, so long forgotten by our learned musicians, issuing from these country cottages."

‡‡ Which of the two editions of 1565 appeared first is uncertain.

* Charles IX.

† A city of Franche-Comté on the river Doubs. M. Douen quotes some lines written on the occasion of Goudimel's death by his friend Melissus which prove this to be his birthplace:—

"Sequana cum Ligeti fleuit, fleuitque Garumna, Præcipue patrius fleuit amara Dubis."

Goudimel was therefore a subject of the House of Austria. The statement that he was born at Vaison is due to a confusion between the county of Venaissin and Franche-Comté, and between Vasionensis (Vaison) and Vesontiensis (Besançon). See Bovet, Hist. du Psautier, p. 262.

‡ M. Douen adds Roland de Lattre, better known as Orlando di Lasso. It is quite possible that Lasso studied for a time in Goudimel's school, but we should like to have some evidence of the fact.

§ The massacre at Lyons took place five days after that in Paris.

|| One of these, published in 1555, bears his name on the title in conjunction with that of the printer, but, as M. Douen points out, this implies no commercial partnership between them, but merely that Goudimel retained a property in the plates.

1565-66 he published "Les Psalmes de David compris en huit livres, mis en musique à quatre parties en forme de motets par Claude Goudimel, Paris, Le Roy et Ballard." The last three books of this work seem alone to have survived. The melodies are employed merely as subjects for every kind of musical treatment; the voice parts of the several movements number from three to eight, although four only are announced in the title; and some of the psalms are developed at considerable length. The 104th psalm, which M. Douen quotes as a specimen, contains no less than seven movements. The composer appears to have regarded this work as his crowning achievement. In the dedication of the sixth book he describes it as

De tous mes labours les plus beaux;*

and in the dedication of the eighth and last book he speaks of

Guidant mon esperance aux cieus.*

An edition of Goudimel's psalms published at Geneva in 1580 is a reprint of that of 1564. Another, printed at Charenton in 1607, reproduces, M. Douen thinks, the simple counterpoint of 1565. Another edition appeared at Delft in 1608, and the work was again reprinted at Geneva in 1667 and 1668, but with a few simplifications and the omission of the varied harmonies. Later editions printed in Switzerland are all more or less altered, and need not be noticed here.

Richard Crassot was probably born at Lyons about 1530, and published there in 1564 an edition of Marot and Beza's psalms with the tunes arranged in four parts.

Hugues Sureau, surnamed "du Rosier" (from his birthplace, Rosoy-sur-Serre), was a Huguenot preacher at Orléans, where in 1565 he published the Genevan tunes in four parts. This arrangement was intended by Sureau for use in public worship, but does not seem to have met with success.

Melissus, or, to give him his true name, Paulus Schede, was born in 1539, at Melrichstadt, in Franconia. He translated fifty of the French psalms into German in 1572, and his name may also be added to the list of early harmonizers of the Genevan melodies, as, in a small pamphlet published in the same year, on occasion of the marriage of Philipp Sprenger and Barbara Hugel, the tune of psalm 128 is found arranged by him in four parts, of which the superius and tenor are in canon. Melissus died in 1602.

Jean Servin, a musician, was born at Orléans about 1530. He joined the Reformers, and settled at Lyons in 1572. In 1565 he published at Orléans an edition of the Genevan psalms in three parts. The following passage in the "Advertissement aux lecteurs" is interesting: "I hope that all will be taken in good part by my kind readers, as there is no intention to derogate from the glory of so many worthy persons, who have employed themselves on this subject with honour, and among others M. Claude Goudimel, who has arranged the music of the psalms in many styles."* Servin also set the Latin psalms of Buchanan as motets in 1579.

Pierre Santerre, of Poitiers, also set the psalms in four parts. This work was published in 1567, after the composer's death.

Michel Ferrier, a native of Cahors,† published in 1568 Marot's forty-nine psalms, the Song of Simeon, and the Commandments, with the accustomed tunes arranged in three parts.

Roland de Lattre or Orlando Lassus. The connection of this distinguished musician with the Huguenot psalter is so slight that we content ourselves with the mere mention of his name, and refer the reader to M. Douen's pages for further details respecting him, as also for particulars of Alphonse Florès, Jean de Maletty, and André Pevernage.

Claudin Le Jeune, born at Valenciennes about 1530, published in 1564 ten of Marot's psalms arranged as motets in four parts, but the music was wholly original. In his Dodecacorde, 1598, are twelve of the Genevan tunes treated as motets. Le Jeune died in 1600, and most of his works were published afterwards by his sister Cécile. Among them are: "Les cl. Pseaumes de David mis en musique à quatre parties," Paris, 1601. Twelve of these psalms are for five voices. The melodies are those of Geneva, and are for the most part harmonized note against note, as in Goudimel's psalter.* Le Jeune also left in manuscript another arrangement of the psalms, the first portion of which was published by his sister in 1602. The title is "Premier liure, contenant cinquante pseaumes de David (Nos. 1 à 11) mis en musique en trois parties." . . . Paris." This book was reprinted in 1607. The second and third books appeared in 1608, of which the latter was reprinted in 1610.

Other harmonizers of the Genevan tunes of whom M. Douen gives biographical notices are: Samuel Mareschal, born at Tournai about 1554, and organist at Basel from 1576 to 1640, who published a psalter in 1594; Jan Pieter Sweelinck, organist at Amsterdam, whose psalms appeared in three books, 1612-14, with a fourth and concluding book in 1621; Johann Stobaeus, chapelmaster at Königsberg, where he died in 1646; and Johann Cruieger, cantor of the church of St. Nicholas at Berlin from 1622 to 1662, whose Psalmodia Sacra, Berlin, 1658, contains, with many hymns of the Lutheran church, the entire of the Genevan psalter in the German version of Lobwasser.

Ambrosius Lobwasser, a Saxon lawyer, became, during a residence in France, so enamoured of the Huguenot melodies that he translated the whole of the psalms of Marot and Beza into his native language, with a strict adherence to the original metres. His work, finished in 1565, was published in 1573, and reprinted many times in the two succeeding centuries. The harmonies to the tunes are those of Goudimel. Lobwasser's psalter soon came into general use in the Reformed Churches of Germany, and in the course of time Lobwasser himself was credited by many with the authorship of the melodies, just as Goudimel had been before him.

In Holland many psalters were arranged to the Genevan tunes. Soon after the completion of the French psalter, the old Flemish collection (the Souter Liedekens), which had been in use since 1540, was abandoned in favour of a new translation made expressly to suit the Huguenot melodies. The first, containing thirty-six psalms by Lucas de Heere, a Flemish painter, appeared in 1565; but, whatever its merits may have been, it was completely eclipsed in the following year by the complete psalter of Dathenus, which was almost immediately adopted for general use in the Reformed Churches of the Netherlands, and passed through numerous editions. A long series of new translations of the psalms commenced in 1630 with the psalter of Camphuysen; and Bovet quotes the titles of nearly thirty versions published between that year and the end of the eighteenth century.

The same writer refers also to the psalms of Jan Wtenhove (or Utenhove), the first edition of which, containing thirty-eight psalms, appeared without place of publication or date. This was followed in 1559 by twenty-six additional psalms, and, according to M. Bovet, the first complete edition was printed in London by John Daye in 1566. Another edition of Utenhove's psalms is the "Hondert Psalmen Davids," printed in London, also by John Daye, in 1561. Many of the melodies are from the Genevan psalter, and we may therefore conclude, with M. Bovet, that the versions of the psalms to which they were attached were written on the metres of Marot and Beza; but in the case of the other psalms, so far as we are enabled to judge from a hasty comparison, the Flemish metres are different from those employed in the French version.

* Goudimel's arrangements of 1562 and 1564 had already appeared, and very probably his psalter of 1565 had been just published.

† The birthplace of Marot.

* This work was frequently reprinted.

The Genevan psalter became the basis of many others in various languages and dialects: Béarnese (the dialect of Béarn), Bohemian, Danish, Spanish, Gascon, Hebrew, Hungarian, Italian, Latin, Malay, Polish, Portuguese, Romanche, Sesutô, Zend, and Tamul. Some of these were translated from the French, some from the versions of Dathenus and Lobwasser. The titles will be found in the bibliographies of Douen and Bovet. To what extent the English "Old Version" is indebted to Marot and Beza we cannot say without making a more minute comparison than our time at present permits, but it is probable that some of the psalms translated after the death of Sternhold in 1549 were based more or less on those of Geneva; and several of the Genevan tunes, though not always strictly in their original form, were adopted in the English psalter. Of these we may quote 3 (the Old 122nd), 36 (the Old 113th), 50 (the Old 50th), 107 (the 120th in Daye's Psalter), 124 (the Old 124th), 130 (the Old 130th), 134 (the Old 100th), the Ten Commandments Tune (the Old Ten Commandments Tune, or Audi Israel). The following are also found in various English hymnals: 38 (S.P.C.K. "Church Hymns," No. 2), 42 ("Mercer's Psalter," No. 51), 75 ("Mercer," No. 52), 101 (the tune known as "St. Michael's"), 110 (S.P.C.K. "Psalms and Hymns," No. 40), 118 ("Mercer," No. 449), and S.P.C.K. "Psalms and Hymns," No. 120).

The following psalters in English are quoted by Douen and Bovet as being translated from or based upon the Genevan:—

"Les c. Psalmes de Bèze traduits en anglais par Ant. Gilbie. Londres, 1581 et 1590." 12mo.

This is a mere description of the book. The title is: "The Psalms truly opened by paraphrasis in prose, from the Latin of Beza, by Ant. Gilbie. London, by Henry Denham, 1581." This work, therefore, has no relation to the Genevan psalter. Another edition, with a somewhat varied title, appeared in 1590. Anthony Gilbie was one of the English congregation at Frankfurt, and was a member of the commission appointed in 1555 to draw up an Order of public worship.

"All the French Psalms tunes with English words. London, Thomisson, Hans, 1592." 12mo.

Is this title quoted quite correctly?

"All the French Psalms tunes with English words. Being a collection of psalms accorded to the verses and tunes generally used in the Reformed Churches of France and Germany. Perused and approved by judicious Divines, both in English and French. London, printed by Thomas Harper." S. a. 18mo.

"Divers of David's Psalmes, according to the French form and metre, by John Vicars. London, Thos. Purfoot, for Henry Seile."

John Vicars, a Calvinistic writer, was born in 1582, and died in 1652. His psalms, twenty in number, will be found in his "England's Hallilujah for God's Gracious Benediction," published in 1631. They do not seem to have been printed separately. In M. Douen's reference to Cotton's "Editions of the Bible" the date 1582 is of course a misprint for 1852.

"Psalms of David (in English metre), Middleburg. R. Schilders, 1598."

Printed for the use of the English church at Middleburgh. The psalms are doubtless taken from the Scottish psalter.

We have also to remark that Bovet is mistaken in his conjecture* that the psalter harmonized by William or Guilielmo Damon was a completed edition of the Anglo-Genevan. It is not in any way connected either with that or the French psalter. The words are from the "Old Version," and the melodies are the ordinary church tunes then in use.*

It is natural that the Scottish psalter should show more traces of Genevan influence than the English. For its history the reader should consult the prefaces of Livingston's reprint, mentioned in our first article. M. Douen† is quite correct in suspecting Bovet's accuracy in speaking of a Scottish psalter of 1528. The first edition appeared in 1564. But just as the French-Genevan psalter had been preceded by that of Strasburg, so the Scottish psalter was preceded by the Anglo-Genevan. In 1556 a Form of Prayer was drawn up for the use of an English congregation formed at Geneva in 1555, of which John Knox and Goodman were appointed co-pastors. It contains fifty-one psalms, of which thirty-seven are by Sternhold, seven by Hopkins, and seven by Whittingham,‡ being the versions of the English psalter, but with many alterations. The tunes also, with one exception, are not Genevan.§

Bovet's bibliography|| quotes from Brunet a psalter with the following title: "One and fiftie Psalmes of David in English metre . . . with the form of prayers, etc., used in the English congregation at Geneva, and John Calvin's catechism. Geneva, John Crespin, 1551." This is a description of the first edition of the Anglo-Genevan psalter, with the date given incorrectly. The true title is, "The forme of prayers and ministration of the Sacraments ec. v. sed in the Englishe Congregation at Geneua, and approued by the famous and godly learned man, Iohn Caluyn. Imprinted at Geneua by Iohn Crespin. MDLVI." The separate title of the psalms is, "One and Fiftie Psalmes of David in Englishe metre. Whereof 37 were made by Thomas Sterneholde, ad the rest by others. Cōferred with the hebrewew, and in certeyn places corrected as the text and sens of the Prophete required." A copy of this psalter is in the Advocate's Library, Edinburgh.

An enlarged edition, probably printed in London in 1560,¶ contains sixty-five psalms, and in it a few Genevan tunes appear. In 1561 the final edition was issued with twenty-five new versions by Kethe,†† making the total number of psalms eighty-seven, three of those added in 1560 being suppressed.‡‡ A copy of this edition is preserved in St. Paul's Cathedral, London. It bears the following title: "The Forme of Prayers and Ministrations of the Sacraments as used in the English Church at Geneva, and approved by the famous and godlie learned man John Calvin. Whereunto are also added the prayers which thei use there in the French Church. Printed at Geneva, by Zacharie Durand, MDLXI." The title of the psalms is, "Foure Score and seven Psalmes of David, in English metre, by Thomas Sterneholde and others, Conferred with the Hebrue, and in certeine places corrected, as the sense of the Prophet requireth."

Many more Genevan tunes were now added, and the Anglo-Genevan psalter, which had been introduced into Scotland three or four years previously, became the basis of the Scottish psalter of 1564. All the Genevan tunes of the Anglo-Genevan were incorporated in the Scottish psalter, and some new ones were added, making the total number thirty. They are as follows: Scottish 27 (Genevan 42), 36 (132), 47 (47), 50 (50), 58 (20), 62 (103), 81 (33), 83 (10), 85 (6), 88 (35), 91 (91), 100 (134), 102 (102), 104 (104), 107 (107), 110 (110), 111 (19), 117 (117), 118 (118), 120 (107), 121 (121), 122 (3), 124 (124), 125 (21), 126 (90), 129 (129), 130 (130), 134 (101), 138 (16), 142 (43).

To these may be added the Scottish 128th set to the Genevan tune bearing the same number, and the Scottish 113th set to the Genevan 36th. Mr. Livingston classes both these tunes as German. The latter certainly is so, being one of those to which Calvin wrote his psalms in 1539. It became, however, thenceforward especially identified with the Genevan psalter, and passed from it directly into that of Scotland. We will notice it more particularly in our next article. The Scottish 140th also is partly taken from the Genevan 143rd, and the Genevan tune to the Ten Commandments appears in the Scottish psalter a few years later.

IF England should ever really become a recognised "musical nation," it certainly will be in spite of, and not in consequence of, the patronage accorded to native art by the Court. At a State Concert lately given not a single piece by a British composer was performed; and that the fact has not escaped the notice of the press out of England is proved by a paragraph in the Courier of New York, which comments in no measured terms upon this neglect of the claims of the artistic talent lying immediately around us. As if to show that such apathetic treatment of those composers born on British soil is only another specimen of the truth of the adage that no man can be a prophet in his own country, we find that not only have some of our young artists been selected to write sacred works for foreign countries, but that Mr. Villiers Stanford has produced an opera in Germany which, in consequence of its decisive success, will now be translated into the composer's native language and given at an English theatre, at which establishment will also be produced, for the first time in this country, an opera by Balfe which was performed in Trieste as far back as 1856. We may also say that this recognition of English artists abroad is not confined to composers; for the following announcement, copied from a daily contemporary, sufficiently evidences that even in a country which abounds with excellent voices a native of England can carry off the vocal prize: "The grand medal for singing, and also the certificate of honour of the Conservatorio di Milan, has been conferred on Miss Nettie Mertens, a young English lady. This is the first time the prize has been conferred on a foreigner since the Conservatorio has been established." Gratiified as we must feel at this information, we cannot but express a hope that students may not be compelled to travel from England to Milan in order to have their musical talents fairly gauged.

It is unquestionably true that "nothing succeeds like success"; but it may also be confidently affirmed that this very success too often leads to failure. In literature we find that not only will an inferior author imitate one who has acquired a sudden fame, but that the original author will imitate himself, and almost invariably weaken the effect he has made. Douglas Jerrold, for example, wrote "Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures"; and because they became popular he followed them with "Mr. Caudle's Breakfast Talk." The fact is that when any work is the spontaneous growth of the author's mind, we are glad to accept it; but when it is the imitation of something which has already obtained public favour, we do not want it. Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Gounod, for example, have thrown off certain compositions of a decidedly humorous character; and it was an excellent notion to collect these together at a "Promenade Concert" as a contrast to the more solid and important works; but when we find not only that this idea is repeated ad nauseam, but that a "humorous night" is organised at another establishment, where a "Comic Overture" is written specially for the occasion, and that other laughter-provoking compositions loom in the distance, we question whether we are not beginning to degrade our music, as we have already degraded our drama, by turning the greatest artistic works into burlesque. Years ago we recollect that an eminent literary man produced a comic history of England, and even a comic grammar, and we perfectly remember how truly it was said that they were not instructive because they were meant to be funny, and that they were not funny because they were meant to be instructive. Let us hope that we shall not have to pass a similar opinion upon a "Comic Symphony," which may still be in embryo.

THERE is always something amusing respecting the Three Choir Festivals in the local newspapers; but it is seldom that the mere facts of the several performances are misstated. The notice of the opening Service at the recent Worcester Festival, however, which appeared on the 10th ult. in the Worcestershire Chronicle, is a curious instance of the exception to this rule, for the writer, although loyally performing his duty in relating what he heard in the Cathedral, has more decisively blundered than if he had remained outside and copied from the printed paper recording the order of the Service. "It was," he says, "about ten minutes past three when, the latest arrivals having been conducted to their seats, the splendid band, led by M. Sainton, commenced the Festival by performing, without organ accompaniment, Costa's setting of the National Anthem, the whole of the congregation of course standing meanwhile; and, without a break, Attwood's fine anthem 'I was glad when they said unto me,' composed in 1820 for the coronation of George IV., was proceeded with." Now all acquainted with Attwood's anthem know that, being written for a coronation, the National Anthem is introduced in the instrumental opening, but not until after the harmony afterwards accompanying the theme (which occupies fourteen bars) has been heard. No doubt the fact of Attwood's composition proceeding "without a break" would have somewhat perplexed a listener who at all mistrusted his powers; but in proof that this critic was desirous of giving, rather than receiving, information, he tells us that it was "Costa's setting of the National Anthem." We know that "a little knowledge is a dangerous thing"; but here is evidence that it is still more dangerous where there is no knowledge at all.

WE have often taken occasion to call attention to the numerous reforms demanded in most of our buildings devoted to the performance of music; but lessees are difficult people to move, even in their own interest; and it is to the public, therefore, that an appeal must be made before we can hope for any definite result. In our "Foreign Notes" last month we read: "Several theatres have recently been destroyed by fire, viz., the theatre at Cadiz, in Spain, the Politeama of Bologna, and the National Theatre at Prague." This is sad news; but under the same heading we also light upon the following paragraph: "In accordance with recently published police regulations every theatre in Berlin will have to be supplied with an iron curtain, which may be lowered in the case of a fire breaking out, thereby separating the stage from the auditory." Now as we know that most fires at theatres have their origin on the stage, here is at once a remedy which should prove effectual; and yet how long will it be before "police regulations" in this country will compel the adoption of so simple a preventive of a catastrophe the fear of which we know has latterly acted most detrimentally upon the attendances at our opera-houses and concert-rooms? We have no desire to interfere with private speculation; but if licences are to be granted to those who cater for the public amusement, we have a right to insist upon the necessity of such licences including every reasonable provision against accident. The Berlin authorities have set us a good example; and if, therefore, in case of alarm at many establishments we could name, our exit is still to be barred, at least let us remain with the protection of an "iron curtain."

THE WORCESTER MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THAT the calm feeling which should reign inside the Cathedral during the performance of those great works in musical art which have effected such important results both to religion and charity should be shared outside by all who have the power to promote the interest of the Festivals has been the earnest wish of the many who have watched the progress of those recent discussions upon these time-honoured meetings which have now reached so peaceful a climax. Worcester, where, no doubt with the best intentions, the question of the continuance of the Three Choir Festivals was first mooted, has, to the credit of all concerned, yielded so far to the popular voice as to retain the established design of the general arrangements, whilst reserving to itself the power of adding certain religious solemnities which may deepen the purport of the meetings to the over scrupulous, yet disturb not their effect upon those who would be content to adhere to their original form. In proof that these mutual concessions have produced a widely spread feeling of satisfaction, we may cite the fact of 173 stewards—including the principal clergy and gentry of the surrounding country—having been secured for the Worcester Festival of this year; that the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Worcester consented to act as President; and that the sermon at the opening Service was preached by the Rev. W. J. Butler, M.A., Canon of Worcester.

Contrary to the usual custom, the Festival commenced on Sunday, the 4th ult., with a Special Free Service at three o'clock, at which the Mayor and Corporation attended in state. The musical attractions at this Service were exceptionally great, for the entire band and choir assembled for the Festival, numbering 400 performers, were employed, and the selection included Attwood's fine Anthem, "I was glad"—written for the coronation of George IV., and Spohr's Cantata, "God, Thou art great." The pure and earnest writing of Attwood received ample justice from the choir and orchestra, the broad, diatonic harmonies telling with wonderful effect in the vast Cathedral, and forming a fitting prelude to the important sacred works to be given during the week. In Spohr's Cantata the soprano solo was exceedingly well sung by Miss A. Marriott, the other solo parts being efficiently rendered by Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. F. King and Smith. The choral portions of the work, offering a strong contrast to the dignified style of the Anthem, were well sung throughout, the gradations of tone having been carefully observed. The Responses were by Tallis, the Psalms were chanted to Lawes in C, the Service was intoned by the Rev. E. V. Hall, Precentor; and Mr. C. H. Lloyd's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, written for and sung at the last Gloucester Festival, were given, under the conductorship of the composer, the soprano and baritone solos having been most effectively rendered by Miss A. Williams and Mr. F. King respectively. The Rev. Canon Butler chose for his sermon the very appropriate text, "Let everything that hath breath praise the Lord," the last verse of the 150th Psalm, and eloquently discoursed upon the power and sanctity of all great works in art. "What was art," he said, "but the most exquisite method of expressing beauty of every kind? and this being God's great gift to man, how could he praise Him better than through this medium?" Referring especially to music, he said that he claimed for God all the greatest composers that the world had seen. "Were not these," he asked, "deeply religious men; not merely because they wrote of Christ, but because His Word 'was a lantern to their feet, and a light unto their path'; that it filled their soul?" At the conclusion of this sermon—one of the most deeply sympathetic with the highest mission of music ever preached at the commencement of a Festival—the Old Hundredth Psalm was sung, and the large congregation dispersed.

"Elijah" was chosen, as usual, for the first performance in the Cathedral on Tuesday morning, the character of the Prophet being assigned to Mr. Henschel, who gave a highly dramatic reading of the part, singing throughout with an earnestness which amply atoned for the fact of certain portions of the music being scarcely within his register. In the scene with the Widow he was especially good; and in many of the pathetic solos his artistic style gave much effect to some passages often listlessly passed over. Miss A. Williams was thoroughly efficient in the trying soprano solos of the first part, and Madame Albani in those of the second part—particularly in "Hear ye, Israel"—produced a powerful sensation. Of Madame Patey's well-known rendering of "O rest in the Lord," and the Jezebel music, it is unnecessary to speak; but Miss Hilda Wilson deserves a word of commendation for her expressive singing of "Woe unto them." The trio, "Lift thine eyes" (Madame Albani, Miss Marriott, and Madame Patey), and the duet, "Zion spreadeth her hands" (Miss A. Williams and Miss Hilda Wilson), we have rarely heard more effectively rendered, not perhaps because the separate voices were better than usual, but because they blended so perfectly. Mr. E. Lloyd's two songs were given with much refinement of style; but we could have wished for less of the portamento, which, especially in "If with all your hearts," marred much of the effect of the solo. The double quartet (in which the principal singers were assisted by Mrs. A. Broughton, Messrs. Smith and Millward) was imperfectly sung in parts; but, probably from insufficient rehearsals together, this piece seldom receives the justice its exceptional beauties should demand. Although some of the choruses were dragged, especially "Blessed are the men," the singing of the choir was extremely good; the Baal choruses, "Thanks be to God," and "He watching over Israel," being rendered with remarkable precision. The final choral piece, "And then shall your light," in consequence of the blessing being given by the Bishop at the conclusion of the oratorio, was happily heard to the end, and not accompanied by that unseemly rush to the doors which is too often witnessed at other Cathedrals during Festival time.

The first part of the concert in the evening at the College Hall commenced with Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflöte," and the second part with Mr. Walter Macfarren's graceful and suggestive Overture "Hero and Leander," which was conducted by the composer. The miscellaneous selection included Madame Albani's brilliant singing of "Casta diva" Miss A. Williams's exceptionally good rendering of Beethoven's "Ah, perfido," Madame Patey's highly successful interpretation of a new and well-written song by Sir Julius Benedict, "From the bosom of ocean I seek thee," and solos by Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Maas, King, and Henschel. Mention, too, must be made of the good singing of the Leeds Festival Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. Broughton, in some well-selected part-music. Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride," written expressly for the Festival and conducted by the composer, was however the novelty of the evening, and produced an effect which fully justified the confidence of those who had chosen this rising young artist to occupy so large a share of the programme at a secular concert the attractions of which are too often of a character to display rather the artists than the art. The libretto of the Cantata, translated from the German of R. Hamerling, may perhaps aim at deriving a portion of its poetical beauty from its vagueness; for certainly we should find it somewhat difficult to relate the legend upon which it is founded. All we really do know is that after everything seems happily arranged for the wedding, the bride, instead of appearing at the expected moment, is said to be "down in the sea's chilly bosom," a fact announced by the bridegroom, and afterwards attested by the chorus. Beyond this we are told nothing; and it is perhaps more to the credit of the composer that he should have written such interesting music to such an uninteresting story. The prelude, in F minor—introducing the Leitmotif, which musically illustrates the heroine's fate, and foreshadowing the subject of the final chorus—concludes with a pause after a tonic pedal, and leads to the symphony of a chorus descriptive of the wedding eve, some effective harmonies on a chromatic ascending bass introducing an attractive subject in F major for the tenors, the full choir afterwards entering, with a marked figure in the accompaniment. The delicacy of treatment, both in the vocal and instrumental portions of this chorus, was evidently appreciated alike by choir and orchestra, the piano phrases on the words, "Come forth, the boat on the shore lies awaiting," especially, being rendered with the utmost refinement. Into the duet for tenor and soprano which follows the composer has evidently thrown all his strength. Commencing in the key of the preceding chorus, the symphony modulates into A flat major, in which key, with a syncopated accompaniment, the tenor begins the duet with a melodious theme, happily descriptive of the words, "Why droops thy head, my sweetest?" and, in the same key, where the voices are united, the freshness of the triplet accompaniment adds materially to the effect of the vocal parts. The modulations, though frequent, grow up sympathetically with the text; and the variety of orchestral colouring throughout the piece shows that the composer has not only well studied the nature and capabilities of the instruments, but knows how to combine them with the voices. The succeeding march and chorus, in B flat major, "Now dawneth the bright wedding morning," commences with a tuneful subject for two sopranos and alto; a point worthy of commendation being the change from the dominant harmony of B flat major into D flat, on the repetition of the words, "Let the bride be adorned with her pearls." By a reminiscence of a figure in the preceding duet we are afterwards led into G major; and on the return to the opening subject in the original key, the male voices are heard for the first time, the theme being commenced by the sopranos and tenors in octaves. This is on the whole an exceedingly attractive and well-considered movement, the instrumentation of the march evidencing much feeling for orchestral colouring, and heightening, without disturbing, the effect of the vocal parts. A very general encore followed the conclusion of this number, which was repeated from the point in G major. The succeeding tenor solo of the expectant bridegroom is extremely pathetic, and appropriately ushers in the concluding chorus, in F minor, which tells of the mournful termination of the story. The simple beauty of this choral piece is in true sympathy with the artistic treatment of the preceding numbers. In no place throughout the Cantata has Mr. Mackenzie failed where the legitimate strength of an accomplished musician should be shown; and in no place has he displayed scholastic knowledge when this display would interfere with the due expression of the words. The evidence that this reticence is but reserved power is too decisive throughout the composition to admit of doubt; for in music, as in literature, a classical training so effectually colours an author's style as to render it quite unnecessary to obtrude the cold formalities of such training, save where it would deepen the effect of his work. Mr. Mackenzie, we hear, is about to leave England for Florence, where we trust that the applause with which his new Cantata was received will nerve him to still further exertion. He has evidently a power which is not within the gift of teachers, however eminent they may be; and that he may use this power to the best advantage both of himself and the art which he professes must be the parting wish of his many admirers in this country, to whom he now bids a temporary farewell. The principal vocalists in this work exerted themselves to the utmost to ensure its success, but Mr. Maas's voice and style were scarcely suited to the sympathetic expression of the impassioned love-duet which is the prominent feature of the composition; and the general effect of this piece suffered in consequence. Miss A. Williams sang well throughout, and the choruses were as satisfactorily rendered as could possibly be expected with so few rehearsals.

On Wednesday morning the performance in the Cathedral commenced with Mr. Alfred J. Caldicott's Sacred Cantata, "The Widow of Nain," conducted by the composer. Whether the term "Sacred Cantata" is gradually superseding that of "Oratorio," or some young composers, conscious of the sublimity of the works recognised as "Oratorios," are too modest to use such descriptive name for their works, we cannot say; but certainly the importance of Mr. Caldicott's composition—and indeed of many other modern "Sacred Cantatas"—would fully justify the title of "Oratorio." Assuredly, for example, a student need not be afraid of calling his composition a fugue—provided it observes all the conditions of this species of writing—merely because Bach and others have produced fugues which are unapproachable. True criticism should test the merits of the worker only through his work; for ambition is one of the essential characteristics of an earnest artist. "The Widow of Nain" is divided into three distinct portions: "The Shadow of Death," "Hope," and "Resurrection"; and the libretto, compiled chiefly from scriptural passages by the composer, is on the whole extremely well laid out for music. All who devote themselves to the composition of sacred works, for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, experience a difficulty when the mere incidents selected will not furnish sufficient variety for the several forms of vocal pieces which the work demands; and Mr. Caldicott, therefore, must be partially forgiven for the introduction of the Minstrel, whose only mission it is to break in abruptly upon the narrative with a bass solo, as if he were fearful that the tenor voice might weary the hearers, and also for the occasional interpolation of words not from the Scriptures, especially those of the contralto air, commencing with the conventional line, "When swells the sorrow-laden breast." The Overture, in G minor, is in two movements, the largo having a broadly marked phrase for its principal subject, and the second, allegro molto, being somewhat light in character, perhaps even too light for the nature of the subject to which it forms a prelude. The commencement of the chorus, in G minor, "Man goeth to his long home" is in excellent sympathy with the mournful words, the effect being much aided by a syncopated, sobbing, accompaniment. A well written canon, two in one on the octave below, soprano and second tenor, and another between the same voices on the seventh below, with which three other parts are skilfully woven in, give much interest to the chorus, the entry of the soprano solo, in the tonic major, however, somewhat interrupting the dignity of the movement, and lessening the effect of the choral portion, in the major key, which concludes the number. The contralto solo, to the words of which we have already alluded, follows—a melodious air, placidly accompanied, as befits the consoling nature of the verses; and exquisitely sung as it was by Madame Patey, it need scarcely be said that the effect upon the audience, although, of course, not audibly expressed, was plainly perceptible. The tenor then narrates how Jesus, with His disciples, went into a city called Nain, and met the funeral procession of the Widow's son at the gates. This is told with real musical pathos; but the Minstrel, who has a long and rather uninteresting bass solo, might, as we have before indicated, be well spared. The chorus, "In Rama was there a voice heard," which contains some bold and vigorous writing, finishes the first division of the work. In the following recitative and air for the soprano, in D minor and major, the composer has well expressed the hopeful feeling of the Widow. The words "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me," where the transition to the major key first occurs, are set to a melodious theme, with a bright figure in the accompaniment, a portion of this subject being effectively used in the instrumental part near the conclusion of the solo, against a descending progression for the voice. The instrumental march accompanying the procession of mourners and minstrels has a marked principal subject in A minor, the change to the major, however, scarcely affording sufficient relief from the monotony of the constantly recurring figure which rules the movement. The scoring of the march is extremely good throughout; and, indeed, were it not for the want of contrast, we could give it unqualified praise. The trio which follows, "Weep not, O daughter"—in canon for soprano and tenor on the seventh below—is a good example of scholarship, the alto, a perfectly independent part, being written with much care and judgment. The unaccompanied quartet and chorus, "They that sow in tears," contains some good passages of imitation, an effective point being the repetition of the theme (with certain alterations in the harmonies) in chorus, with free parts for the solo voices. Musically speaking, this is unquestionably the best number in the work, for the composer is unencumbered with canonical fetters; but we do not like the addition of the word "For" before the phrase "They that sow in tears," merely that the tenor may move in quavers with the alto on the dominant harmony. This objection is removed where the quartet is taken by the chorus; and the commencement of the voice upon the bar—after a rest, which replaces the objectionable "For"—gives the requisite emphasis to the initial word of the sentence. There is a little feebleness in the music describing the resuscitation of the Widow's son (which commences the third part of the Cantata); but both in the chorus, "How merciful," and following quartet, "God hath visited His people"—the latter partially unaccompanied—we have much vigorous and effective writing. The choral, "Thou art the way," is not only an infinite canon by inversion on the seventeenth below, treble and bass, but it has the merit—if merit it be—of appealing to the sight as well as to the hearing, for by turning the book upside down and reading the voice parts backwards, the outlines of melody are maintained. That some of the audience could not resist the temptation of attempting to unravel this puzzle was apparent by the reversal of the natural position of several copies of the work; but as these mechanical exercises belong not to true musical art, we need only here say that the problem is correctly worked out. The Widow's solo, in which she pours forth her thankfulness and praise—accompanied chiefly with a series of brilliant passages for the strings—contrasts well with the succeeding placid duet for contralto and tenor, "A loving and a contrite heart," many phrases in which are extremely impressive. The modulations, too, are most appropriate, an enharmonic change from D flat minor to E major being a point of much interest. The final chorus contains some able writing, a fugue, commencing on the words "a great and mighty prophet is risen," being very fairly developed and carefully voiced throughout. The impression created by Mr. Caldicott's Cantata is that it reflects the utmost credit upon its composer. Whether had he trusted more to his inventive power the result would have been equally successful we cannot say; for the scholastic acquirements essential for what may be termed the artificial school of writing are not always united with that faculty of original thought which has ensured permanent life to the creations of the greatest musicians of the world. Poetry, for example, may of necessity be rhyme, but rhyme is not of necessity poetry; and in no art can the mere satisfactory fulfilment of its canons produce a work of enduring value. We by no means say that "The Widow of Nain" does not present evidences of that individuality which should characterise the creations of all those who aspire to the highest position—not only in the solos, but in many of the choruses there is a freshness and spontaneity of expression most sympathetically expressive of the text—but it is because in the points most demanding this power the composer instinctively flies to the safe refuge of set forms that we make these remarks, feeling that if he have the courage to disregard that false adulation which too often bars progress, he may in his second important public appeal be led to consider whether there is not some truth in that praise which, although less fulsome, may be more sincere. The solos in Mr. Caldicott's work were most artistically rendered by Misses

A. Williams and Marriott, Madame Patey, Messrs. E. Lloyd and Henschel. Miss Williams was especially successful in her singing of the air already alluded to, "I shall see him," Miss Marriott gave the soprano solo in the opening chorus with good expression, and Messrs. Lloyd and Henschel—the former as the Narrator, and the latter as the Minstrel—were thoroughly satisfactory. The choruses were sung with more accuracy than could have been anticipated, considering how few opportunities could have been afforded for rehearsals with the entire choir, the best executed being those which demanded the largest amount of care.

Beethoven's Symphony in C minor concluded the first part, and created an impression which we trust will lead to the performance of other purely instrumental works at future Cathedral Festivals. A selection from Handel's "Jephtha" formed the second portion of the morning's performance, the principal vocalists being Miss Marriott, who was highly successful in her singing of the air, "Tune the soft melodious lute"; Miss Hilda Wilson, whose delivery of the Recitative, "Glad tidings of great joy to thee," evidenced much dramatic feeling; Madame Patey, who created a marked effect in the air, "Scenes of horror"; Mr. Maas, who gave a fairly effective rendering of "Deeper and deeper still," and "Waft her, angels"; and Mr. F. King, to whom were allotted several bass recitatives, which he gave with excellent emphasis. The fine choruses were well sung, especially "When His loud voice in thunder spoke"; and much effect was given to the orchestral part by the use of Mr. A. Sullivan's additional accompaniments.

The evening performance in the Cathedral—an innovation introduced at these Festivals by the late Mr. Townshend Smith, of Hereford—was well attended and highly successful. Beethoven's "Mount of Olives"—or rather the version prepared for the English public by Dr. H. Hudson, and entitled "Engedi"—formed the first part of the programme. Lovers of pure art are bound to protest against such an "adaptation" of a great composer's ideas; but if we cannot have Christ pursued by the Roman soldiers, it is certainly better to have David pursued by Saul than to lose Beethoven's sublime music altogether. In every respect the Oratorio was finely rendered, Madame Albani singing the soprano music exquisitely, especially the air, with chorus, "Praise ye Jehovah's goodness," Mr. E. Lloyd creating a marked effect in the impassioned tenor solos, and Mr. F. King declaiming the bass recitatives with care and judgment. Parts one and two of Haydn's "Creation" were afterwards given, the principal singers being Madame Albani, Miss Marriott, Messrs. Maas and Henschel. In the well-known solos, "With verdure clad," and "On mighty pens," Madame Albani was heard to the utmost advantage; Mr. Maas in the melodious air "In native worth," and Mr. Henschel in "Rolling in foaming billows," being also highly successful. The choir in both these works showed no signs of fatigue, the "Hallelujah" in "The Mount of Olives," and "The heavens are telling" in the "Creation" being sung with much power and precision. The only defect in the evening's selection was that the programme was too long.

Cherubini's Mass in D minor, which commenced the performance on Thursday morning, had only been brought to the notice of the English public at a recent concert of the Bach Society, under the direction of Mr. Otto Goldschmidt; and Mr. Done deserves every credit for affording us the opportunity of hearing the effect of this sublime composition in its true home—a Cathedral. Comparable only in power and grandeur to Beethoven's Mass in D, which was one of the great attractions at the last Gloucester Festival, pedantic amateurs, who are sometimes apt to cast a slur upon these "country meetings," may now perhaps begin to think that if they wish to hear the greatest sacred musical works rendered amidst the greatest sacred architectural surroundings, they must journey to one of the Three Choir Festivals. Rarely indeed have we listened to finer choral singing than was presented to the vast and thoroughly appreciative audience throughout this difficult Mass; all the contrapuntal intricacies were surmounted with an ease which concealed the consummate art of the workmanship; and, apart from this technical skill, the varied expression of the text was so faithfully conveyed as to create a devout and reverential feeling beyond the power of the most eloquent preacher to produce. Madame Albani sang as if she were really inspired with her subject; and no praise can be too great for the other principal vocalists, Madame Patey, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Henschel; Miss A. Williams and Mr. Dyson lending efficient aid in the sestet, "Et incarnatus." The elaborate orchestral parts were finely played, and the tempi were so accurately taken as to bring out the full effect of each movement. Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" ("Hymn of Praise") formed the second part of the morning's performance, the principal vocalists being Madame Albani, Miss A. Williams, and Mr. E. Lloyd. The instrumental movements were rendered with the excellence which might be supposed from so perfect a band; and the solo and choral singing fully justified the expectation of those who anticipated an exceptionally fine rendering of Mendelssohn's work. Mr. E. Lloyd's singing was superb throughout.

The first part of the Concert at the College Hall, in the evening, was devoted to the performance of Mr. J. F. Barnett's Cantata, "The Building of the Ship," conducted by the composer. The principal vocalists were Miss A. Williams, Madame Patey, Messrs. E. Lloyd, F. King, and Henschel. Our notice of this work on its production at the Leeds Triennial Festival in October last will absolve us from the necessity of here criticising its merits; and it will suffice, therefore, to say that the principal pieces were cordially received, and the melodious quartet, "How beautiful she is," redemanded. In the second part Miss Marriott was highly successful in her rendering of Weber's scena, "Ocean! thou mighty monster," and vocal pieces were also given by Messrs. Maas, F. King, and Henschel, an apology being made for Madame Patey, who was too unwell to reappear. A well written part-song by Mr. Broughton was also given by the Leeds Festival Choir, and the programme included the Overtures to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" and "Guillaume Tell," both of which were excellently played.

On Friday morning the "Messiah" was given, Madame Albani producing her usual effect in "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" and Miss A. Williams singing with good feeling the air, "How beautiful are the feet." Madame Patey was highly successful in "He shall feed His flock" and "He was despised"; Miss Hilda Wilson gave the solo (with chorus), "O Thou that tellest," with much expression; the tenor music was sung throughout by Mr. Maas, and that for the bass was divided between Messrs. Henschel and F. King. In the choruses the choir seemed as fresh as if the Festival were beginning instead of ending, "For unto us" and the "Hallelujah," especially, being very finely rendered.

In the evening the special closing Service was held in the nave of the Cathedral, commencing with Spohr's Overture to "The Last Judgment." Handel's Anthem, "The king shall rejoice," was given after the third Collect—the solos by Miss Marriott, Miss H. Wilson, Mr. Dyson, and Mr. King—and the Anthem before the blessing was Mozart's "O God, when Thou appearest." Mention must also be made of a "Magnificat" and "Nunc dimittis" composed expressly for the Festival by the Rev. E. V. Hall, which contain some smooth and melodious writing for solo voices and chorus, much of the instrumentation being extremely bright and effective. At the conclusion of the Service Dr. Bridge, Organist of Westminster Abbey, performed Bach's Toccata in F, and other pieces, on the large organ in the nave, causing a number of the congregation to linger for some time in the Cathedral.

Looking back upon the artistic results of the week, we cannot but feel that very much of the success of the Festival was owing to the exertions of the local Conductor, Mr. Done. It is too much the custom to underrate the services rendered at these meetings by the Cathedral organist simply because some experienced Conductor might be brought from London who, it is said, would exercise more control over the executants. But, apart from the ungracious act of placing a stranger in a Cathedral where the musical arrangements are always presided over by one well known to the residents, is it fair to ignore the hard work which has devolved upon the organist for many months before the performance? We happen to know, for example, that Mr. Done had for a very long period toiled hard with different sections of the choir, and even journeyed to Leeds, in order to insure an adequate rendering of Cherubini's Mass; and we emphatically say that the choral singing in this work would have done honour to any Conductor. The general performances under his direction, too, were very far above the average; and he was ably seconded by Mr. C. H. Lloyd, who presided during the Festival at the organ erected by Messrs. Nicholson in the Cathedral. The band, led by M. Sainton, included the most eminent London artists; and the addition of a selection from the Leeds Festival Choir to those of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester, produced an unusually fine body of tone in all the choral pieces. After a word of commendation to Mr. Langdon Colborne, who presided at the pianoforte in the College Hall, and at the organ during the early morning services at the Cathedral, there remains only the agreeable duty of acknowledging the attentions of the Honorary Secretaries, and more especially of warmly thanking the Rev. Canon Cattley, whose many personal courtesies rendered our work rather a pleasure than a task during the Festival. The entire sum collected at the Cathedral doors for the charity was £1,027 4s. 10d. At the Festival in 1878 the collections amounted to £1,372 4s. 2d.; but this must be regarded as an exceptional occasion, being the first of the restored meetings after their temporary cessation.

THE FRENCH FESTIVAL AT BRIGHTON.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

THE attractiveness of those well-known competitions of Orphéons and other musical societies in France gave rise to the desire of holding some such gathering in England; and, after several years of vague plannings to that end, a definite result has at last been achieved. In the absence of better and more influential promoters—who, we venture to think, might easily have been found—Mr. Bamford, of Wareham, Dorsetshire, two or three other amateurs whose names do not appear, and Mons. de la Grave, of Brighton, sent offers to all the French societies to come over at their own expense and hold a Competition and Festival in Brighton. The avowed object was "the hope of promoting international contests in music," but as the form of competition rendered it impossible for any but French, Belgian, or Swiss societies (i.e., those classified according to one and the same system) to compete, a more obvious reason must be sought. Thirty-two Fanfares, Harmonies, Symphonies, and Chorales (brass, wind, and string bands and choirs of male voices) were inscribed on the competition list as having accepted the invitation, and in reality twenty-two societies, including one from Belgium, arrived and took part in the contest, which was held simultaneously in four rooms during the days of the 6th and 7th ult. It seems that all these societies, which consist of amateurs of the working classes, are strictly classified into three divisions, each division again being subdivided into three or more sections, but we are not aware by whom or on what grounds a society is placed, say, in Division III., Section 3, Group C (the lowest class), nor how it would proceed to work its way up past Division I., Section 1, into the very highest class, "excellence." However this may be, there is plenty of system and rule in these affairs, and as there were representatives of each division and section, one could gain a fair idea of the general merits. Truth to say, these were by no means transcendent. The very highest classes of brass and wind bands would be about on a level with our good military bands—but far inferior to our best—if only they possessed better instruments. The second division is about equivalent to the town and pier bands of our best watering-places, that is to say, they play tolerably, but with instruments wretchedly out of tune, and with little regard to light and shade. The third division is too terrible to be described. The choral societies are much better, even those of the lower rank showing very good training, and all, without exception, having the power—so conspicuously lacking in English choirs—of keeping up to pitch during a long unaccompanied piece.

The procedure of the Festival was as follows:—All the societies having arrived in the course of Monday night, the opening ceremony was held at 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning in the Dome. The bands and choirs filled the body of the hall, and made a very pretty sight, with their gay banners loaded with medals and crowns, won in previous gatherings. The Festival Committee, consisting of several eminent English musicians, the principal local and a number of French professors, were assembled on the platform, the respected and popular Mayor of Brighton (Mr. Alderman D. Smith, D.L., J.P.) presiding. M. Cressonnois, Chef de Musique de la Gendarmerie, came to the front as Conductor, and "God save the Queen" was played and sung by the whole body with imposing effect, despite a slight difference of opinion as to the repeats. The voices, though in unison, were quite overpowered by the instruments, which outnumbered them by more than two to one. "La Marseillaise" then followed, but having been arranged by some unknown meddler, it all but came to grief. Indeed, though many times given during the course of the Festival, it was never performed without a hitch. The Belgian band having played the "Brabançonne," a good march, but scarcely a worthy national anthem, the Mayor declared the Festival open in a short speech, and was followed by other speakers, among whom Sir Julius Benedict was decidedly the shining light. "God save the Queen" having been repeated (it was played no less than twelve times in the course of the Festival) the business of the competitions began. This consisted first in the playing or singing of a piece at sight by each society. The pieces specially written for this purpose were a Solfeggio for three voices by M. Bordogni—a simple piece in A minor, with no chromatic passages or awkward rhythms—and an Allegro Militaire for wind instruments: much such a piece as we hear three members of a street band perform while the rest go round to collect the money. Anything more ridiculously simple could not be imagined, yet even the splendid choir of Le Mans and the really fine bands of Chalons and Ixelles could not get through without mistake. The inferior bands and choirs came to hopeless grief at the first bars. We should except one brass band of mere boys from Chevreuse, which, though in the lower section of Division II., read fairly well, and had been wonderfully well trained by their clever Conductor, quite a common artisan. Well might the sight-reading class be conducted with closed doors! The other test was the playing of three pieces by each band, one chosen by the judges, the others by the competitors. The first was usually a little French overture, the second an operatic selection, and the third an air with variations to show off the soloists, who, as a rule, had better have been kept in the background. The jurors of the four rooms were as follows:—Music Room, Pavilion: Sir Julius Benedict (president), Signor Randegger, M. Baron, M. Cressonnois, M. Durand, M. d'Ingrande, and Mr. R. Taylor. Banqueting Room, Pavilion: Sir George Elvey (president), Mr. Kuhe, Mr. F. H. Cowen, M. Torchet père, Mr. A. King, M. Petit Jean, and M. Réveillon. Aquarium: M. Willent Bordogni (president), Mr. Dorrell, Mr. Corder, Signor Visetti, M. Torchet fils, M. Auguez, and Mr. Crapps. Town Hall: Signor Tito Mattei (president), Mr. E. H. Thorne, Mr. F. d'Alquen, Mr. Ardley, M. F. Simon, M. Viereuist, and M. Schaun. The English gentlemen, from their unfamiliarity with the procedure, were of course in the hands of their French coadjutors; but as, owing to the odd system of division and subdivision, there were never more than two or three societies in a class, there was little or no real competition, and the work of the jurors was merely formal. In fact, no one of the Societies came off with less than two prizes, while some received as many as six!

First system of the musical score. It consists of four vocal staves (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and a piano accompaniment. The lyrics are: "sins, He is faith - ful and just to for - give us our sins, . . . and to". The piano part features a steady accompaniment with chords and moving lines in both hands.

Second system of the musical score. It continues the vocal and piano parts. The lyrics are: "cleanse us from all . . . un - righ - teous - ness, all un - righ - - - teous -". Above the vocal staves, the tempo markings poco rall. and a tempo. are indicated. The piano accompaniment continues with similar harmonic support.

Third system of the musical score. It shows the continuation of the vocal parts, which end with a long note on the word "ness." followed by a double bar line. The piano part continues with a melodic line in the right hand and a supporting bass line in the left hand. The marking senza Reed. is present above the piano staff.

On the Tuesday evening and Wednesday afternoon grand concerts were given at the Dome. To these the public flocked in crowds—indeed the huge room could have been twice filled. Some fine singers from the Grand-Opéra of Paris were heard at each, Mesdames Castillon and Appia, and MM. Caron, Villaret, and Auguez: the two ladies and the last-named gentleman having rare qualities of voice and style. The choirs of Chartres, Chalons-sur-Marne, and Le Mans gave part-songs with exquisite style and finish, and the wind bands of Ixelles, Chalons, Chartres, and Fontenoy-sur-bois contributed the orchestral items. Save for the interest attaching to these as novelties the concerts were wholly beneath notice, being badly conducted, and without an atom of anything like good music. A third Concert was held on the Thursday for the benefit of the unfortunate Society of La Ferte Alais which formed the bulk of the victims in the terrible railway accident at Charenton, but as all the societies had left Brighton on Thursday morning the result was meagre, the hall being very poorly filled. At six p.m. on Wednesday the whole company went in procession to the Skating Rink in the King's Road to hold what is in France the chief item of the Festival—a united performance of vocal and instrumental pieces by all the societies en masse. This turned out a complete failure, partly on account of a neighbouring chapel, the bell of which neither bribes nor entreaties could stop from ringing the whole time—partly on account of the singular absence of the general public. At nine, in the Dome, the Mayor presented the prizes, which consisted principally of silver-gilt wreaths and crowns, and gold, silver, and silver-gilt medals, which had been handsomely subscribed for by the town; all these, as has been already hinted, being absurdly in excess of the real deserts of the winners. The scene here was most amusing and exciting, the favourite winners being embraced, carried about and wept over by their enthusiastic friends, while they did not scruple to hiss the undeserving conductors of the bad bands when they came up for their prizes. A conversazione was then supposed to take place at the Pavilion, but as this only meant that the rooms were lit up for anyone to go in who liked, most concluded to stay away. A Garden Party the following morning would have been spoilt by the rain, even had there been anyone to attend it, which there was not. So melted away into nothingness a Festival which, delightfully interesting in itself, might have afforded enjoyment to thousands and brought considerable pecuniary reward to the promoters had they only known their business.

That we have anything to learn from the French save enthusiasm for art and concentration of forces we, for our part, stoutly deny. Not one piece that could be called good music was performed in the entire course of the Festival. Not one choir that we could not match, not one amateur band that we might not be able to surpass. To be sure, our amateurs do not go in much for brass bands, and oh! what a blessing—what a sweet incalculable blessing!—it is that they do not!

THE OSWESTRY FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

AMONGST the numerous provincial festivals and musical meetings which this autumn has witnessed, and is destined to witness, one of modest pretensions, but of considerable educational interest, should not be overlooked altogether. The Oswestry meeting with which this notice is concerned was officially described as a Festival of Village Choirs, and a more characteristic name could not be found for it. The singers on this occasion were exclusively men and women and children from the Welsh and English counties in the neighbourhood of Oswestry—men and women of all classes and all denominations and all ages, for social and sectarian differences have fortunately had no place in the movement of which the Festival was the first public result and demonstration. As to the genesis and the aims of that movement, it may interest the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES to hear a few details which are not without their general bearing and importance.

Oswestry has one advantage over more populous and more interesting cities. It has in its midst, or at least in its neighbourhood, a prophet, and it believes in that prophet. When Mr. Henry Leslie had dissolved his famous choir, and took up his residence on his estate in Wales, he soon felt the want of some employment for his musical energy and his organising genius, and he determined to solve on a small scale the educational problem with regard to music, which for some time has been amongst the burning questions of English legislation. The official teaching in his district being to a large extent confined to singing by ear, there was much room for improvement, and that improvement it is intended to bring about by the organisation of a system of village choirs, self-supporting and independent of Government aid, and equally free from sectarian influence of any kind. By way of centre to this system, a School of Music at Oswestry was founded from the surplus money of a festival given there two years ago; and the excellent prospects of the system are sufficiently proved by the fact that at the meeting on the 15th of last month no less than 1,200 singers had assembled, all capable of grappling with musical difficulties of a more or less rudimentary kind. On looking at these men, women, and children (some of them charity children), as they stood in serried ranks on the platform of the Cross Market Hall, turned into a concert-room for the nonce, one had the agreeable certainty that all of them loved art sincerely, and had acquired at least some proficiency in practising it—that, for example, they were all of them able to convert written notes into sounds. For it need scarcely be added that singing by ear is not indulged in by these choirs, which, on the other hand, may choose their own system of notation. An equal chance is thus given to the adherents of Tonic Sol-fa and of the historic mode of writing music, and in this respect also the experiment may lead to interesting statistical results. But the chief thing after all is that the bad empiric method is here for ever abandoned in favour of systematic training. As long as people are taught to read, the characters which they use are a minor consideration.

To show quantæ molis erat to found the village choirs organisation on a healthy basis, it will be best to quote a few extracts from the Report addressed to the Committee of the Oswestry School of Music in November last:—

The school has now been before the public for more than a year, and although the terms on which competent teaching was offered were so low as to place instruction within the reach of the poorest, yet next to no response had been made! The President, while not less assured of an ultimate success, was beginning to despair of an immediate one, although the Committee offered so much and asked for so little in return. But an event has quite recently occurred in the parish of Llansantffraid which has thoroughly and practically solved the problem, leaving not the slightest doubt of a brilliant fulfilment of all Mr. Leslie had so much at heart.

A short narration of the formation of the Llansantffraid Musical Union will best explain how it came about, how easily and how strongly it grew, and how great and unexpected a success has been obtained. A like result is in the power of every parish. A leading inhabitant of Llansantffraid asked Mr. Leslie if he would help to improve music in the village. The reply was that he would do all in his power to assist, provided all parties in the parish would drop their mutual differences, political and sectarian, and thus form a strong society for the cultivation of the art of music. In the course of a very few days every representative name in the parish was appended to this understanding. A meeting was called, at which a committee was formed, and Mr. Henry Leslie accepted the office of Chairman. The Vicar most kindly placed the National Schoolroom at the disposal of the Committee. No time was lost; Mr. J. P. Williams, of Llanfyllin, was engaged for Monday evenings to instruct an elementary class from 6 o'clock to 7, and an advanced class from 7.10 to 8.30. Work commenced on Monday evening, October 3, and on Thursday evening, November 11, the choir sang two choruses (and not easy ones) at a concert. On some evenings there have been as many as 120 at practice, and on no occasion less than 100.

The members of the choir pay nothing for the instruction, the Committee having determined that two concerts shall be given during each season, and the proceeds devoted to the payment of expenses incurred by the practices. Three important objects are thus at the same time attained: musical instruction is a free gift to every applicant with a voice, two entertainments are provided for those who have not too much change in the dull monotony of their evenings throughout the year, and funds are secured to meet the outlay in connection with the classes. It should here be mentioned, for the information of those parishes which wish to follow the example of Llansantffraid, that the principles of management adopted are identical with those on which Mr. Henry Leslie's choir was conducted. Unless each member has attended a sufficient number of rehearsals, singing at a concert is not and never should be permitted. Fears may arise regarding the possibility of obtaining the necessary professional teaching, but there need be no trouble on that point. There are several teachers living in Oswestry, some of whom are connected with the School of Music, who are ready and competent to fulfil the required duties.

The incidents of the Village Choir Festival, as far as they are of general interest, may be described in few words. The most interesting feature was the contest for the handsome prize banner, embroidered and presented by Mrs. Leslie. This took place in the morning at the Cross Market Hall, the number of competing choirs being eight. Sir Frederick Ouseley acted as umpire, the piece selected for performance being Wesley's familiar hymn "The Church's one foundation." The choice can scarcely be called a happy one. The mere sequence of notes being very easy, the conductors of the various choirs not unnaturally endeavoured to excel by the introduction of nuances, which on the other hand were wholly uncalled for in the simple tune. One verse was given piano, another forte, without any reason but that just referred to, the result being an impression of artificiality not always agreeable. A simple part-song of Mendelssohn or something similar would have been more to the purpose. There was a tendency on the part of some conductors towards hurrying the tempo, accounted for perhaps by the laudable wish of counteracting the habit of dragging, too frequently found in congregational singing. Upon the whole, however, the performance was decidedly creditable, and augured well for the future achievements of these unsophisticated singers. Sir Frederick Ouseley ultimately assigned the prize to the choir of Maesbury, and in this verdict—if we may presume to judge so competent a judge—we fully agree. His criticisms on the various renderings were a model of good sense, keeping aloof alike from indiscriminate flattery and from harsh censure. His remarks, most useful no doubt to the competitors, were made in a kindly spirit, and in such they were accepted. Excellent feeling also was shown by the unanimous applause with which the name of the winning choir was received by its unsuccessful competitors.

Of the Concert given in the afternoon of the same day not much need be said. Some hymns were sung by the united choirs, the Oswestry Festival Chorus gave various part-songs, the Viscountess Folkestone charmed the natives by her agreeable voice, and various brass bands of somewhat doubtful intonation added to the volume of sound, if not to the merit of the performance. Mr. Henry Leslie conducted, and at the end of the Concert received a cordial vote of thanks. Subsequent trials must show whether the seed thus sown will yield a lasting and, in a higher sense, artistic harvest.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

THE fashion now prevalent in Germany of giving operatic "cycles" has just received a noteworthy illustration in Munich, where the six operas of Richard Wagner (disregarding the Nibelung trilogy) have been twice performed, the first series extending from September 1st to the 12th, and the repetition from the 15th to the 26th. It seems likely that London will be visited by an epidemic of Wagnerism during the coming season, if current rumour and official statement are alike to be credited. But even if we reject the former it is practically certain that the two latest and most individual works of the Bayreuth genius will be presented to notice under advantageous circumstances; and it is probable that some among the English musicians who attended the recent Munich performances were actuated by a desire to make acquaintance with these complex creations before hearing them amid the distractions of a London season. A slight disappointment was experienced at the outset, as the performance of "Rienzi," which should have inaugurated the cycle on the 1st ult., could not be given in consequence of the illness of one of the artists. But visitors were compensated by the opportunity of hearing two performances of "Tannhäuser," an opera which received very scurvy treatment when adapted for the Italian stage at Covent Garden. It may be confidently predicted that a long career of popularity is in store for this work, which, for the magnificence of its music and the beauty and morality of its poem, is entitled to a very high place in public regard. Strangers among the Munich audience could not avoid being impressed by the artistic principles which evidently govern the system of operatic management in the Bavarian capital. The mounting of "Tannhäuser," as indeed of all the operas, was less remarkable for mere glitter than for refinement and for perfection in matters of detail. The eye was never pained by a sense of incongruity in the minutiae of stage arrangement, nor the ear by coarseness or faulty intonation in the chorus or orchestra. Herr Vogl as Tannhäuser, Frau Vogl as Venus, and Herr Reichmann as Wolfram, gave the liveliest satisfaction. The first-named artist acted as if inspired, especially in the third act, where so much of the effect depends upon the exponent of the erring and hapless minstrel. It should be added that the new version of the opera is used, from which the music to the Venusberg scene has been performed at St. James's Hall. Those who have only heard it in the concert-room can form no idea of its effect when given with the stage accessories. The performance of "Der Fliegende Holländer," may be passed over with a word of praise to Herr Reichmann for his fine impersonation of the Dutchman; and one of tribute to the scenic artists for the graphic portrayal of the storm and other atmospheric effects in the first act. In "Lohengrin" neither the Elsa nor the Knight of the Holy Grail were ideally perfect; but Herr Reichmann acted finely as Telramund, and Frau Vogl was so impressive as Ortrud that one could not help thinking with a smile of those who have termed the part thankless and ungrateful. The score was given in its entirety, but the performance, with moderate waits, only lasted a trifle over four hours. On the evening when "Tristan und Isolde" was given the theatre was filled to its last seat before the advertised time of commencement, and the deep interest felt by every one present was further evinced by the profound silence that prevailed throughout the performance. It is not our present purpose to enter into a detailed description of this extraordinary work, its author's most daring and most individual effort. Wagner tells us that during its composition he forgot all theory and moved with perfect freedom, the word suggesting the tone without reference to any established rules governing the construction of a musical section or movement. It is not surprising, therefore, that the work bears the character of a vast improvisation, form being absolutely ignored from first to last. In its place we have the system of Leitmotiv developed to the fullest possible extent. One melodic phrase of not more than six or eight notes will be repeated again and again, though with endless variety of detail, so that no sense of monotony is felt, but rather one of weariness at the attempt to grasp the kaleidoscopic changes in the harmony. In its general character the music is suggestive of intense and ungovernable passion, occasionally sinking into voluptuous repose, but soon rising again to a demoniac frenzy. There are portions of this opera which kindle the emotional faculties to the extent of positive pain; and the final sensation is one of exhaustion rather than that of elevation—such as we are accustomed to experience after listening to the masterpieces of Handel or Beethoven. The immorality of Wagner's poem is equalled by the unbridled licence of his music, and the influence of both can scarcely fail to be unhealthy. None but the pedantic or the unimpressible will deny the power of "Tristan und Isolde," but many will regret the use here made of genius so commanding. The exceptionally arduous nature of the two principal rôles will prevent frequent performance of the opera, as a couple of artists so gifted as Herr and Frau Vogl are not always to be secured. Vocally and dramatically their embodiment of the guilty pair was superb; indeed, it is impossible to imagine a finer interpretation of either character.

In "Die Meistersinger" Wagner gives us a more wholesome theme and less extravagant music, though the latter is scarcely less representative of his advanced style. The good-humoured satire levelled at the worthy but narrow Mastersingers, the mingled poetry and tenderness of the portrait of Hans Sach, the comic knavery of Beckmesser, and the homely love-making of Walter and Eva, combine to form an extremely pleasant drama, and although the music is uncompromisingly intricate, the melodies are so fresh and the treatment so vigorous that, in performance at least, one scarcely notices the elaborate nature of the means taken to produce the effects. Still, these difficulties must militate somewhat against the frequent representation of the work, and the essentially German nature of the subject may possibly exercise a prejudicial effect on its position in this country. Although there was nothing strikingly meritorious in the presentations of the leading characters at Munich, the Hans Sachs of Herr Reichmann excepted, the general performance was not only accurate but spirited, and Herr Lewi, the admirable conductor of the theatre, deserves congratulation on having brought his delicate and onerous labours to so triumphant a termination.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, Professor Macfarren, on Saturday, the 24th ult., delivered his annual opening address to the students, on the occasion of the inauguration of the new academic year. The proceedings took place in the concert-room of the Academy, in Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, and among the Professors present were Messrs. Brinley Richards, Walter Macfarren, Harold Thomas, A. O'Leary, H. C. Banister, F. R. Cox, P. Goldberg, A. Randegger, W. Shakespeare, F. Walker, H. R. Eyers, W. H. Holmes, H. R. Rose, and Mr. John Gill, the Secretary.

Professor Macfarren, addressing the new pupils more particularly, said he would endeavour to convince them of the great advantages and privileges which were open to them on their entrance into the Academy. He referred to the distinguished musicians who had been their precursors in the career of study, and afterwards stated that from time to time they would meet there musicians who held the highest position in the several departments for which they were famed in the musical profession. The fact of their owning these distinguished musicians as acquaintances was already an elevation on their entrance into the musical profession. They must remember that they entered into a community of aspiring young musicians, who had all the same hopes with them; and the mixing with other students of the same art would be in itself a particular means to promote their advancement. The position of a sub-professor was the highest that could be held by a student, and, having the confidence of the Committee, the sub-professors were trusted with the care of younger pupils than themselves, but under the supervision of their own superior professors. It was of great importance for them to consider the peculiar aspect of music at the present time. This was an age of political revolution and change; it was an age of art revolution. It would be unseemly in him, who enjoyed the very great privilege occasionally of coming up for judgment before the tribunal of public opinion, to mention by name artists who doubtless had as much conviction of the truthfulness of their course as any of them might entertain. It was, however, very necessary for them to hold in caution the revolutionary ideas which were held by some of the present generation of composers, to regard with sincere reverence the great things which had been done in former ages, and to be cautious in accepting innovations on them from the hands of others, whatever their artistic pretensions. Art was free; the musical art was boundlessly free; but all freedom was the widest, the broadest, the most complete which was under the discipline of mature judgment—not at the reckless impulse of accident, but guided by a true principle. Many of the composers of the present day appeared to disregard principle, and to write combinations which abrogated the rules of harmony. The rules of music were as much rooted in the foundations of nature as any subject which had engaged the attention of philosophers. The perspective which was the guide of the painter was not more truthful than the principles which conducted the framing of a useful design, and it was the particular duty of every student and every teacher of students to uphold the idea of the order of harmony in the construction of a musical work. It was necessary in the choice of works for study to consider that the present stage had been approached through a long avenue of centuries, and that present art had been reached through a long course of modification; that we could not understand the productions of this age except through a knowledge of the works which had preceded them; and that the true portal to present art was a knowledge of the works of those of forgotten times. We lived in and sympathised with this age, and there must be peculiar circumstances now existing which influenced the productions of the present time. He would by no means urge a wilful disregard of the work which was going on around us, but for more immediate and continual study it was necessary for them to become familiar with the masterpieces of an earlier period before they gave large attention to the productions of our own day, which were not yet past that remarkable ordeal, the ordeal of time, which was the true means to draw a decision from as to the real amount of excellence which an art production possessed. It must be borne in mind that in the large modifications of plan and of the rules of harmony which had been developed in the course of ages, truly great men, however large their views, had not broken them. Shakespeare enlarged the principles of versification. In the earlier "Songs without Words" of Mendelssohn one found in the majority of instances, though in a very concise form, the complete plan of the first movement of a sonata displayed. This was the case in many instances. Later, however, this formality in construction disappeared, yet there were the same principles of the relation of keys to the development of the subject differently applied—applied with a freer hand, but with a no less rigid regard to natural art and the relation of all notes to that single note which was chosen for the primary tonic. So, again, Beethoven extended the length of musical composition, but made no abnormal variation in the constructive propriety of the whole. What he wished to impress on them was that they must observe the rules of harmony and be guided by a true principle. He remembered when more than half the world used to condemn the paintings of Turner, exclaiming that they wanted plan and purpose, and that they violated all principles, but according to the elaborate analyses of many of Turner's pictures by the distinguished critic, Mr. Ruskin, principles were more faithfully observed in the pictorial compositions of Turner than in many and many an artist's works which were held in high esteem at the time when Turner's productions were stigmatised. It must not, however, be thought on this account—innovations not being understood when first presented—that everything which was new was acceptable as truthful. In past ages music, he apprehended, was played with such rigid exactitude of measure that the metronome might have beaten through an entire movement and it would never have been varied. More latitude was employed at the present time, but there was a tendency nowadays to vary the time to a greater extent than was either good for the effect of the music or for the undeveloped sense of the player or singer. The highest excellence which a long piece of musical construction could have was for all the phrases in it to fit one to the rest, and the same degree of quickness to apply to all the several ideas which were grouped into one composition. In referring to the imperfection of the musical alphabet, he observed, they must probe in the music itself for the expression at which the composer had aimed; and as this was a mystery of the most delicate, subtle, and beautiful nature, it was in this that our more experienced teachers must be particularly consulted. Referring to the contest between Marsyas and Apollo, he reminded them that Marsyas was defeated, and that for his temerity in challenging the god of music he had to suffer death. The blood of Marsyas, however, was the stream of poetry. From his veins had flowed the inheritance of all that was divine in our artistic system. Success in a low cause was far, far lower than failure in the highest. They witnessed the works and the performances of the greatest artists. They might be unable to equal them, but the endeavour was in itself an elevation. It was of the utmost consequence that every one who pretended to the high character of being a musician should have the power of reading and writing music, and be perfectly able to give a rendering of written music at first sight, though he did not mean by this that a first sight performance would be perfect. The more they extended their knowledge of languages the wider would be their capacity for music; and, generally, the education of musicians should be of a nature to fit them for the society into which they were now admitted. After pointing out the special duty in their case to resist the many temptations to which musicians were subjected, he beseeched them never to be contented with general public applause, as nothing was more misleading. No one could judge till after a large experience the real worth of any art production. Professor Macfarren resumed his seat amid warm applause, with which his address was frequently greeted.—The Times.

THE musical season in Manchester, which commences this month, promises increased variety of entertainment, if it does not surpass its predecessors in the production of novelties. Mr. Hallé's series of twelve orchestral and eight choral Concerts will commence on the 27th inst. The personnel of the orchestra, with the exception of the first oboe and tympani players, will be practically unchanged, so we may confidently anticipate the maintenance of the high standard of excellence for which the band is so justly famed. Amongst the choral works promised are Cherubini's Mass in C (No. 4), Rossini's "Stabat Mater," the "Creation," Berlioz' "Childhood of Christ," the "Messiah," Berlioz' "Faust," the "Elijah," a Cantata entitled "Eric the Dane," by E. Hecht, and Beethoven's Missa Solennis in D. Mr. De Jong, whose Popular Concerts merit their title, has improved his generally efficient orchestra of last season, and has already engaged a number of vocalists, amongst whom we may mention Mesdames Marie Roze, Davies, Samuell, and Patey; and Messrs. Lloyd, Maas, Foli, &c. The Manchester Vocal Society, under the direction of Mr. Henry Wilson, is engaged in the rehearsal of several of Schubert's masses, and various new part-songs, &c. The choir has been somewhat augmented, the sopranos especially having been largely reinforced. The Athenæum Musical Society is engaged, under the conductorship of Dr. H. Hiles, in the preparation of A. J. Caldicott's Cantata "The Widow of Nain," and this work will be produced for the first time here early in the season. In addition to these established musical institutions, the St. James's Hall was inaugurated on the 26th ult. with a series of twelve Promenade Concerts, which are to extend over a fortnight, and may possibly be continued through the season at intervals. The band and chorus, the former of which contains many well-known names, numbers about 250 performers, and an imposing list of vocalists has been engaged. Mr. Dodds, late of the Carl Rosa Opera Company, is also venturing into the musical field with six ballad Concerts, to be given on alternate Saturday nights.

THE Norwich Musical Festival commences on Tuesday evening, the 11th inst., with Mendelssohn's Oratorio "St. Paul." On Wednesday morning Mr. Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" (under the conductorship of the composer) will be performed, preceded by a miscellaneous selection, including Schubert's unfinished Symphony in B minor, Professor Macfarren's Overture, "St. John the Baptist," and Mr. E. Prout's Organ Concerto in E minor, performed by Dr. Bunnett, and conducted by the composer. In the evening Berlioz' Dramatic Legend "Faust" will be given. On Thursday morning the programme will comprise Mr. F. H. Cowen's Cantata "St. Ursula," composed expressly for the Festival, and Mendelssohn's music to "Athalia," the illustrative verses to be recited by Mr. Santley. On Thursday evening Mr. A. G. Thomas's Choral Ode, "The Sun-Worshippers," especially written for the Festival, will be produced, with a miscellaneous selection, including an Overture to Shakespeare's play "King Henry V.," also composed for the occasion, by Mr. Walter Macfarren, who will conduct it. The "Messiah" will be given on Friday morning; and in the evening Mr. John Francis Barnett's Symphonic Poem, "The Harvest Festival" (another work written for the occasion), will be performed, under the direction of the composer. It will thus be seen that, although Sir Julius Benedict's Cantata "Graziella" could not unfortunately be ready in time for the Festival, the programme presents an unusual number of novelties, and in every respect the meeting promises to be one of special interest. The principal vocalists are Mesdames Albani and Osgood, Miss Mary Davies, Mesdames Patey and Mudie-Bolingbroke, Messrs. E. Lloyd, Barton McGuckin, Frederick King, Brockbank and Santley. The leader of the band is Mr. Carrodus; Organist, Dr. Bunnett; Chorus-master, Dr. Horace Hill; and Mr. Alberto Randegger makes his first appearance at the Norwich Festivals as Conductor.

MR. SAMUEL HAYES commences a series of performances of Italian Opera at the Lyceum on the 1st of the present month, the répertoire of the season chiefly comprising those well-worn works with which we should imagine opera-goers are almost too well acquainted during the summer to desire a repetition of them in the autumn. The following artists have been already engaged: Mdles. Marie Marimon, Leon Duval, Francesca Barri (from the Grand Opera, Madrid), Madame Dax Dalton, Mdles. Emelie Petrelli, Amelia Riego, Sonniere, Mesdames Colombo, Rose Hersee (her first appearance since her return from Australia), Mary Cummings, Mdles. Rosa Leo, Giovanna Ameris, Le Brun, Alma Verdini, Rosina Isodor, Signori Frapolli, Tesseman, Grazzi, Bolli, Vizzani, D'Antoni (from the San Carlo, Naples, his first appearance in England), Antonucci, Ponsard (from the Grand-Opéra, Paris, his first appearance in England), Walter Bolton, Monari-Rocca, Gonnet, Pyatt, Zoboli, Padilla (from La Scala, Milan, his first appearance in England). Signor Li Calsi is Conductor, and Mr. Carrodus leader of the band. We should look with greater favour upon this enterprise if some novelties had been promised; but considering that the prices of admission are to be those of an ordinary theatre, and, we presume, the restrictions as to "evening dress" will not be observed, the speculation may perhaps prove remunerative.

THE Sacred Harmonic Society, in entering upon its Jubilee year, naturally refers with pride to its former achievements, and especially dwells upon the fact of its having, in the early days of music in this country, restored and fully established the practice of giving complete oratorios, instead of selections made up of fragments detached from the several works to which they belonged. During the coming season nine concerts are announced at St. James's Hall, the following works being selected for performance: Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," "Messiah," and "Solomon," Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and 42nd Psalm, Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist," Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," a new setting of the Te Deum by W. G. Cusins, Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," Haydn's "Creation," and Costa's "Eli." The vocalists already engaged are Madame Marie Roze, Misses Anna Williams, Robertson, Annie Marriott, and Mary Davies, Mdle. Avigliana, Miss Jessie Jones, Mesdames Patey and Enriquez, Miss M. Hancock; Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Edward Lloyd, Joseph Maas, Henry Guy, G. T. Carter, Santley, Lewis Thomas, Bridson, F. King, Burdon, and Chaplin Henry; Organist, Mr. Willing. Sir Michael Costa retains the office of Conductor, which he has filled for thirty-four years. The season will commence on November 11.

THE Directors of the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society announce for the eleventh season, 1881-82, nine concerts, seven of which are included in the subscription series; and, if possible, one or two extra concerts will be given. The season will commence on Wednesday, November 2, with a performance of "Judas Maccabæus," when the orchestra will be increased by the band of the Coldstream Guards. The other works selected for performance are Berlioz' "Faust," Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," Hiller's "Song of Victory," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Elijah," Handel's "Samson" and "Messiah." The following artists are already engaged: Mesdames Albani, Lemmens-Sherrington, and Marie Roze; Miss Anna Williams, Madame Trebelli, Miss Orridge, Miss Damian, Madame Patey; Messrs. E. Lloyd, Joseph Maas, Santley, Frederick King, and Signor Foli. The band and chorus, numbering together 1,000 performers, will be on the same complete scale as heretofore; and the concerts will be, as usual, under the able conductorship of Mr. Barnby: Organist, Dr. Stainer.

THE prospectus of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society announces four Concerts for the ensuing season, at the Town Hall. The principal vocalists are: Madame Marie Roze, Mrs. Osgood, Misses Anna Williams, and Mary Davies, Mesdames Patey and Enriquez, Miss Orridge; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Joseph Maas, Vernon Rigby, Thurley Beale, Frederick King, and Signor Foli; with full band, organ, and chorus: Organist, Mr. Stimpson; Conductor, Mr. Stockley. Sullivan's Dramatic Cantata, "The Martyr of Antioch," and Mendelssohn's eight-part Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," will be given on Tuesday evening, the 18th inst.; Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on Thursday evening, December 8, Berlioz' Dramatic Legend, "Faust," on Thursday evening, February 16, 1882 (for which the band will be considerably augmented), and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and a selection from Handel's "Israel in Egypt" on Thursday evening, March 23, 1882. The Society's annual performance of the "Messiah" will take place on Monday evening, December 26. Artists: Misses Clara Samuëll and Hilda Wilson; Messrs. Joseph Maas and Bridson; Trumpet, Mr. Robinson.

THE prospectus of the Highbury Philharmonic Society, under the conductorship of Dr. Bridge, announces for its fourth season—from the present month to May, 1882—three Concerts, commencing on December 12 next. Two Cantatas, by Drs. Bridge and Gladstone, entitled respectively "Boadicea" and "Nicodemus," have been composed for and originally produced by the Society, other little-known works having also been presented, after most careful preparation, during the short time the Society has been before the public. It is now stated that Weber's "Euryanthe," the libretto of which is being translated from the German expressly for the occasion, will be performed during the coming season for the first time in England. The rehearsals will be held for the present at Hare Court Hall, St. Paul's Road (the Highbury Athenæum being still in course of construction) on Monday evenings, commencing on the 10th inst.

THE prospectus of the Wolverhampton "Public Organ Concerts" has been issued, with a highly attractive programme, for the ensuing season. Five Concerts will be given, commencing on the 31st inst., the "Messiah" being announced on Monday, December 26. The principal vocalists are Madame Marie Roze, Madame Bauermeister, Miss Robertson, Miss De Fonblanque, Miss Clara Samuëll; Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Miss Spencer Jones, Miss Fanny Robertson, Miss Emilie Lloyd; Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Signor Vizzani, Mr. H. T. Bywater; Signor Foli, Signor Ghilberti, Mr. Frederick King, Mr. T. Laxton, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. The instrumentalists are M. Musin, Herr Otto Bernhardt, Herr van Biene, Signor Bisaccia, Mr. George Wheeldon, and Mr. Astley Langston.

A six weeks' course of practical training for choirmasters and music teachers has recently terminated at the Tonic Sol-fa College, Forest Gate. The studies are specially directed to the wants of church choirmasters, teachers of singing in day and Sunday-schools, in congregations, temperance societies, workmen's clubs, and choral associations. Not only are the students instructed in harmony, singing, voice management, elocution, reading music at sight, and recognising chords by ear, but they give lessons, which are criticised by their fellow-students and by the teachers. The lecturers have included Messrs. Curwen, Proudman, McNaught, Venables, G. Oakey, Mus. Bac., W. C. Harris, F. T. Harris, B.Sc., Arthur J. Kestin, and Herr Behnke. Students from Scotland, Wales, and various parts of England were present.

THE Hampstead Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Willem Coenen, in its prospectus of the fourth season announces that the following works will be performed: Gade's "Spring's Message" and "Erl-King's Daughter," Haydn's First Mass, Mendelssohn's "Come, let us sing," and Spohr's "Last Judgment." It is also intended, should there be time, to study Mendelssohn's oratorio "St. Paul," with a view to the future performance of this composition. The rehearsals take place at the New Vestry Hall on Monday evenings, commencing in the present month and ending in May. Considering the short time this Society has been in existence, the number of first-class works produced at its concerts is remarkable; and both the Conductor and the choir he so ably directs are worthy of the warmest commendation.

THE Organ Recitals at Lancaster Hall, Notting Hill, will be commenced on Tuesday evening, the 18th inst., and continued every Tuesday evening at 8 o'clock. Amongst the performers the following organists may be mentioned: Messrs. Barnes, E. H. Birch, Mus. B., Bird, Bradley, Scotson Clark, Cole, Eyre, C. J. Frost, Mus. B., H. J. Frost, F. E. Gladstone, Mus. Doc., Little, Russell Lochner, Fountain Meen, Ogbourne, C. Pearce, Mus. B., Pettit, Humphrey Stark, Mus. B., Stidolph, Strong, E. H. Turpin, J. Turpin, Mus. B., Wesche, and W. G. Wood. Ample opportunity will thus be given to admirers of organ music for hearing good performances on a fine organ at cheap prices.

THE autumn Concert of Miss S. F. Mascall, given at the Town Hall, Woolwich, on the 9th ult., was, according to the notices in the local papers, highly successful; but as a correspondent who was present writes to inform us that the programme contained fifty-eight pieces, and that the performance lasted from half-past seven o'clock until after midnight, we cannot but think that it must have taken two separate audiences to listen to it.

A SERIES of four Concerts is announced by the Brixton Choral Society, at the Angell Town Institution, under the conductorship of Mr. William Lemare, during the coming season, when the following works will be performed: "Lauda Sion" ("Praise Jehovah"), Mendelssohn; "The Ancient Mariner," J. F. Barnett; "The Corsair," F. H. Cowen; "Christmas," G. A. Macfarren; "The Martyr of Antioch," Dr. A. Sullivan; and "Judas Maccabæus," Handel. The weekly choral rehearsals commence on the 3rd inst. The fourth series of organ performances will extend from the 1st inst. to Christmas, 1881, a Recital being given every Saturday evening during that period.

A LARGE congregation assembled at St. Sepulchre's Church, Holborn Viaduct, on Thursday evening, the 22nd ult., on the occasion of the Harvest Thanksgiving Service. Weber's Jubilee Cantata was admirably rendered by a choir of upwards of seventy voices, conducted by Mr. Loaring, the Organist; Mr. G. C. Martin, Sub-organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, presiding at the organ. The solo parts were sustained by members of the church choir. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis by Mr. Loaring were excellently given. At the close of the service Beethoven's Hallelujah ("Engedi") was sung, and was followed by a fine performance of Bach's D minor Fugue.

THE Harvest Thanksgiving Service at St. Peter's Church, Great Windmill Street, took place on Sunday the 25th ult., the church being crowded at each service. The Anthem in the morning was "Thou visitest the earth" (Greene), and in the evening "Fear not, O land" (Goss). The Service was by Clarke-Whitfeld, and the Hymn, "The harvest-tide thanksgiving" (Barnby), was sung at both services. The music was executed in excellent style under the direction of the Organist, Mr. Dorey. Appropriate sermons were preached by the Incumbent, the Rev. H. A. Sheringham.

THE Borough of Hackney Choral Association has issued its prospectus for the coming season. The principal works announced for performance are Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night" and "Lauda Sion," Schubert's "Song of Miriam," Schumann's "Faust" (Part III.), and "Requiem for Mignon," a selection from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," and a new Cantata, "Alfred," libretto by Mr. W. Grist, music by Mr. Ebenezer Prout, the Conductor of the Association. The concerts will, as usual, be given in Shoreditch Town Hall.

WE are informed that the Second Session of the London Sunday School Choir (Advanced Section) will commence on the 11th inst., and the meetings will be continued fortnightly until April 4, 1882, in the large Lecture Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, Aldersgate Street. The New Book—the Old Notation Edition published for the Choir by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., the Tonic Sol-fa Edition by Messrs. Curwen and Sons—is now ready, and comprises choruses from the oratorios, &c., standard glees, and old English madrigals.

THE Tufnell Park Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Henry Thomas, commences the rehearsals for its eighth season on the 4th inst., in St. George's Church Room, Carleton Road. Hofmann's new Cantata, "Cinderella," and Berlioz's "Farewell of the Shepherds," from "L'Enfance du Christ," have been chosen to commence the rehearsals with; and afterwards a selection will be made from a long list of high-class works. Two invitation Concerts will be given in the Church Room, the first at Christmas and the second about Easter.

WE are glad to find by the fifth Annual Report of the Sydney Musical Union that there is every prospect of the Society being carried through the coming season with even an increase of its financial position. For the valuable and disinterested services rendered to the Union by Mr. Sydney Moss, the Conductor, the warm thanks of the Committee are given; and it is recommended that, in addition to the regular concerts, there shall be occasional entertainments exclusively devoted to chamber music.

It is reported that the score of Donizetti's Opera "Le Duc d'Albe," composed for the Paris Académie, has been discovered, after having been lost for many years. The work will doubtless be shortly produced.

ON Thursday, the 22nd ult., a Harvest Festival was held at St. Ethelburga's Church, Bishopsgate, when Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" was effectively rendered, accompanied by organ and two harps. The anthems were "On Thee each living soul" (Haydn), "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), and Beethoven's "Hallelujah." The high standard of the music, the tasteful decorations, and thoroughly hearty service, were evidently much appreciated by the large congregation. Mr. E. M. Lott presided at the organ, and Mr. Stedman directed the choir.

MR. J. A. MATTHEWS's Choral and Orchestral Society, Cheltenham, commenced its weekly practice on the 22nd ult.; and the prospectus for the coming season announces three Concerts, at which the following works will be performed: Sullivan's Oratorio, "The Martyr of Antioch"; Mendelssohn's unfinished Oratorio, "Christus"; Weber's Jubilee Cantata; Handel's Oratorios, "The Messiah" and "Samson"; and Haydn's Symphony, No. 1 of the Salomon set.

THE 152nd monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms on Friday evening, the 2nd ult., when an excellent programme was well carried out. The principal singers were Miss Jeanie Rosse, Miss Blanche Cleeve, Mr. Frank Peach, and Mr. Theodore Distin, all of whom were highly successful. The choir gave a good rendering of Bennett's "Come, live with me," Schumann's "Gipsy Life," and Stevens's "Ye spotted snakes."

THE Annual Choral Festival (in connection with the Harvest Thanksgiving) at St. Mary's, Stoke Newington, will take place on Wednesday, the 12th inst., when Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" will be sung as the anthem at the evening service, Mr. James Matthews (Choirmaster) conducting, and Mr. Fountain Meen and Mr. Henry T. Pringuer, Mus. B., acting as accompanists on the harmonium and organ respectively.

THE prospectus of the Blackheath Conservatoire of Music, with an Honorary Committee, a Ladies' Committee, and a Committee of Management, announces a long list of eminent professors in every branch of the art, the fees for instruction being so extremely moderate as to make it rather an artistic than a commercial undertaking. The Institution, situated at Alexandra Hall, Blackheath, will open on the 3rd inst.

MR. LAMBORN COCK, of Holles Street, has issued a catalogue of Signor Ciro Pinsuti's compositions, consisting of 200 songs, 30 duets, 14 trios, and 36 part-songs with English words; 56 songs, 15 duets, 14 trios, and 5 quartets, with Italian words; 30 pieces for the pianoforte; a Te Deum; and 3 operas ("Il Mercante di Venezia," "Mattia Corriano," and "Margherita").

ON All Saints' Day, Tuesday, November 1, the Special Evensong at All Saints' Church, Aden Grove, Stoke Newington, will include Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, with an augmented choir of forty voices and orchestral and organ accompaniments, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry T. Pringuer, Mus. Bac. Oxon., F.C.O., director of the choir. Mr. H. Davan Wetton will preside at the organ.

MR. STOCKLEY announces three Orchestral Subscription Concerts at the Town Hall, Birmingham, commencing on Thursday, the 27th inst. The band will be considerably enlarged, and the following artists have been already engaged: Mesdames Marie Roze, Mary Cummings, and Patey, Messrs. Joseph Maas, E. Lloyd, and Signor Foli; Solo Violin, Mr. Carrodus.

THE Harvest Festival Service at St. Saviour's, Brockley, S.E., was held on the 25th ult. The choir was large and efficient, being augmented from other churches in the neighbourhood, and the music was rendered in excellent style. The anthem was Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land." Mr. W. Hart presided at the organ, and gave a short Recital after the evening service.

THE production of Wagner's new opera, "Parsifal" is fixed to take place next year at Bayreuth as follows: the rehearsal on July 24, and the two representations, confined to subscribers, on July 26 and 28. There will be altogether fourteen performances open to the general public, on every Sunday, Tuesday, and Friday during the month of August.

MR. PAYN, who has been for many years Conductor of St. Dunstan's Choral Society, Canterbury, and also of the Dover Musical Union, announces that he has now established a Society for the advancement of good vocal music, under the title of the Sandown Musical Union. The first meeting for choral practice will take place on the 6th inst.

MR. MINTON PYNE, Organist of St. Augustine's, Pendlebury, and assistant Organist at the Cathedral, Manchester, has been appointed Organist of St. Mark's, Philadelphia. Mr. Pyne was a pupil of the late Dr. S. S. Wesley. St. Mark's is regarded by English musicians as one of the best church appointments in America.

A NEW Musical Society has been formed in Westminster for the performance of oratorios, cantatas, &c. Mr. Henry Baker (late of the Grosvenor Choral Society) is the Conductor, and Mr. Trotter (Organist of St. Stephen's) the accompanist. Haydn's "Creation" will be given on the 20th inst., with a professional band.

THE twenty-second season of the Sunderland Philharmonic Society will commence on the 17th inst., when "Elijah" will be performed; the second Concert (January 25, 1882) will be miscellaneous; and the third will comprise Gade's "Crusaders" and a miscellaneous selection. Mr. W. Rea is the Conductor.

A SPECIAL series of Sunday evening Services, fully choral, with occasional orchestral accompaniments, which commenced on the 25th ult. in the chapel of Trinity College, London (Mandeville Place, Manchester, Square), will be continued every Sunday during Michaelmas Term.

WE have much gratification in announcing that the Queen has been pleased to appoint Sir Herbert Oakeley, Professor of Music of the University of Edinburgh, to be Composer of Music to Her Majesty in Scotland.

MR. FRANK AUSTIN delivered a lecture at the Birkbeck Institute on the 7th ult., on "Ancient and Mediæval Music," illustrated by diagrams, &c. Mr. Austin was listened to with much interest by an attentive audience.

THE translation of Otto Jahn's great work on Mozart is now completed, and will be issued almost immediately by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. Herr Spitta's "Bach" is also in a forward state of progress.

REVIEWS.

The Sun-Worshippers (Les Adorateurs du Soleil). The English words adapted from the French of Casimir Delavigne by Charles Newton Scott. The music composed by A. Goring Thomas. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is one of the new works to be performed at the Norwich Musical Festival now near at hand. It has an immediate and special interest, therefore, besides that which, under any circumstances, attends the flight of a young composer into the higher regions of his art. We are concerned to know not only its indication of Mr. Goring Thomas's powers, but whether it is per se a valuable thing, and whether it will materially increase the enjoyment of an important artistic gathering.

The choice of Delavigne's little poem will hardly, we think, be contested. Cast in a dramatic form, it is at the same time lyrical in its feeling and expression. A Brahmin opens the "argument":—

Chantez, peuples heureux, chantez
Du soleil qui renaît les dons et les clartés; and the people respond with assenting chorus. Then the priest describes the splendour of the sun-god in glowing and impassioned language, and again the people answer with continued praises:—

Chantons, chantons, en lui le père des saisons.

Presently a soprano voice from the crowd gives personality to the deity, and represents him as visiting the earth in human form to protect and bless it:—

Il apprit aux bergers de divines chansons,
Que répétaient en chœur neuf vierges, ses compagnes.

This idea having been taken up in chorus, the Brahmin and people proclaim the sunrise, and the whole ends with a hymn of adoration, in which all nature is shown in an attitude of gladsome worship, from which nothing can refrain:—

Eh! comment garder le silence?
Le réveil de la terre est un hymne d'amour.

Mere sketch though the poem be, it belongs to poetry which craves for music and finds in the sister art a natural ally. Mr. Newton's English version aims to convey the spirit of the original rather than to be a mere translation; and, taking into account the difficulty of adapting English words to music intended also for use with the original French, the effort is entitled to rank as a fair success, if not something more. Mr. Newton's verse is well represented by the subjoined extract:—

With strong hand the impatience of his chariot steeds he tameth,
The fire they outbreathe the heaven's expanse inflameth;
Now, exalted lord, thou art seen.
With all her fields in flower, her mounts and foliage green,
Her ocean vast to thy welcome replying,
Nature wakes, thy bride and thy queen,
In the dew and vapour of morning lying.

The composer in setting this piece to music laboured under considerable difficulty of an unavoidable nature, inasmuch as his subject presented no contrast whatever. The key of the poem and, so to speak, its emotional pitch remain the same throughout; hence a formidable danger of monotony from which if Mr. Thomas has not entirely escaped he is hardly to be blamed. There is no orchestral introduction, unless a few bars prelude the opening solo and chorus may be thus termed. The music begins in vigorous style. It is strenuous at the outset, the first phrase of the solo running up to A by means of a scale passage, as though to convey an idea of the expression of pent-up gladness. This initial energy continues throughout the whole of the number, to the effect of which the sudden introduction of a march rhythm contributes no little. Indications thus early appear of a certain freedom of tonality; the music, nominally in G major, being seldom "at home"; while the immediately following tenor solo, with chorus, though retaining the "signature" of G major, is for the most part in G minor and A flat. The construction of this number, moreover, shows Mr. Thomas in the light of a man resolved to profit by the freedom of modern ideas. He frequently changes the character of his movement, passes at will from cantabile to recitative, and so on. This of course means that he sacrifices the advantages of regular "form" to the more minute and faithful illustration of the poetic idea. His policy stands or falls by its success, but whether it stand or fall, proofs of ability in carrying it out cannot be denied, while many of what a conservative musician would call his fragmentary passages are unquestionably charming. The tenor solo leads without break to a chorus of female voices in two and three parts, "On every season gifts how good he bestoweth." Here there is no restless flitting from key to key, and a sense of repose gives grateful contrast, while the character of the themes excites interest, if not by absolute novelty, by, at any rate, unfamiliarity. A full chorus, "To him the father great," now follows, beginning in the style of a choral with orchestral interludes, but soon developing into brief contrapuntal treatment of the theme originally given to the female voices. A soprano air, "Fairest of lands," is here reached, and after a time becomes blended with a three-part chorus of female voices; ultimately the full chorus entering to heighten the climax. In all probability this will be the favourite number of the work. It has some very pleasant features, and is wrought up to its peroration with considerable judgment. All the same we could have wished for Mr. Thomas in this instance the power of sustaining the suavity of his opening theme. The solo, after the choral entrance, strikes us as a little hard and stiff; but, on the other hand, this defect is largely redeemed by the merit of the ensemble. An impressive chorus, with tenor solo in march time, "He hath risen," next challenges and obtains our admiration, after which, passing through an andante wherein all the voices recite on a monotone till the cadence is reached, we come upon the final number and the most elaborate of all. Here again the composer makes liberal use of modulation, this time, however, in combination with a good deal of ingenious workmanship and happy device. We are not of course pronouncing decisively, from a pianoforte score, upon a work yet unheard; but there need be no hesitation in giving Mr. Thomas high praise for his lofty purpose. He has tried conscientiously to produce a genuine work of art, and our desire is that experience of the result at Norwich may stamp his labour as successful.

Ritter Album. For the Organ. Edited by Rudolph Palme.

[Magdeburg: Sulzer. London: Novello, Ewer and Co.]

On January 1 last, August Gottfried Ritter, organist of the cathedral of Magdeburg, celebrated his jubilee on the completion of his fiftieth year of professional work. Such occasions are made more of in Germany than is usually the case in this country; and among the various tributes of respect offered to him was the Album now before us. It is not, as might be inferred from the title, a collection of the favourite works of the distinguished organist himself; not a note of his own composition appears in the volume. We have here fifty-four pieces for the organ written by the most distinguished professors of the instrument in Germany, and offered as a token of admiration to Herr Ritter on the occasion of his jubilee. There is probably hardly a German organist of mark who has not furnished a contribution. The volume therefore is of no ordinary value and interest, as affording a presumably complete insight into the present position of organ music and organ-playing abroad.

The first impression produced by an examination of this Album is that of thoroughness and solidity in the workmanship. In by far the larger number of the compositions may be traced the direct influence of the school of Sebastian Bach. In saying this we do not of course imply that the modern compositions equal in contrapuntal mastery the works of the grand old Leipzig cantor, who has never been equalled, and but rarely approached. What we mean is that in this volume we find scarcely a trace of the frivolous and flippant school of organ-writing now too much in favour, even in this country, the chief features of which are the excessive abuse of the voix celeste, the voix humaine, and the tremulant, and the entire absence of anything like contrapuntal skill. We find here, it must be allowed, a certain amount of dryness in some of the compositions, though not in the majority; but we confess to preferring this to the namby-pamby prettiness of such writers as Lefebure-Wely, Batiste, and their numerous imitators.

Even did our space allow, it would be hardly profitable to speak in detail of each of the fifty-four pieces under notice, which vary in length from half a page to seven pages. A few words upon the more important compositions will be sufficient to indicate the general character of the work. The volume is divided into three sections, the first of which contains thirteen preludes, the second twenty-two arrangements of chorals, and the third nineteen fantasias, postludes, and fugues.

In the first section Herr Joseph Krejci, of Prague, has the post of honour, the opening piece in the volume being a "Jubilee Prelude" from his pen. This is good sound music, but not free from the dryness which we have already mentioned as characterising some of the numbers of the work. Joseph Rheinberger, of Munich, whose name is well-known in this country, contributes a Prelude chiefly interesting for its clever harmonic treatment of a curious chromatic subject. A charming little Andante by Heinrich Götz, of Liebenthal, deserves mention. Passing over one or two unimportant numbers, we come to a vigorous and animated Prelude by Th. Drath, of Bunzlau, on the choral "Lobe den Herrn, den mächtigen König der Ehren." Of the remainder of this section only the Andante by S. de Lange, of Rotterdam, and the Prelude by Dr. M. Brosig, of Breslau, need be named.

The arrangements of Chorals which form the second part of this work are in general of more artistic importance than the Preludes. The first of these, by Dr. W. Rust, is one of the best. Dr. Rust is the present occupier of the post of cantor at St. Thomas's Church in Leipzig, formerly held by Sebastian Bach, and the charming arrangement of the choral "Vom Himmel hoch" may be described as a reproduction in modern form of the spirit of his great predecessor. Theodor Berthold, of Dresden, contributes a capital fantasia on "Herr, wie du willst, so schick's mit mir," and Dr. Immanuel Faisst, of Stuttgart, follows with an elaborate and clever quartet for two manuals and double pedal on "An Wasserflüssen Babylon." The pieces which follow, by Julius Schneider and F. W. Markull, are both good; and the trio on "Wie schön leucht' uns der Morgenstern" is admirable, but by no means easy to play well. Theophil Forchhammer gives a very clever trio for two manuals and pedal on "Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten," in which the two manual parts are in canon in the octave at half a bar's distance, the choral being given to the pedal. The variations on an original Choral by S. de Lange of Cologne are interesting, and the canon in contrary motion on "Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr" by F. Lux, as well as the double canon (four in two) with free pedal part by A. Haupt, of Berlin, deserve special commendation. The Preludes on chorals by J. G. Herzog, Otto Türke, and Gustav Merkel are all good. In the last piece in this section H. Wehe, of Magdeburg, has ingeniously combined the Choral "Gelobet seist du Jesu Christ" with the first phrase of Handel's chorus "For unto us a Child is born."

The most elaborate pieces in the volume are those contained in the third section. The three Preludes and Fugues, by Reinhold Succo, G. Rebling and Albert Becker are all interesting. The subject of Becker's fugue much resembles that of Bach's organ fugue in C minor, found in the third volume of Griepenkerl's edition. The Double Fugue (No. 40), by Dr. W. Volckmar is also clever, though the second subject is vague in its tonality. It is rather striking that throughout the volume but little trace is to be seen of the influence on the present generation of composers of Mendelssohn's organ sonatas. The "Fest-Postludium" by Christian Fink (No. 41) is the first piece in which the style of these great works seems in any degree to be reflected; there is, however, no direct imitation, and the Postlude may well stand upon its own merits, which are not inconsiderable. Passing over several other good fugues, we find a few pieces written in a freer style. Among these one of the most striking is a "Concertstück für die Orgel im freien Styl" by Liszt-Gottschalg. This appears to be a composition by Liszt transcribed for the organ by Gottschalg. It is a pleasing and effective piece entirely for the softer stops. Another excellent number is the Adagio by C. Aug. Fischer (No. 52). The Choral "Ein Feste Burg" (No. 50) is a riddle. It bears the name of Albrecht Hänlein as composer; but in fact it is nothing whatever but a transcription, bar for bar, of the introduction to the "Huguenots," one or two passages being simplified for the organ, and Luther's choral being given in full at the end, instead of Meyerbeer's presto. Why Meyerbeer's name does not appear passes comprehension.

We have said enough to give our readers a fair idea of the contents of this album, and need only add that the pedalling is carefully indicated throughout, and that the engraving and printing of the very handsome volume leave nothing to desire. Organists will here find a large collection of pieces equally available for church or for concert use.

The Dreamer. Song. Written and composed by M. Harper. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composer of this song is evidently no novice either in music or poetry, for the melody is charmingly sympathetic with the words, the accompaniments are most appropriate throughout, and the verses express simply and unaffectedly those thoughts of bygone days which brighten the evening of our lives. The change into the tonic major on the words, "Sweet voices whisper soft and low," is a point of much interest; the dragging effect of the four crotchets in the pianoforte part contrasting well with the accompaniment of the other portions of the song. We hope again to meet with a writer whose unobtrusive talent, in a double capacity, is here unmistakably evidenced.

Sonatina. For the Pianoforte. By E. Silas. [Halifax: Pohlmann and Son.]

As we see that this Sonatina is marked "No. 1 of First Series" we may conclude that the composer intends to follow it with pieces moulded on a similar classical model. We shall be extremely glad should this be the case, for Sonatinas by good modern writers are rare; and we cannot imagine anything better suited for the cultivation of the musical taste than a composition possessing both the form and character which are essential to such works. Mr. Silas is already well-known as an earnest and thoughtful writer; and both masters and pupils should thank him for having here supplied them with so excellent a specimen of a style of piece which, good as it is, appeals not to the popular taste. The graceful principal theme of the first movement is well-contrasted with a second subject in the dominant; and the treatment of both, although simple, is extremely effective, the modulations throughout being both natural and appropriate. There is decided originality in the subject of the slow movement, which is also so excessively tuneful that it cannot fail to please, a point of much interest being the change to the tonic minor, the return to the theme in the original key acquiring additional attraction by the varied character of its accompaniment. The last movement, although perhaps scarcely so pleasing as those which precede it, is excellently written throughout; and for young players contains some useful practice, both hands being well-employed, as they should be, in passages equally essential to the general design of the movement. As we have already said, Mr. Silas will do good service by continuing a series the first number of which promises so well.

Gavotte and Musette. For the Pianoforte.

Capriccio. For the Pianoforte.

Marche Caprice. For the Pianoforte.

Composed by H. Jackson. [Brighton: J. and W. Chester.]

THESE three sketches are evidently the production of a sound musician and a skilled pianist. The Gavotte, in C major, has an attractive theme, and the accompanying Musette, in the relative minor, with a double pedal throughout, is thoroughly in the spirit of the old dance. The Capriccio fully justifies its title, and will be appreciated by those who have trained their fingers to do it justice. We especially like the tranquil second subject. The third piece on our list is a good, honest March, and need not, we think, have been qualified by the word "Caprice." The theme in G minor contrasts well with the opening subject.

Sweet love of mine. Song. Words by S. M. Samuel. Music by Frederic H. Cowen. [W. Morley, Jun.]

THIS song, we find, was sung by Miss Blanche Henri in the Comedietta "A Quiet Pipe"; and although, perhaps, apart from the situation in which it was originally placed, it loses somewhat its effect, amateurs who are seeking for a simple ballad written by an artist who has amply proved his power to produce more important works cannot do better than attempt it, especially as it is published in three different keys, to suit every register. The words are admirably adapted for drawing-room performance.

The Violinist's Portfolio. Twelve Pieces for Violin and Piano. By Siegfried Jacoby. [Forsyth Brothers.]

VIOLIN students who wish for an occasional relaxation from exercises are sometimes at a loss for easy solos to play to their friends; and here are some which may be conscientiously recommended to those who care not to devote themselves from the first to classical music. There is but little to do for the pianoforte accompanist; and the violin part is thoroughly within the reach of very moderate players. The only fault that we have to find with the pieces is that the titles of most of them are too pretentious. "Oberon," "Preciosa," "Stabat Mater," "Lucrezia Borgia," for example, would scarcely lead purchasers to imagine that nothing more than a theme from each of these works is selected.

La Morenita. Habanera, for the Pianoforte. By Charles Salaman. [Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

MR. SALAMAN has written nothing more full of character than the piece before us. After an appropriate introduction we have a spirited and melodious theme, the treatment of which is excellent throughout. The change from A minor to the tonic major is extremely effective, and the figure in the bass gives much life to the subject. Pianists will find this Habanera an attractive trifle for drawing-room performance.

FOREIGN NOTES.

A HERR PRESSEL, of Steglitz, near Berlin, is said to have discovered the complete and fully instrumented score of Nos. 8 and 9 of Mozart's "Requiem" (viz., the "Domine Jesu" and "Hostias"), in the composer's own handwriting. Both numbers are amongst those hitherto regarded as having been left by Mozart in an unfinished state, being, after his death, completed by his friend and pupil, Süssmayer. The discovery, if authenticated, would therefore add a new and interesting chapter to the history of a much-vexed question; but Herr Pressel has yet to prove that his assumption is really correct.

Preparations are being actively carried on at Bayreuth for the projected first performance next summer of Richard Wagner's new music-drama "Parsifal." Fräulein Marianne Brandt, who will be one of the interpreters of the rôle of Kundry, is said to have elicited the enthusiastic approval of the poet-composer during a recent rehearsal of her most difficult part. The following artists have been, so far, designated to take part, alternatively, in the performances next year: Parsifal, Herren Jäger, Vogl, and Winkelmann; Kundry, Mesdames Brandt, Materna, and Vogl; Amfortas, Herren Beck and Reichmann; Klingsor, Herr Hill; Gurnemanz, Herren Scaria and Siehr; Titirel, Herr Kindermann; First Maiden, Fräulein Lilli Lehmann. As to the significance in the drama itself of these characters we refer our readers to the analysis of the book of "Parsifal" contained in Vol. XIX., p. 83, of this journal.

Franz Liszt, notwithstanding numerous reports to the contrary now making the round of the Continental press, has sufficiently recovered from his recent mishap to be able to undertake his annual journey to Rome to spend the winter months there. The veteran artist has, in fact, left Weimar in order to pay a short visit to Richard Wagner at Bayreuth, whence he will proceed to the Italian capital, where he will probably celebrate his seventieth birthday on the 22nd inst.

A most valuable musical library, representing the collection of a lifetime of the late Dr. Joseph Müller, has just been partly disposed of by auction at Berlin. The catalogue, which comprises some eighteen hundred numbers, includes many rare and interesting works appertaining to musical literature, from the fifteenth century to the present time, and forms in itself a valuable guide to the student of musical history. Dr. Müller's special studies had, however, been for some years past devoted to the works of Joseph Haydn, the original editions of which he had for the greater part succeeded in obtaining, for the purpose of compiling a complete chronological and thematic index to the compositions of that master, similarly to the monumental "catalogues" of Mozart and Weber furnished by Von Köchel and F. W. Jähns respectively. The almost complete manuscript of Dr. Müller's compilation is amongst the numbers to be placed under the hammer, and will, it is hoped, be ere long published, as there is no authentic catalogue of Haydn's works as yet in existence.

Heinrich Hofmann's new opera, "Wilhelm von Oranien," will be first produced at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater and afterwards at Danzig.

Dr. Hans von Bülow, in his capacity as director of the Ducal orchestra of Meiningen, has announced that he will give six symphonic Concerts at that town during the coming season. In order to preserve a "unity of style," each evening will be devoted to the works of one master only, i.e., two to Mozart, and one respectively to Mendelssohn, Schumann, Haydn, and Brahms. The eminent and indefatigable pianist-capellmeister will also take an active share in a series of chamber-concerts to be given in the above classical Ducal residence.

The season, 1881-82, of the famous Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig commences on the 6th inst., the programme including Volkmann's "Festouverture" and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. Herr Xaver Scharwenka will be the pianist, and will play a new Concerto of his own composition on this occasion.

Herr Xaver Scharwenka's newly founded Conservatorium of Music, at Berlin, will commence its activity on the 1st of this month. We heartily wish this genial and gifted artist every success in his important undertaking.

Herr Janke, formerly director of the Symphonie-Capelle, has been nominated conductor of the famous Berlin Domchor, in the room of the late Professor Kotzolt.

E. Kretschmer's opera "Die Folkunger" is to be brought out, with an Italian version of the libretto, at the theatre La Scala of Milan, the director of which, Signor Faccio, has pronounced the work to be specially well suited for the Italian stage.

M. Emile Sauret has, after all, been unable to accept the professorship offered to him at the Cologne Conservatorium, which has now been filled by Herr Gustav Holländer, of Berlin, who will also act as concertmaster at the Gürzenich concerts.

The performances during the past month of the Paris Grand-Opéra consisted mainly of repetitions of such well-tried works as "Faust," "Robert le Diable," "Guillaume Tell," "Les Huguenots," and "Aïda." The reprise of "Il Barbiere di Siviglia" is, however, announced shortly to take place, while M. Thomas's "Françoise de Rimini" is in course of active preparation. Two new operas will be brought out ere long by the Opéra-Comique, viz., "La Taverne des Trabans," of which M. Henri Maréchal is the composer, MM. Jules Barbier and Erckmann-Chatrian being the joint authors of the libretto; and "Une Galante Aventure," by M. Guiraud, for which MM. A. Silvestre and L. Davyl have furnished the text.

The concerts of the newly founded Société des Nouveaux Concerts, under the direction of M. Lamoureux, will be inaugurated at the Théâtre du Château d'Eau of Paris on the 23rd inst., and will be continued weekly throughout the season. Both vocal and instrumental works will be included in the programme. The concerts of the Châtelet, as well as the Populaires, will recommence this month, viz., on the 2nd and 16th respectively.

M. Octave Fouque, the well-known Paris critic, who was present during the recent model performances of Wagner's operas held at Munich, writes enthusiastically to Le Ménestrel concerning the representation of "Lohengrin," concluding his interesting letter with these words: "Shall I tell you that what has struck me most in the hearing of this work is the extreme delicacy of the music? Three or four times only during the evening does the orchestra attain its maximum power, and then its outbursts are prepared for with so much art, so much profound blending of the crescendo with the general dramatic effect, that the climax of orchestral development seems to be only just sufficiently powerful. Here is a fact which will probably astonish some of your readers who are accustomed to think of Richard Wagner as a roaring, trumpet-blowing monster." As a pendant to these remarks we may quote the following from L'Art Musical, referring likewise to the recent Munich Wagner-cyclust: "The entire audience had evidently agreed not to appear bored; and this was probably the most remarkable part of the performances. There is, however, no need to enlarge in our columns upon a subject of such little interest to French readers who love music."

M. Paul Cordon, of Paris, has made an interesting discovery, consisting of a portion of the original manuscript of an opera by Grétry, entitled "Le Baron d'Otrante," which has probably never been performed. It was found among some family papers belonging to M. Cordon.

The mortal remains of Henri Vieuxtemps were interred at Verviers, his native town, on August 28, in the most solemn and impressive manner. Musical demonstrations were, of course, not wanting, and M. Radoux, the director of the Conservatoire of Liège, delivered a speech in memory of his eminent countryman, to whom a statue is to be erected in one of the public squares at Verviers.

The director of the Théâtre de la Monnaie, of Brussels, announces the production during the coming season of five operatic novelties, viz., "Jean de Nivelles" and "Hérodiade" by Massenet, "Françoise de Rimini" by Thomas, "La Statue" by Reyser, and "Etienne Marcel" by Saint-Saëns—all, it will be noticed, of French origin.

The sixth edition has just been published at Leipzig of Ed. Hanslick's popular work "On the Musically Beautiful" ("Vom Musikalisch-Schönen").

Spontini's opera, "La Vestale," and Lortzing's "Undine," will shortly be revived at the Imperial Opera House of Vienna.

A comic opera by Anton Dvorák, the Bohemian composer, entitled "Der Dickschädel" will shortly be brought out at the Ring Theatre of Vienna.

The following operas will be included in the répertoire of the San Carlo theatre at Naples during the winter season, viz., "Les Huguenots," "Mefistofele," "Lohengrin," "I Puritani," and "Lucrezia Borgia."

Signor Filippi, musical critic of the Perseveranza—the Daily News says—makes the following declaration respecting the recently discovered score of Donizetti's opera "Il Duca d'Alba": "The score of the 'Duca d'Alba' exists; we have seen it with our own eyes. . . . The score has remained for thirty years closed in a tin box, with seals, which have been broken and opened in the presence of a notary and of the contracting parties. There have been found all the acts completely instrumented, and all by the hand of Donizetti, whose character is easy to recognise. The paper is yellowish, and bears all the traces of thirty years' imprisonment. We believe that only in the fourth act the music and instrumentation of some recitatives are wanting; but the essential part is there complete, as it was in Meyerbeer's 'Africana,' where also some trifling details were missing. The fact is that, from the short examination which we made yesterday, the 'Duca d'Alba' appears to us entirely composed by Donizetti, instrumented by him, and, what is most important, fit to be represented."

Joseph Labitzky, the well-known composer of waltzes, and once the rival of the elder Johann Strauss, died August 29, at Carlsbad, where he had been for many years conductor of the orchestra. Labitzky was born in 1802 at Schönfeld, in Bohemia.

Theodore Bradsky, likewise a Bohemian by birth, and a talented composer of songs, lately a professor of the Real-Schule of Berlin, has just died.

The death is announced, at Livorno, of Pietro Cossa, one of the most gifted dramatic writers of modern Italy, whose works have been frequently illustrated by Italian composers, notably his "Cleopatra," to which Luigi Mancinelli wrote his ably scored incidental music. Cossa was born at Rome in 1833.

We have also to record the death at Vienna, at the age of sixty, of Heinrich von Proschek, a pianist and composer of great merit, and a member of the Austrian Ministry of Commerce.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

Leipzig.—At St. Thomas Church (September 10): Hymn, "Nun ist der Herr denn Licht" (Richard Müller); "Why do the heathen rage?" motett for eight voices and solos (Mendelssohn). Könnemann); Piano-forte Concerto, G minor (Saint-Saëns); Concert Allegro for Violin (Bazzini); Nocturne (Chopin); Spinning Song (Wagner-Liszt); Mazurka (Leschitzky); "Faust" Fantasia (Wieniawski); Fest-Marsch (Lassen); Vocal Soli. Rüben); Hallelujah Chorus (Handel); Fest-Overture, with final chorus (C. Rüben); Finale and Hymn, from Symphony, No 3, for solo, quartet, chorus, and orchestra, first time (Könnemann); Vocal Soli (Mozart, Wagner).

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The perusal of your interesting article in this month's MUSICAL TIMES has suggested to me that it may interest some of your readers to hear what has been done in a little town in the West of England to provide good and cheap music for the people.

* Contributions intended for this column should indicate clearly the place and date of performance, as otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Early in the present year it was determined by a few enthusiasts in Bridgwater (the writer among the number) to make an attempt, at least, to carry out some plan for the purpose, but we never dared to anticipate the success which attended our efforts. After much consultation a committee was formed consisting of representatives from almost all classes of society, and our secretary, with a liberality which has always distinguished him, offered a guarantee against any pecuniary loss. Our musical resources were limited, consisting only of a small amateur orchestra and a fairly good choral society. After much consultation we determined to give three concerts, the first two being miscellaneous, and the third consisting of one of Handel's oratorios.

The Town Council let us have the use of the Town Hall for a nominal sum, and we fixed admittances at the following figures: the whole body of the hall 3d., and the balcony (seating 200) 1s. Our first and second programmes consisted of overtures, Haydn's symphonies, gavottes, and other high-class music. Our first concert was looked forward to with fear and trembling, but needlessly so, for not only was the room crowded with the very class we wished to attract, but they evidently enjoyed the performance; there was no noise, but a good deal of intelligent and hearty applause. Our expenses for this and the following concert were about £25, and the receipts for the two about £43. This success encouraged us to make a further step with regard to our next concert. For some time we had been rehearsing "Judas Maccabæus" with our local band and chorus, but having cash in hand we determined to give the oratorio in proper style. We therefore very largely augmented our band with thoroughly good professional talent, and engaged a high-class soprano soloist, the other solos being very well sung by local amateurs. The oratorio was rendered thoroughly well, and with a finish and expression which would have done credit to far more pretentious performances. Our room was crammed from floor to ceiling, the receipts being about £30, and several hundred people were turned away from the doors. The audience must have numbered nearly 1,500, consisting very largely of brickyard labourers and artisans, many of whom stood all the evening, and were, nevertheless, more quiet and attentive than some who occupy a higher social position.

On balancing our accounts we found that our gross receipts amounted to about £73, and our expenditure two or three pounds less, which has been carried forward as a balance in hand to the next season. I ought to say that our success was mainly due to the exertions of our Conductor, Mr. Charles Lavington, and our secretary, Mr. W. L. Winterbotham.

I feel certain that in many small towns similar movements might be inaugurated which would effect incalculable good; and, trusting that this means of elevating the popular taste may be more generally used than it has been,

I remain, yours faithfully,

September 5, 1881.

ONE OF THE COMMITTEE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I should like to add a few remarks on the correspondence in your September issue, which I have just seen. Mr. Griffiths is right in supposing that the upright louver (or balance swell) is not of modern origin, for it is to be found in the old organ at St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall. Its advantage is that (unless desired by the performer) the louver cannot open and let the tone out, however great the pressure of wind within the swell box. On the other hand, its disadvantage is that the tone cannot come out so well in the upright louver as in the ordinary (or Venetian) swell shutter. I think it will be found that the "shoe" to which Mr. Griffiths alludes is the best for certain effects, and the swell pedal for others. I would suggest a new idea, which might meet the views of differing organists in the matter. In large organs let there be two sets of shutters, the one in the front, and the other at the back of the swell box. Let the front set of shutters be a Venetian swell acted on by a pedal as at present used, and let the back set of shutters be the upright louver, acted on by a shoe pedal as alluded to by Mr. Griffiths. Or the shoe pedal may be used first at the beginning of a crescendo, followed by the Venetian swell, or simply to regulate the degree of softness of the swell prior to a crescendo made by the Venetian swell. Mr. Casson is in the right in insisting that all the pedals should be equally within reach of the performer.

As the organist sits at the instrument, I think that D, rather than C, would be in the centre, but as a player is easily able to extend his right hand beyond the required limits of the keyboard, there is not the same necessity for his being in the centre of the keyboard as of the pedal-board. As regards fixing the swell pedal, I prefer a well-constructed notch to a swinging-rod, on account of the greater simplicity of the former. With regard to No. 5—that the fronts of the pedal sharps form an arc or circle—this is wise, because an organist will find it easier to extend apart his hands in a straight line than to do so with his feet. At the Exhibition of 1851 a piano was exhibited having a circular fronted keyboard. I have played on it, but did not like it, and regard it as useless except as a curiosity.

SCROPE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Referring to Mr. Griffiths's recommendation of vertical swell-shutters, I beg to say that this principle of construction had a fair trial by some good builders twenty years ago, and was discarded. A certain amount of resistance to the foot is necessary to the control of the swell pedal, which, in the case of horizontal shutters, can be provided and proportioned to a nicety by dead weight, but with vertical shutters must be supplied by a spring, which is also necessary to insure their shutting closely. But springs, of whatever construction, make it difficult to open the swell without a jerk, and therefore militate against that perfect control of the swell pedal, which should be as artistic as the choice of stops. If the action connected with the pedal is sufficiently strong to prevent springing, horizontal shutters can be controlled to the sixteenth of an inch, and all that is wanted is delicacy of foot on the part of the performer. I regret to think that the reckless and incessant use of the swell pedal is becoming an increasing blot on the organ-playing of this country. Those of your readers who have heard Mr. R. S. Burton's soft voluntaries after the Nicene Creed in the Leeds Parish Church—familiar selections from the vocal or instrumental works of the great masters—will bear me out in saying that expression and taste can find their very highest exemplification in organ-playing without the use of the swell pedal at all.—I am, sir, your obedient servant,

HENRY GREEVES.

EDWARD D. WRIGHT.—It is not within our province to recommend any particular class, but it is undoubtedly good to join one of established reputation.

F. S. ORAM.—The first beat in 3-4 time should be straight down.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ARMLEY.—Dr. Armes's sacred Cantata, St. John the Evangelist, was performed in St. Bartholomew's Church on the anniversary of the Feast of Dedication. After the third collect the oratorio was taken in the place of the anthem, the first four parts, viz., "The Call," "At the Supper," "By the Cross," and "At the Sepulchre," preceding the powerful address delivered by the Rev. A. H. Wilkinson, Vicar of Kirkstall, who strongly advocated the use of oratorios in the most suitable of all places, viz., the church. While the collection of the offertory was being made the Old Hundredth Psalm was given with splendid effect. The solos in St. John the Evangelist were taken, with one exception—Mr. W. H. Grice, of Durham—by members of the choir, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably. Mr. W. Pickergill, the Choirmaster, conducted; and Mr. Thomas Cawthra, Organist of the church, played the accompaniments.

BIRKENHEAD.—On Friday, the 6th ult., the band of the Coldstream Guards gave a Concert in the Theatre Royal. There was a crowded attendance, including the Mayor, D. MacIver, Esq., M.P. The vocalists were Madame Billinie Porter and Mr. R. E. C. Batty, both of whom were well received. The band, under the direction of Mr. C. Thomas, played with much precision and skill.—Mr. E. Gunton, A.R.A.M., after thirty-four years' services as Organist and Choirmaster of St. John's Church, having recently resigned his appointment, has been presented with a handsome silver salver by the clergy, wardens, choir, and congregation. The presentation was made in the presence of the subscribers, by the Rev. W. R. Jolley, Vicar, who accompanied the gift with an appropriate speech.

BOLTON ABBEY.—On Sunday, August 23, special Services were held in the Abbey. The vocal portions of the evening service were rendered by the Bolton Abbey Choir, which has attained great excellence under the superintendence of Miss Petyt, the Abbey Organist. At intervals during the service a selection of organ music was played by Dr. Spark, which was highly appreciated by an attentive congregation. The Abbey was crowded to excess, and the offertory, amounting to £27, has been added to the organ fund.

BRAMPTON, HUNTINGDON.—On the 14th ult. a Concert was given by some amateurs, with the professional aid of Madame Talbot-Cherer, Mr. Holberry Hagyard, and Mr. Scott. The programme included Bennett's unaccompanied quartet, "God is a Spirit," which was well rendered; and E. Silas's part-song, "Softly fall the shades." The solos were effectively rendered by Madame Cherer and Miss James, Mr. Hagyard and Mr. Scott.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—On the 13th ult. a Promenade Concert was given in the Corn Exchange by the St. Edmunds Glee Club and the band of the 3rd Suffolk battalion, with the Misses Challis, Major, and Gould, and Messrs. H. Crews and Frederic Pattle as soloists. The entire programme was executed in a very efficient manner, under the conductorship of Mr. T. B. Richardson and Herr Krill. Mr. G. Hooper, A.R.A.M., accompanied.

EASTBOURNE.—An excellent Concert was given by Mr. Julian Adams on the 10th ult., in the Floral Hall. The programme opened with Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, which was performed by the orchestra with faultless precision. Mdlle. Adelina Dincli, a violin soloist, played one of De Beriot's compositions with much facility and expression. The vocalists were Miss Emily Laing and Madame Patey, who was accorded a genuine welcome. The second part included the overture to Wagner's opera Rienzi, which, like the other instrumental items on the programme, was performed with marked accuracy. A word of praise is due to Mr. Austin for the artistic manner in which he accompanied the various songs.

FALMOUTH.—On Thursday, the 15th ult., a Concert was given at the Drill Hall by Miss Clara Dowle, assisted by Mrs. F. Duckham, Miss Lemin, Miss Addie Duckham, and Messrs. Johns, Hallett, Wilmer, and Bishop. Miss Dowle was highly successful, being encored in all her songs. The other artists were also well received, especially Miss Addie Duckham (a very youthful pianist) who contributed two solos.

FOLKESTONE.—On Thursday, the 8th ult., the Dedication Services were held at the Parish Church, afternoon and evening. At the evening service, the choir, which was supplemented by members of neighbouring choirs, gave an excellent rendering of Spohr's Cantata, God, Thou art great. Mr. Dugard, Organist and Choirmaster, conducted; and Miss Daly presided at the organ. There was a large congregation, and the offertory was for the restoration of the chancel walls.

GALWAY.—A very successful and high-class amateur Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms, on Tuesday, August 30, as a farewell to Mr. Jasper J. O'Shanessy, who resigns his position as Organist and Choirmaster to the Cathedral Church of St. Nicholas, on his appointment as Organist to Trinity Church, Dublin. The Concert was largely attended, Mr. O'Shanessy having held a foremost position in the province of Connaught as an accomplished organ-player, and his choral training being eminently successful and highly appreciated. He carries with him the best wishes of the many admirers of his talents and of his personal worth.

GREYSTONES, CO. WICKLOW.—A successful amateur Concert was given on Monday, August 29. The programme was extremely varied, and included an instrumental quintet, a trio for violin, violoncello, and piano by Weber, flute and violoncello solos, &c.

GWENAP.—A very interesting Band Contest recently took place, the prizes being £8, £4, £2, and £1. The first prize was awarded to the Truro string band, the second to the Penzance season band, the third to the Charlestown band, and the fourth to the St. Just Rifles. The selections were exceedingly well performed.

LEEDS.—On August 31, and three following days, the Armley Orchestral Band (Conductor, Mr. P. A. Strickland) performed an excellent selection of music in the Large Pavilion at Armley Grove House, in aid of the new Church of St. Mary's, New Wortley, a noticeable feature being an overture (first time of performance) composed by the Conductor, which was highly successful. Although the attendance was not large, a handsome sum was realised.

LEWISHAM.—The splendid organ built by Messrs. Walker and Son for St. Stephen's Church, which has been undergoing repairs, was completed for service on Sunday, the 11th ult. A new "vox humana" stop has been inserted, the beauty of which was specially shown in a voluntary composed by Mr. Humphrey Stark, one of three played in the evening by Mr. Warwick Jordan, the Organist and director of the choir. The services have been sung without any accompaniment while the organ has been under repair, not even the anthems being omitted, which speaks well for the ability of the members and for their training.

MARGATE.—Mr. F. J. Read, F.C.O., Mus. Bac., Oxon., Organist of Christ Church, Reading, gave an Organ Recital at the Parish Church on the 23rd ult. The programme was selected from the works of Handel, Mozart, Bach, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Merkel, and Smart.

MELBOURNE.—The Metropolitan Liedertafel, which has on its roll nearly 800 subscribing members, and may justly be termed the leading musical society of Australia, gave its sixty-eighth Concert in the Melbourne Exhibition Building on July 4. There was an immense attendance, nearly 6,000 persons being present. Amongst the invited guests were His Excellency the Marquis of Normanby (the Governor of the Colony) and the Marchioness of Normanby, Rear-Admiral the Earl of Clanwilliam, and the Captains and Officers of the Detached Squadron. Included in the latter were the Princes Albert Victor and George of Wales, Prince Louis of Battenberg, and Lord Charles Scott. The presence of so many distinguished visitors, and the rule of the society that every one attending its concerts must appear in full evening dress, rendered the assemblage one of the most brilliant ever seen in Melbourne. The large hall was elaborately decorated with flags of all nations, while the front of the orchestra steps and the base of the organ were embowered in a mass of evergreens and tree-ferns interspersed with statuary; the whole of the arrangements reflecting the utmost credit on the committee. The musical Conductor of the society, Mr. Julius Herz, had under his control a powerful orchestra of eighty performers, and the full bands of H.M.S. "Inconstant" and "Bacchante," as well as the Liedertafel Choir, which consists of male voices only, and numbers about eighty-five singers. The programme was exceedingly attractive, and contained several high-class compositions. The efforts of both Signora Link and Madame Boema were well received and highly effective, and the orchestral numbers were done full justice to by the excellent band; but the part-singing of the Liedertafel was without doubt the feature of the Concert, the unaccompanied songs especially being finely rendered. Amongst the best may be mentioned "When evening's twilight," by Hatton, and the "Fatinitza" March.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—A Special Congress Service will be held at St. Andrew's Church on Tuesday evening, the 4th inst. The ordinary service will be shortened and without a sermon, the special feature being the singing of Dr. Armes's new Church Oratorio, St. John the Evangelist. The object of the Service is the advancement of the Church oratorio movement, which has been fostered in this church for the past four years. The Rev. T. Rogers, M.A., Precentor of Durham Cathedral, has kindly consented to conduct; and the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, M.A. (Dr. Armes's coadjutor in the work), has signified his intention of being present and assisting at the Service. The Organist of the church, Mr. Albion Alderson, will preside at the organ. The choir is expected to number at least 120 voices.

NEWTOWN.—Two special Cathedral Services were held in the Parish Church on the 7th ult., at the reopening of the organ after considerable improvements by Mr. Willis, London, the builder of the instrument. At the morning Service, E. J. Hopkins's Te Deum (in F); anthems, "O where shall wisdom be found?" (Boyce); "Rejoice in the Lord" (Purcell); Offertory Sentence by Calkin—in the evening, "The Wilderness" (Goss); Cantate in D (Attwood); "O give thanks" (Purcell); recitative, air, and quartet, "Ye people" and "Cast thy burden" (Elijah); recitative, "In splendour bright," and chorus, "The heavens are telling" (Creation); and Tallis's five-part responses were performed. The solo parts were rendered most effectively by Mr. J. Hodges, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. T. Kempton, from St. Paul's Cathedral, London, and four boys from Mr. Stedman's choir. Great credit is due to the Organist and choir for the satisfactory manner in which the music was performed, and to Mr. E. Owen, the indefatigable secretary, for his valuable services. The sermon in the morning was preached by Bishop Alford, and in the evening by the Rev. C. H. Hylton Stewart, M.A., Precentor of Chester Cathedral, who gave an excellent discourse.

NORTH BERWICK, N.B.—Mr. Frank Bates, Mus. Bac., brought his series of Organ Recitals to a close on Monday, August 29. During the season Mr. Bates has played Bach's Fugues in G minor, G major and D minor, Handel's sixth Organ Concerto, Mendelssohn's second Organ Sonata, and selections from the most eminent writers, both ancient and modern. The Recitals have been well attended by visitors who reside at North Berwick during the summer months.

OLDHAM.—On Thursday evening, the 1st ult., the Oldham United String Band gave a Concert in the Co-operative Hall. The soloists were Miss Mercer, Messrs. Knight and Hart; solo violinist, Mr. A. Barratt; pianist, Mr. Fielding. The band also gave selections.—On Wednesday evening, the 7th ult., the third popular Concert was given in the Henshaw Street Coffee Tavern, to a large audience. Messrs. De Villiers, Norbury, Springthorpe, Ammon, Lord, Frost, and Master Cribbs were the soloists, assisted by the A.Y.L.I. Glee Party. A good programme was provided. Mr. J. Greaves accompanied.—On Tuesday evening, the 20th ult., the Independent Order of Good Templars (Oldham Branch) gave a Concert in the Henshaw Street Coffee Tavern. Several amateurs gave their services, assisted by the Eiferprise Glee Party, and an excellent programme was well executed. Mr. J. Greaves accompanied.

PENZANCE.—Mr. and Mrs. Nunn's Matinée Musicale d'Invitation, on Wednesday, the 7th ult., in St. John's Hall, was a brilliant success. The programme embraced selections from compositions by Mozart, Beethoven, Haydn, &c. There were many instrumental performances, especially for violins and violoncellos, and these, without exception, were rendered with much refinement and precision. Mendelssohn's Motet for female voices, "O Lord, Thou hast searched me out," was admirably sung. As an evidence of Mr. and Mrs. Nunn's skill and success in teaching, the Matinée was most gratifying.

PLYMOUTH.—At the St. Erth Parish Church special Services were held on Thursday, the 1st ult., to inaugurate a new organ, an effective instrument built by Sweetland, of Bath. In addition to early celebrations of the Holy Communion, there was a Te Deum in the afternoon, followed by a sermon and an Organ Recital. The preacher was the Rev. F. Gurney, Vicar of St. James's, Plymouth. The Recital by Mr. J. H. Nunn, of Penzance, effectively exhibited the capacity of the instrument; and Mrs. Nunn sang "O rest in the Lord" with great feeling

At the evening service Sir John Goss's Anthem, "O taste and see," was sung. All the music was very creditably performed. A sermon of remarkable force and earnestness was preached by the Rev. W. H. Hitchcock, Vicar of St. John's, Torquay.—The new organ in St. Day Wesleyan Chapel, recently erected by Messrs. Hele and Co., of Plymouth, was formally opened on the 6th ult. The musical programme was well executed by Mr. R. H. Heath, Organist of Redruth, Mrs. Everett, the Misses Treglown and Salter, Messrs. Everett, Still, and Rowe. The instrument, both in tone and quality, reflects great credit on the builders, and under the manipulation of Mr. Heath the effect of the various stops was well exhibited.

SALISBURY.—Mr. Alfred Foley gave his first annual Concert at the Assembly Rooms on Thursday, the 22nd ult., before a large and fashionable audience. The vocalists were Miss Marie Cope, Miss Jeanie Rosse, and Mr. John M. Hayden. Solo violoncello, Mr. J. Adolphe Brouil; solo violin, Mr. Alfred Foley; pianoforte, Mrs. F. Alexander; organ, Mr. Augustus Aylward. Miss Jeanie Rosse's fine contralto voice was much admired, and Mr. Brouil was loudly applauded for the rendering of his solos.

SHEPLEY.—On Saturday, August 27, an Organ Recital was given in St. Paul's Church by Mr. T. Berry, Organist of Trinity Church, Glasgow. Two anthems and a chorus were sung by the choir, assisted by singers from neighbouring villages. There was a large congregation. The programme comprised Handel's Concerto in B flat; Theme with Variations, Op. 8 (Beethoven); Andante from the Symphony in E flat (Mozart); Méditation (Gulmanti); Fugue in G (Krebs); Andante from the quartet in F (Haydn); Melody (Salome); and Finale (Widor); all of which were given with excellent taste.

SHERBORNE.—During the ensuing season the Sherborne Musical Union will perform the Cantata Silvia, composed by the Conductor, Mr. Louis N. Parker; and Spohr's Last Judgment. The King's School Musical Society (under the same Conductor) will sing one of Mendelssohn's Psalms, Romberg's Lay of the Bell, and Mendelssohn's Oratorio Elijah.

SHREWSBURY.—Mr. Albert E. Hall (Organist at the Catholic Cathedral) gave an evening Concert in St. Joseph's Schoolroom on Wednesday evening, the 14th ult. There was a numerous audience, and a first-class programme was efficiently rendered, the performers being entirely local amateurs. Mr. Hall accompanied in a very able manner.

TICKHILL.—An Organ Recital was given in the church on the 8th ult., under the patronage of the Right Hon. the Earl and Countess of Scarborough. Lord and Lady Galway, and the clergy and gentry of the neighbourhood. Dr. Spark, Organist of the Leeds Town Hall, presided at the organ. The programme was well-selected and admirably rendered. Between the first and second parts, "Be thou faithful" and a chorus from St. Paul were carefully sung, the solo being taken by Mr. Dixon, the Choirmaster. The concluding piece was a Concertstück composed for the Leeds Musical Festival by Dr. Wm. Spark. The Recital was most successful.

UXBRIDGE.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held at the Parish Church on Sunday, the 11th ult. The special psalms were chanted. In the morning the Te Deum and Benedictus were sung to Dykes in F. At the evening Service Dr. Garrett's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were well rendered. Dr. Stainer's Anthem, "Ye shall dwell in the land," was effectively sung by the choir at both services. The concluding voluntaries (played by Mr. Walsh, Organist of the Parish Church) were an Offertoire (Batiste), a Postlude in D (Henry Smart), and an Allegretto grazioso (Berthold Tours).

King, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's Church, Stamford Brook, W.—Mr. Frank Wrigley, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Philip's Church, Griffin, Blackburn.—Mr. T. ORGAN PEDALS TO PIANOFORTES

TO ORGAN STUDENTS AND ORGANISTS

RUMMENS'S

Entirely new method of attachment (patented) overcomes all the objections hitherto urged. Some of its advantages are: The note is always struck, even in the most legato style of playing; the impact also is invariable, whether the pedalling be light or heavy, therefore absolute immunity from any extra wear and tear whatever is guaranteed, so that the most choice instruments may now be fitted with the new attachment without the slightest fear of injury thereto. The pedals have full depth of touch.

THE BRIDE

A CANTATA

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF R. HAMERLING

AND SET TO MUSIC BY

A. C. MACKENZIE.

Op. 25.

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

"The Cantata begins with a short instrumental introduction in the key of F minor. The movements suggest the rhythm of a solemn march, and the orchestration, with its effective use of the trombone, tends to support that character. We are thus prepared for tragic events that are to follow, in spite of the gentle and joyous strains of the opening chorus, in which a lady is serenaded on the eve of her wedding day: 'Sweet lady, thy lover awaits thee,' the singers are heard to chant to a melody which might have been written by Mendelssohn in his happiest mood. . . . The next number is a Wedding March and Chorus, the most popular, but by no means the best section of the score. Infinitely more worthy of distinction, and, indeed, very fine, was the final chorus, in which we are informed that, for reasons unknown, the bride, instead of being at the altar, 'lies 'neath the tide, down, down in the sea's chilly bosom.' Mr. Mackenzie's chorus is essentially founded on the prelude, other melodic materials also being reintroduced with excellent effect. From a musical point of view this piece is very interesting, but still more remarkable is the intensity of feeling sustained throughout."—Times.

"Mr. Mackenzie scores for the orchestra like one to whom all its resources are familiar. He lays on colour deftly, and, better than deftly, with truth, leaving, indeed, hardly anything to be desired. . . . Taking the work as a whole, I am bound to see in it not only a praiseworthy achievement, but an earnest of far better things to come. . . . The music (of the duet) shows a power of intense and, at the same time, beautiful expression, such as may ultimately expand into something deserving special homage."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Mackenzie's instrumentation is singularly graceful and effective, he has an unflinching fount of melody, and he writes for the voices with skill and knowledge. . . . The chorus, 'Sweet lady, thy lover awaits thee,' is full of delicacy and charm, a pleasing figure pervading the accompaniment (principally in the strings), and the entire number being wrought out with an absence of effort, though there is variety in abundance. . . . In a work of this character a march of some sort is a sine quâ non, and the composer has provided a bright, animated, and tuneful bridal chorus, tempo di marcia, 'Now dawneth the bright wedding morning.' . . . There is revealed in the Cantata so much power, and such a command over the means of musical expression, that 'The Bride' will endure, not only for its own sake, but as an earnest of the able work which we may confidently look forward to from the same pen. . . . The brightly scored and spirited bridal march and chorus were immensely encored."—Standard.

"The bright chorus, 'Sweet lady,' is melodious and graceful in the vocal portion, and comprises some characteristic orchestral writing, with delicate and fanciful varieties of instrumental effects. The love duet which follows, 'Why droops thy head?' is graceful and expressive, and is especially well written for vocal effect, in the contrasts and combinations of the voices. This duet—without plagiarism—is strongly reminiscent of the style of Gounod, both in its melodic structure and the delicate orchestral surroundings. . . . The music is evidently the production of genuine thought and skilful workmanship."—Daily News.

HAVE BEEN ADJUDGED THE

GOLD MEDAL

FOR UPRIGHT IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

MELBOURNE, March, 1881.

We, the undersigned Jurors for Musical Instruments at the Melbourne International Exhibition, have no hesitation in certifying that Messrs. Challen & Son, of London, have obtained the highest number of points for Cottage Pianos, in the British Court.

The award was based on the excellence of the quality, combined with the cheapness and solidity of the instruments exhibited, which we consider to be well adapted to the requirements of the Colonies.

PRIZE MEDALS—1851, 1855, 1862, 1865, 1866, 1872, 1875, 1877, 1879, AND AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION, 1878,

the highest distinction was conferred upon Messrs. HOPKINSON by the Musical Jurors—viz., the only Gold Medal awarded to any British Manufacturer.

MESSRS. HOPKINSON, therefore, feel fairly entitled to repeat the opinions expressed in the year 1845, by the most celebrated Pianists and Musicians then living—viz., THALBERG, Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, Madame DULCKEN, Sir HENRY BISHOP, and others, as still being correct—that their Pianofortes are "unsurpassed in tone and touch by those of any other maker."

Since these opinions were expressed, the leading musical judges in all parts of the world have confirmed them.

Messrs. H. having also, after carefully conducted experiments, introduced improvements of great value, with confidence invite the Trade, Professors, and the Musical Public, specially to inspect and judge of their Metal-framed Grand and Cottage Pianofortes, which they believe to deserve the eulogium passed upon them by the President of the Musical Jurors at Paris, 1878, that—

"THEY ARE FAULTLESS."

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

NOVEMBER 1, 1881.

LISZT'S SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY,

OCTOBER 22.

"AND is that enough to be considered a life's vocation?" once exclaimed the head-master of a grammar-school when, upon his inquiry why Liszt had been induced to take holy orders, he was told that such a step was necessary to enable him to become maestro di cappella to the Pope, and thus to fulfil, from out the Sistine Chapel, his own life's mission—the regeneration of Catholic Church music. The answer elicited by the above fresh query: "Certainly, and especially at the present moment, perhaps, a more important one than the regeneration of the school," caused the pedagogue to spin round on his heel and take his departure. Without wishing to enter here upon the field of polemics, we are of opinion that the conversation just recorded characterises very forcibly the indifference towards the question at issue exhibited, even at the present day, by a large body of our cultured men who moreover exercise a directing influence upon the progress of this "culture" itself.

How, we may ask, is it possible for any thinking man, albeit professedly an outsider, to entertain any doubt as to the fact that the only binding influence which—apart from the common instincts operating at moments of all-compelling necessity—holds together and shapes the masses of the people is to be looked for in their ideal conceptions which, in however crippled a form, are still embodied most intensely and convincingly in religion; and that, therefore, the Church, as long as it exists, will be to the vastly preponderating majority of men the only fountain from whence they can derive such ideal conceptions which will lift them above the narrow sphere of their material self and cause them to believe in the community of mankind and the duty of every individual towards it? Where exists the substitute for such an absolutely indispensable institution which, founded upon an ideal basis accepted by all, could attract and elevate the masses who, without this cementing influence, would dissolve into atoms? That it is to be found in the State or in modern culture, however highly developed both may be, can only be asserted by the most shortsighted of observers; and it was a similar conviction which, after the craze of "enlightenment" of the past century, and still more after the terrible period of revolution and war which followed it, sweeping away all the existing landmarks, had directed again all the more seriously reflecting minds upon the sole representative institution of things ideal, viz., upon religion, upon the Church. "La religion est le véritable ciment des édifices sociaux. Plus les pierres sont nombreuses et menues, plus le ciment doit être fort pour les unir," wrote George Sand in the fourth decade of our century in the "Lettres d'un Voyageur." It is needless here to add that any excesses committed by the Catholic Church against the authority of the State are as little to be approved of as was the whilom arrogant self-assertion of Protestant orthodoxy in opposition to the general mental strivings and culture of the time. To the truly educated mind, the Church—i.e., the religious worship of both Catholic and Protestant—remains still intact; and the highest aim can only be to develop this worship according to the spirit of our religious profession, and to secure thereby its continued ideal influence. Church and State, from this point of view, would be in the position of Mime and Alberich contending for the possession of the ring; "which signifies the world's inheritance and power," while Siegfried holds it in his hand. And as in the Protestant Church it is most rightly sought to infuse into the service more and more such depth of meaning as would attract and satisfy the ideal requirements of the generality, so also there are not wanting in the Catholic community—as far as an outsider may be able to judge—strivings, earnest and enthusiastic, far removed from the war-tumult of the ruling powers and factions of the Church, aiming at the restitution to the latter of its old universality of influence by reviving something of the grand spirit of former ages, by which modern mankind has been moulded. And as it is by no means a mere accident if from the same spirit of modern mankind there has likewise proceeded that art which has enabled it to express in a new language the infinity of that spirit, the depth and the intensity of its emotions—so it is also by no accident that music must, in the first place, be called a daughter of the Church and its service; so there have been voices raised of old and to this present day in favour of the readmission into the Church of this daughter, who has meanwhile become so unspeakably rich and, above all, so independent, so that she might occupy her rightful place there with all her newly developed attributes.

The great difficulty as regards the Protestant form of worship lies in the fact of its not easily admitting our art to a full share in the service itself, thereby rendering its introduction liable to assume the character of a sacred concert, rather than of an integral part of the worship—a difficulty which, however real, is not by any means an insurmountable one. In the Catholic Church, on the other hand, music forms an essential element—in a certain sense, indeed, the most potent element of the service. For the "Transubstantiation," which is merely indicated by the priest in the elevation of the Host, attains its ideal consummation in the musical strains which at this period of the High Mass, no matter how insignificant the church at which it be performed, fills the hearts of the devoutly kneeling congregation with holy reverence and awe. And if it may be said that without this redirection of the individual upon the eternal foundations of existence, as represented in the Transubstantiation, we should most certainly not possess that art whose most essential qualities have rendered it the exponent of this cosmogony; so it may be asserted, with equal truth, that the Catholic worship, culminating as it does in the Mass, will not for any length of time maintain its vital power intact without the aid of its daughter, Music, who in turn had become its foster-mother, or at all events may be called upon in this capacity at any time.

How infinitely, therefore, was it to be regretted when, with the predominant influence of a party, which has increased immoderately the glittering pomp of the Church, not disdaining to admit into it even theatrical elements, these latter—i.e., the theatrical and superficial excrescences—had found their way also into the music of the service. There is a Jesuitical style recognisable in music; and he whose taste has been formed upon the eternally true and classical in our art will discern even in Beethoven's Grand Mass, as well as in Mozart's Requiem, the fact that since the seventeenth century opera has invaded the Church, and that the strangely fastidious impersonifications of the saints of that time are likewise reflected in the character of the Church music. Such was the case as much in Germany as in the countries inhabited by Latin races, and it is well known to any one who has ever visited Italy that one may hear the latest operatic airs resounding from the organ even in the majestic dome of St. Peter's, in Rome. From Mozart to Mendelssohn there has been but one voice of complaint among musicians as to this incongruity; and great has been the number of gifted authors, Goethe at their head, who have returned from Italy full of regret at the existing state of things, which they looked upon as a reproach to the Church, and a matter of sorrow as affecting a people standing so much in need of religious elevation.

He to whom this inner consciousness of a much-wanted reform, on a modern basis, had become a second nature, unpremeditated and yet deliberately aimed at in all his doings, is the subject of this article—Franz Liszt. In the capacity in which we have thus described him, the artist was in fact merely carrying out the fundamental principles of his life. Fortunately, sufficient authentic information exists on this point, and there is no need to regard either as a miracle or as a mere accident the appearance of Liszt as a reformer of the musical art of his Church: it was a matter which touched the very foundations of his life, and he threw his heart and soul into it accordingly. "From early youth Franz had a natural bias for religious contemplation, and his intense love for his art was pervaded by a piety which had all the sincerity of his age." These words occur in the diary of the father, who died when Liszt had but reached his sixteenth year. The latter himself writes in 1857 about the "humble little church" of his Hungarian home "where as a child I have prayed with so much fervent devotion." Then already he believed himself to be called into the service of the Church, but the earnest persuasions of both his parents prevailed upon him in following entirely the paths of his art. Yet, the source from which we have derived these early notes on Liszt's character, viz., the Gazette Musicale de Paris of 1834, adds significantly: "His piety was, however, perfectly rational, admitting of a certain freedom of ideas and conduct; it was not, as with the majority of fanatics, rigid, uncompromising, dogmatic, and brutal; but perfectly sincere instead, far more reasonable, and at the same time proceeding from the Catholic point of view." In the same manner, even the frivolous poet Heine writes of him from Paris, about the year 1840, that he had great aptitude for religious speculation, mentioning more particularly his "unquenchable thirst after light and Godhead, which bears witness to his sense for the divine and the religious." The foregoing allusions sufficiently establish the basis for all that followed. The biographical sketch of our composer's youth, however, tells us further that he had determined to write religious music, "but whereas the music bearing that name in our time appeared to him out of keeping with the character generally attributed to it by the feelings of men, the idea forced itself upon his mind to create a religious music." When, therefore, after his prolonged wanderings, he at last settled down in order to compose in reality—for, as our French report justly says, Liszt's pianoforte-playing was "no mechanical exercise, but essentially a composition, a veritable creation of art"—when he concentrated his soul upon these creations of his entire inner experience (as these his former reproductions may well be called), in order to fix them as artistic productions, then the idea of his youthful days soon became a reality, and already at a time which would seem almost a generation removed from ours, an important part of his compositions for the Church had sprung into existence.

The "festlich hohe Gruss" of the "Hungarian Coronation Mass," or the solemn stateliness of the music written for the consecration of the cathedral at Gran, bear witness to the fact that here we have not merely another repetition of an oft-repeated theme of which the surface has been touched only, but a return to the very heart of the subject. It was a case of offering the daily bread, so to speak, where, alas! the hungry multitude had hitherto but too frequently been tendered a stone. Even a minor work like the "Missa Choralis" would show that the desire of his youth had been realised, and that a truly religious music for the Catholic worship of our time had been created. This Mass was first produced in 1877, at Vienna, by the Cæcilienverein. In it, all that may be called traditionally mass-like in regard to the Church music of the last centuries has disappeared; and if this unadorned song of human voices can be likened to the style of a Palestrina, it contains, nevertheless, no reminiscence of that master, but all is original, new, modern, i.e., in accordance with our own nearest feelings. The most profane listener must feel that an art such as this would not only embellish and enliven the religious service, but reform it after the spirit which is latent in it: just as Palestrina had idealised and preserved to us the grand religious aspirations of a former epoch.

But Liszt did not rest satisfied with having done so much; he also directed his efforts practically towards the purification and renovation of the music of his Church. The same impulse which prompted him to resign his highly beneficial artistic activity at Weimar—foreshadowing the days of Munich and Bayreuth—likewise determined him to take up his residence in Rome. To enable him to exercise his influence in the cause he had at heart it was imperative that he should become musical director to the Pope. As such he had, according to ancient law, first of all to abandon the worldly state—Palestrina having been the last of the musical directors at the Sistine Chapel not in priestly orders, he being married, and his inimitable art alone sustaining him in the position he occupied. Thus Liszt became a priest. But why did he not remain in Rome? it will be asked. "I was disappointed in consequence of the want of education amongst the cardinals," he tells us himself regarding this point, and referring more especially to the musical tastes of an ecclesiastical body the great majority of whose members are Italians. Liszt, moreover, felt that the desired regeneration of music could, after all, only proceed from its heart's centre, from Germany. He thus returned there and founded, first at Regensburg and then at Eichstätt, model seminaries for the propagation of high-class and truly religious Church music. May they flourish, even though generations should have to pass away before their efforts can be fully appreciated! They are furnishing anew an elementary food for the soul for which there is no real substitute, and which from year to year we stand in greater need of. As regards Liszt's share in bringing about these results, we recognise that here, as in all his doings and strivings, the man and the artist are identical, forming a complete personality, compact and firmly established inwardly, and therefore truly noble and royally munificent in its outward manifestations.

CRITICAL EXCURSIONS.

JOSEPH RUBINSTEIN has also many unpleasant things to say about Schumann's pianoforte style. To be sure it is not a model style, but it does not deserve all the abuse it gets. Our critic as usual exaggerates, and applies to the whole of the master's works what only can be said of a portion. For instance, if heaviness of style is complained of, look at the "Carnaval"! What lightness, grace, and transparency! And then would it not be advisable to take into consideration the contents as well as the form of those pieces which exhibit vagueness and technically awkward or even impracticable construction? If Schumann wanted vagueness why does Joseph Rubinstein insist on playing it as the composer did not wish it to be played, and then say it is "vulgar"? Schumann's style becomes often intricate, indistinct, and sometimes lumpish, especially when his feelings overpower him. But I would remind the disparager of Schumann that there is in his style also much that is beautiful and a real gain to the musical language. For although it is not effective in the virtuosic sense of the word, it is so as an interpreter of feelings. The contents of Schumann's pianoforte works could not for the most part be adequately expressed by more effective means. Nor should everything which falls under the head, for instance, of vagueness be condemned. Mystery is recognised as a legitimate element of the pictorial art—think only of Turner! Why should the musical art forego this powerful means of moving the feelings? It is really a pity that the virtuosi do not play the master's pianoforte works oftener at concerts. How rarely do we hear the "Kreisleriana," most of the "Novelletten," the "Fantasia," &c.! But Schumann's style, alas, is not effective enough for our by no means self-sacrificing virtuosi.

And now let us make ourselves a little more fully acquainted with Joseph Rubinstein's opinions of our composer. "Schumann's programmes, i.e., his superscriptions," he says, "consist for the most part of a single and moreover so indefinite a word that such a title as the 'Humoreske,' or 'Faschingschwank,' may seem to us to be only a convenient pretext of the composer for the highly careless and slovenly stringing together of unconnected themes, phrases, rhythms, and flourishes (Floskeln), which taken singly are uninteresting and crude, and joined in such a soi-disant whole must make the impression of non-chalant musical improvising, nay delirious raving; and while listening to such a 'Humoreske' always call to the lips the question, What is the meaning of all this, what is 'the humour of it'? If the seriously striving musician, who unfortunately began to compose when Beethoven had ceased, may have been induced by a dim feeling of the necessity of going as far as possible out of the way of the all-crushing symphonist to take other paths, this feeling, as we cannot help seeing now, could not lead him further than to first attempts—to weak beginnings. Thus we see him in smaller compositions, as in some numbers of the 'Carnaval,' attain the perfectly adequate musical expression for the respective 'programmatical' superscriptions. But in larger works, even where the sonata form is abandoned, we look in vain for a more comprehensive programme corresponding proportionately with their size, that is to say, for an indication at the head of them of the poetico-artistic subject which is to be treated in them. Nay, even this abandonment of the sonata form, as the classical fundamental form, was not undertaken in consequence of self-conscious artistically thoughtful reflection of the hard-pressed musician; it can appear to us only as an act of nebulously indefinite, blindly groping caprice, which at once went back to the sonata or symphonic form as soon as Mendelssohn, who in this respect was certainly far superior to Schumann, courageously set the example."

Let us pause for a moment and consider the last sentence. Is it not strange that nebulously indefinite and blindly groping caprice, and absence of self-conscious thoughtful reflection should be attributed to one of our best musical critics, who examined with the greatest care and judged with the most subtle insight innumerable works of the most various composers (witness his contributions to the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, reprinted in his "Collected Writings")? The statement that Schumann first abandoned the sonata form and then took it up again as soon as Mendelssohn set the example is likewise not in accordance with the facts. Already, in 1831—that is, in the same year when his Op. 1 appeared—Schumann composed a first movement of a sonata (probably the Allegro afterwards published as Op. 8), and in 1833 he sketched the two sonatas in F sharp minor and G minor. The best of his smaller pieces, however, were written from 1834 to 1839. It is more likely that Schumann wrote so little in the larger forms during the first years of his artistic productivity because he felt that he was as yet wanting in the requisite power. Besides, Schumann's activity as a creative artist is divisible into periods, in several of which he devoted himself almost exclusively to one class of composition. Up to 1840 he produced nothing but pianoforte music, in 1840 he confined himself to writing songs, in 1841 he began with the B flat major Symphony a series of orchestral and chamber compositions in the larger form, in 1843 he came forward with his first choral works; after that his productivity became more varied, but vocal works predominated, and somewhat later he wrote with predilection ballads for chorus and orchestra. As to Mendelssohn's influence, its commencement and force are quite indeterminable, for there are but very rare and slight traces of it in the contents of Schumann's works.

But to return to our friend Joseph Rubinstein. "Even his partisans admit half ashamed that Schumann's symphonies and quartets are not all that could be desired; but do they seriously believe that his numerous 'characteristic' pianoforte pieces really are what they pretend to be, and that they express exactly what their titles promise? Who will assert that the themes, phrases, and strains, of his 'Faschingschwank' might not equally well stand in the 'Nachtstücke,' those of his 'Blumenstück' in the 'Humoreske,' those of his 'Noveletten' in the 'Romanzen'?" Here I must interrupt the gentle critic. Joseph Rubinstein forgets what he himself said about "the single indefinite word" which Schumann makes use of as a superscription. What promises are held out by the titles "Blumenstück," "Humoreske," "Faschingschwank"? But supposing the remark is just as regards these pieces—I do not say it is—it is indubitably incorrect as regards the "Novelletten" and the "Romanzen." However, the worst is coming: "Or lastly," proceeds our critic, "who can doubt but that he might very easily have presented us, in addition to his four symphonies, with a fifth, if he had put together in one book five of the short pianoforte pieces just mentioned? It is at all events clear that a wealth of fancies (Einfälle) were at his command, which had only the one disadvantage, that they were so like flourishes (Floskeln) as to be easily confounded with them; but as they poured in upon him so unceasingly, the composer had to consider how they could somehow be disposed of. If the form suitable for them could never rightly be discovered, it was indeed no small misfortune (although the ceaseless seeking for it won for him in the eyes of posterity at least the nimbus of exemplary intentions and striving); but, on examining more closely the real nature of those fancies (Einfälle), one remarks that they—with the exception of those which present themselves merely as 'crumbs' (Abfälle)* from the table of the great tone-poets, who knew nothing of romanticism—would not reasonably fit in any of the existing forms or in any yet to be discovered; nay, that even an author who, besides earnestness and energy, would have had at his disposal intelligence and skill, could hardly have created out of such themes pieces of music, much less works of art."

To begin with the last and crowning assertion of this heap of preposterous statements; from what insignificant seed-corns have many of the grandest and most famous chefs-d'œuvre sprung! How the notion of "ideas which fit neither in any of the existing forms, nor in any forms yet to be discovered," could be conceived by a being endowed with reason is a problem which I recommend for solution to the ingenious reader. And then, I cannot help asking: Supposing that Schumann was not able to produce anything but fancies (Einfälle), would it not be wiser to accept than to spurn them? Have not the composer's aphoristic thoughts and few-lined sketches, loosely and fantastically as they are often strung together, as much raison d'être as the reflections, maxims, epigrams, caractères, Xenien, pensieri, &c., with which La Rochefoucauld, La Bruyère, Pascal, Chamfort, Vauvenargues, Goethe, Schiller, Leopardi, and others have enriched literature? To be sure, this is an inferior kind of art, or rather a minor branch of art, and not to be compared to works of developed reasoning, to many-membered, artistically constructed organisms. Still, such flashes of the intellect, such iridescences of the fancy, such throbs of the heart, such furtive peeps into human life and character, are far from being worthless and despicable. Moreover, is there only one type of beauty, and of this one type is only the highest degree of perfectness admissible? But so narrow-minded and so narrow-hearted a partisan as Joseph Rubinstein cannot be expected to have many sympathies. He looks down with scorn not only on Schumann, but, with one exception, on all composers that have appeared in the world up to this time. Brahms, Raff, and Goldmark are pelted to the utmost with mud and dirt by this gamin of critics. Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn are treated with somewhat more respect:† they are, as it were, cards which may be played with good effect against the above-mentioned smaller ones, but which are swept off the table as soon as the ace of trumps, Wagner, turns up. The colossus Beethoven is merely the pedestal upon which the master of masters rises in his majesty and sublimity. In listening to Joseph Rubinstein's strictures we shall do well to keep in mind that he rejects all purely instrumental music, absolute as well as programme music, and advises the world to give up its long-cherished prejudices and recognise in Wagner's music-drama the transfiguration of the old art (see "Symphonie und Drama," in Bayreuther Blätter, February—March, 1881). Notwithstanding the daily increasing appreciation and admiration with which the world at large regards Wagner's gigantic achievements, I am glad to say it remains true in love and gratitude to its old favourites; for, be the poet-musician's genius ever so vast and powerful, he is not the quintessence of all that has been, is, and will be, but only one evolution, probably the most important artistic evolution, of the present age.

The head and front of Schumann's offending is, according to Joseph Rubinstein, "the phenomenon which has probably not remained unnoticed among musicians," namely, "that most of Schumann's work's, but especially his larger and largest ones, are put together, or 'composed' by the process of stringing together almost uninterrupted series of simple Schusterflecke."* This assertion is open to three objections: (1) Judging from the examples he brings forward Joseph Rubinstein does not seem to know what a rosalia is; (2) rosalias are to be frequently met with in the works of the best composers; (3) Schumann's compositions do not consist almost entirely of series of simple rosalias.

First of all let us inquire what a rosalia is, and in what its reprehensibility lies. "The school," says our Schumann censor par excellence, "gives the name of Schusterfleck (or rosalia) to those vicious, because monotony-producing, repetitions of musical phrases on related degrees in which the students of composition are wont to indulge with predilection in their first exercises." This is a very loose and misleading definition. But what could be expected from an advocatus diaboli where unbiassed dictionary-makers, learned as well as unlearned, vouchsafe nothing but contradictory and vague statements. The fact is, the term, like so many other musical terms, has yet to be fixed, private judgment having had hitherto pretty much its own way as regards interpretation and application. One writer defines a rosalia as a repetition of a phrase or passage, the pitch being raised one tone at each repetition; another, as successive transpositions of a melody to the next degree above or below; and a third, as a short phrase of a few bars which is repeated several times in succession on some higher or lower degree, excepting the octave. The reader will notice that the second definition is more comprehensive than the first, and the third more than the second. To learn what was originally meant by a rosalia we have only to examine the popular Italian song "Rosalia cara mia,"† after which it was named. The melody runs as follows:—

Here a phrase is repeated twice, each time a degree higher, and throughout in the same mode (major)—

* Schusterflecke: cobbler's patches. Schusterfleck is a German equivalent of Rosalie (rosalia).

† Mr. Rockstro remarks in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" that this kind of repetition is frequently called in Germany "Vetter Michel" after the song "Gestern Abend war Vetter Michel da," but I think only the two names Rosalie and Schusterfleck are generally known in Germany. At any rate I never heard a rosalia called "Vetter Michel," and several German friends of mine—men of learning and of extensive acquaintance with their country—whom I questioned on the point, were in the same case. Still "Vetter Michel" may be one of the many nicknames with which the thing has been ridiculed. The German song alluded to, is, moreover, less viciously characteristic than the Italian song above quoted, as the reader may see for himself:—

* Here a play on the words Einfälle and Abfälle is intended, which, however, is untranslatable. Einfälle, plural of Einfall, i.e., falling in—fancy, conceit, idea. Abfälle, plural of Abfall, i.e., falling off—chips, shavings, parings, &c.

† In justice to Joseph Rubinstein I must not omit mentioning that he seems also to have some respect for Bach. Last winter, in Berlin, and perhaps elsewhere too, he performed the remarkable artistic feat of playing the whole of this master's "Wohltemperirtes Klavier," i.e., forty-eight preludes and the same number of fugues, in six recitals. Wagner is said to have given him hints how they were to be rendered. Whilst some of those who heard Joseph Rubinstein did not approve of the new reading of Bach, others were charmed with it. According to the latter the distinguishing features of the performance were freedom from stiff formality, individualisation of the parts, and poetic animation.

the latter circumstance implying identity of the melodic and harmonic progression. In short, this is the worst kind of rosalia imaginable. A single repetition, especially on a lower degree and in another mode, is looked upon as a venial sin and allowed to be bearable. In this, however, as indeed in all things, much depends of course on how the thing is done. Dr. Busby remarks very sensibly in his dictionary that the rosalia is a "resource very tiresome in its effects when injudiciously introduced, but capable of greatly heightening the melody when dictated by taste and sanctioned by judgment." Innumerable instances prove that, when it served their purpose, the great masters never hesitated to write rosalias, which indeed in their hands became a powerful means of expression, and, far from being weak points in their compositions, present themselves often as prominent beauties. Among the many examples of indubitable and yet unobjectionable rosalias pointed out by Mr. Rockstro in his interesting article in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians" (for other examples see the articles "Rosalia" and "Sequence" in J. Stainer and W. A. Barrett's "Dictionary of Musical Terms"; and section 276, on "Sequences," in Dr. Stainer's "Theory of Harmony") there are two—Minuet from Handel's "Ariadne" and the setting of the words "The grave gives up its dead" from Spohr's "Last Judgment"—which, with their iteration and reiteration, their ascending each time by one degree, and their adherence to the same mode, exhibit all the features of ill-repute observable in the above-quoted weak and trivial Italian song without, however, being weak or trivial themselves. Were it not for one note, a minor instead of a major interval, the setting of the words "Ingemisco tanquam reus" from Mozart's "Requiem" might be added as a third example of the same kind. But rosalias occur comparatively rarely in this form. Oftenest there is only one repetition, and frequently the sequence is at a lower pitch or the mode is changed. Handel's "How beautiful are the feet" (bars 7 and 8) from the "Messiah" furnishes an example of a phrase repeated once, a tone higher, and in the same mode; Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan," Op. 62 (bars 15, &c.), of a passage repeated once, a tone lower, and in the same mode; and the same composer's "Sonata Appassionata," Op. 57 (at the beginning of the first movement), of a passage repeated once, a tone lower, and in a different mode. The two last examples remind me that Beethoven is notable among composers for the effective use he made of rosalias. What can be more impressive than the weird and mighty upheaval in the Heroic Symphony (first movement, second part, bars 27, &c.), where a transposition takes place from C minor to C sharp minor! It must be patent to the student of this master that repetition has been carried farther by him than by any other composer. With what persistence he can fasten upon a melodic or rhythmic motive without becoming monotonous may be best learned from his symphonies—I mention especially the first movements of the C minor and the Pastoral, and the scherzo of the Ninth Symphony. In the Heroic Symphony the chief phrase of the first subject appears in one place successively (Joseph Rubinstein would say rosaliter) in E flat, F, D flat, B flat, and E flat (in the latter key several times). Nor does Beethoven confine himself to transpositions; he also introduces freely and with wonderful effect repetitions at the same pitch. In the C minor Symphony (bars 63, &c.) a four-bar phrase occurs three times in immediate succession.

Thus we see, and we shall see still more fully, that repetitions, rosalias as well as others, are not necessarily monotonous and indicative of poverty of ideas.

Critics and æstheticians arrive often at wrong conclusions in consequence of their insisting on judging music by the rules and usages of other arts. The verbal and musical languages, for instance, are completely different in their nature, and therefore cannot and ought not to be judged by a common code. Still, the arts have one or more points of contact, and it is instructive to note what takes place there. Thus in lyric poetry, which contains music in an embryonic state, and wherever verbal language becomes emotional, repetitions are not unfrequently met with.

To place this question as to the force and expressiveness of iteration and transposition in a clear light I cannot do better than illustrate it by examples drawn from a master highly esteemed both by conservative and radical, and recognised by all as something more than a mere composer, a contriver of more or less euphonious combinations of sounds—in short, as a true tone-poet. Here, then, follows an additional number of rosalias (taking the word in the sense of the third and most comprehensive of the three definitions above quoted) and literal repetitions at the same pitch culled from various works of Beethoven's written by him at different periods of his life and representative of all his styles.

Sonata, Op. 2, No. 1.—The first phrase of the second subject of the first movement is once completely and once partially repeated. In the working-out section the phrase appears in addition to the same number of repetitions twice a tone higher, and after that the melody is taken up by the bass. The second half of the subject contains likewise a repetition of a four-bar phrase, and in the codas which bring the parts to a close repetitions are very conspicuous. The first and second parts of the Menuetto begin with rosalias: the second four bars of the first subject are a transposition from F minor to A flat major; and the third and fourth bars of the second part a transposition from A flat major to B flat minor of the first two bars. Sequences play an important rôle in the trio, and the last movement, we may be sure, would be described by Joseph Rubinstein as consisting of nothing but rosalias.

Sonata, Op. 10, No. 3, D major.—At bar 31 of the first movement begins a four-bar phrase in F sharp minor which is immediately repeated in A major. The passage occurs several times in the course of the movement. There are other rosalias in the working-out section. In the Menuetto the second eight bars are a repetition of the first eight a tone higher (D major and E minor), only the cadences are different.

Sonata, Op. 13, C minor.—Rosalias are discoverable in the second subject of the first movement, not to speak of repetitions in the first subject, but I wish to point out only the more striking repetitions of the various elements which make up the coda of Parts I. and II. Also the pianissimo passage in the working-out section may be mentioned. The pianissimo passage in the Adagio, which is heard first in A flat minor, appears immediately afterwards in E major. I pass over the Finale.

Sonata, Op. 26, A flat major.—Joseph Rubinstein would have no difficulty in finding cobbler's patches in the last movement; he would say it was covered with them. And yet!

Sonata, Op. 27, No. 2, C sharp minor.—The second four bars of the first part of the Allegretto are a transposition of the first four bars, and so are the fourth four bars of the third. The repetitions in the last movement are too shocking to be contemplated.

Sonata, Op. 28, D major.—The Scherzo consists of a series of rosalias.

Sonata, Op. 31, No. 1, G major.—Joseph Rubinstein would say of the first movement of this sonata what I said of the Scherzo of the preceding one.

Sonata, Op. 53, C major.—The reader cannot but have a vivid recollection of the rosalia at the beginning of the sonata, and had I not to mend my pace, for fear of never finishing, I should show that this first is by no means the last.

Sonata, Op. 106, B flat major.—The rosalias (sequences would of course be a more appropriate and less abusive appellation) with which the Scherzo of this sonata opens put one in mind of the beginning of the Andante favori.

Speaking of the lesser pieces of Beethoven's piano-forte works, I would call the reader's attention to certain rosalias in the Bagatelles (Op. 33). The first four bars of No. 2 are at once repeated a tone higher, and, as if that were not enough, two of the four bars appear then a minor third higher, after which there occur yet a number of partial and freer repetitions of the phrase. The attention of the rosalia-hunter is no doubt attracted by the first two parts of No. 7 of the Bagatelles, also by several passages in the Rondo (Op. 51, No. 1) in C major; and in the Rondo (Op. 51, No. 2) in G major, he bags a splendid piece of game—the first eight bars of the theme in E major (Allegretto) being followed by their transposition to C sharp minor, in all particulars true to the original excepting the slightly altered close. But let us return from the less to the most important of the master's works.

In the Heroic Symphony (first movement, bars 134, &c.) an eight-bar phrase which first appears in E minor is at once transposed to A minor. The same passage occurs further in F and E flat minor. But who could help being enraptured by this ethereally lovely rosalia? Nor do I think it possible that any being born of woman should be so insensible as to be proof against the charm of the playful rosalia at the beginning of the Allegretto scherzando of the Eighth Symphony (F major). As to the transposition from A to D of the mysterious opening passage of the Ninth symphony, its effect is beyond the power of description: justice cannot be done to it by ever so great and choice an accumulation of adjectives.

I have already pointed out that the theorists as well as musicians are generally at variance as to what is and what is not a rosalia. Indeed, even by our accepting the most comprehensive of the three definitions, we shall not escape from being again and again brought face to face with this puzzling question. For instance, would you call the second half of the first nine bars of Mozart's G minor Symphony a rosalia, notwithstanding the modifications of the intervals of the melody and the total change of the harmonies? If you would, the name would lose its opprobriousness; for its opprobriousness is based on the monotony of the thing thus called, and monotony cannot exist where there is variety. This defence of rosalias holds also good in the case of repetitions of melody at the same pitch, but with a different accompaniment and perhaps a slightly altered cadence (see Beethoven's string quartet, Op. 127—the beginning of the Allegro). Nay even the mere change of the cadence is enough to produce the desirable variety. It is one of the most common procedures of composers to begin the second clause of a musical sentence like the first, giving it only towards the end a different turn. In addition to the examples in point to be found in the above notes from Beethoven's works, and instead of thousands more let the following few suffice. Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 10, No. 3, first movement, first subject; his Sonata, Op. 22, last movement, first subject; his Symphony in A major, first subjects of the Vivace and Allegro con brio; his Ninth Symphony, principal theme of the last division; &c., &c.

How little is required to avoid monotony is strikingly exemplified by the movement in 3-4 time, F major, for the wind-band on the stage introduced by Mozart into the second finale of his "Don Giovanni":—

Now Joseph Rubinstein overlooks all this—the force of repetitions, the effect of key-relation, the transformations by melodic and harmonic modifications—he has found a good telling nickname with which to disparage a hated opponent's works, and, in accordance with one of the worst usages of party warfare, throws it about him regardless of its real applicability or inapplicability. His estimate and characterisation of Schumann is as far off the truth as E. Naumann's of Wagner. By the way, I wonder with what feelings Schumann's rude assailant, whose contempt for the composer's poor mannerism and impotent romanticism is boundless, may have read in "Die Tonkunst in der Culturgeschichte," that the distinguishing characteristics of Wagner's manner are a frequent use of the turn, of chromatics, ninths, and suspensions of the seventh and fourth—suspensions such as "occur in Donizetti, Verdi, Rossini, and the hypersentimental song-composers"; and that the creator of the "Kunstwerk der Zukunft" is no more than the last blossom of that later (epigonenhaft) romanticism which in literature showed itself in such men of talent as Frederick Schlegel, Novalis, Tieck, &c. And yet, however great his indignation may be, Joseph Rubinstein has no right to complain after his uncritical wholesale condemnation of Schumann, whose only crime is that among his admirers are a number of people who do not appreciate Wagner.

Before I proceed to examine the nature of Schumann's works, let me state the critic's accusation in all its violence. We have already learned that the master's compositions, more especially the larger and largest ones, consist of almost uninterrupted series of simple rosalias. We learn further that Schumann had an innate and indomitable inclination to join like to like (Gleiches zu Gleichem zu gesellen), which, whenever he had written a four-bar phrase, suggested to him that it was not good "it should be alone." This inclination, Joseph Rubinstein informs us, was the cause of the strange technique of composition to be found in Schumann's symphonies, quartets, Fantasiestücke &c.; nay, he even pronounces this inclination to join like to like to be the fiat of Schumann's creation, and in doing so puts the word "creation" between hyphens to let the world know that he has not been taken in by the pretensions of Schumann. These baseless and, in so far as they are not baseless, grossly exaggerated assertions awake in me no inclination to join like to like, on the contrary they induce me more and more to consider the question calmly and carefully.

VI.

NOTWITHSTANDING the popularity which the Genevan tunes attained, critics were not wanting who decried them as trivial, sensuous, and deficient in dignity. In short, they are not plain-song. Some, especially those added in 1562, are, no doubt, inferior in merit to the others, but time has sufficiently refuted the objections of the purists. It is impossible to enter here into any detailed examination of these tunes, but we may quote five, which we give with Goudimel's harmonies taken from his psalter of 1565. The melodies are in the tenor. The first is the 134th, the well-known "Old Hundredth."

PSEAV. CXXXIV.

The next is the 42nd, also in use in England, but the difference between the original rhythm and that of the tune as it appears in our hymnals is worthy of notice:—

PSEAV. XLII.

The third is the 36th, which afterwards, set to the 68th psalm, became the battle-song of the Huguenots, and a melody better suited to the purpose could not easily have been found. It is not, however, a French tune, but one of those by Greiter which Calvin found "so pleasing" in 1539, and had appeared in a German psalter two years earlier. It is found in many English hymnals of the present day; but we would point out that the force and character of the melody is much impaired by the change of the penultimate semibreve of each third strain into two minims:—

* This alteration is not modern. It was made when the tune was first adopted in England in the sixteenth century.

PSEAV. XXXVI.

The two following examples are good specimens of the Genevan tunes, and of Goudimel's treatment of them:—

PSEAV. XXV.

PSEAV. CXXXVIII.

Before leaving this subject it occurs to us that when Meyerbeer, in his opera of "Les Huguenots," puts "Ein feste Burg" into the mouths of the old Huguenot soldier and his companions, the "local colouring" is not strictly accurate.* It is true that the Huguenots in France were frequently called "Lutheriens" by their enemies, in whose eyes Luther and Calvin were but heretics alike, but Marcel, Raoul, and Valentine were not Lutherans, and their death-song would have been, not a German chorale, but one of the melodies set by Bourgeois to the psalms of Marot and Beza.

M. Douen devotes an interesting chapter to the origin of the Huguenot melodies, but it is impossible to treat this subject without the aid of musical examples, for which we have no space. We know that some of the Genevan tunes were derived from the German; a few may, perhaps, be regarded as original in their structure, even although the materials of which they were composed were not new, but the source of most of them must certainly be sought in popular melodies of the day. This distinction should, however, be drawn between the French psalter and its predecessors, that while these melodies were adopted without alteration in the earliest collections, such as the "Souter Liedekens," they were largely modified in the Genevan psalter, and fitted to the due expression of the psalms to which they were adapted. We would also venture to give a general caution to all who investigate the pedigree of old tunes, not to be misled into inferring direct relationship between any two from the occurrence in both of an identical phrase, which may merely be a portion of the common property of the time. Many other considerations have to be taken into account before the value of a mere similarity of melody can be rightly estimated.†

In closing our summary of M. Douen's work we have far from exhausted its contents, but we think enough has been said to show its great value alike to literature and music. We cannot too highly commend the careful and ample manner in which M. Douen has cited his authorities, thus enabling us to verify his statements, and to draw our own inferences should we see reason to differ from his. With his conclusions generally we fully agree, but in a few instances, where facts are deficient, we think M. Douen has supplied their place too minutely from conjecture, and that his zeal for one side of the question has led him unintentionally to do some injustice to the other. When discussing the relations of Calvin and Marot, M. Douen appears to us to express himself too severely respecting the great reformer. In all cases of incompatibility of temper there are usually faults on both sides, and we suspect that the Pope of Geneva may not have been wholly to blame for his want of sympathy with the poet. Again, we think some of M. Douen's remarks respecting Franc not borne out by what we know of the circumstances. That Lausanne was jealous of Geneva is evident, that some rivalry existed between the local chantres is probable, but we see in Franc's preface no evidence of any intention to exalt himself at the expense of Bourgeois, who at that time had long left Geneva. We accept his words in their literal meaning, he gives all credit to "those who had performed their task so well," he adopts the greater number of the Genevan melodies unaltered, of the nineteen which he rejects fifteen are tunes added in 1562 by the anonymous successor of Bourgeois, while as regards the remaining four, M. Douen confesses that they are among Bourgeois' weakest tunes, and that Franc replaced them by others, of which two are not inferior and one is actually superior in merit to those for which they were substituted.

In a work of such magnitude a few oversights and misprints are unavoidable. We have noticed two or three in their proper places; we now add a few others.—In Vol I., p. 634, M. Douen says that the sixth note of Psalm xv. was si in the edition of 1542, and was altered to do in 1549. Ought we not to read do in the first line and si in the second?—In p. 640, for "Psalme xxii." read "Psalm xix."—In p. 645, for "6^e et 7^e notes du psaume cxxxvii." read "notes de l'avant dernière phrase du psaume" (see p. 631).—In the table of tunes at p. 648 the following corrections appear necessary: Ps. 37, for "remplacée en 1551" read "une note changée en 1551" (see p. 644); Ps. 38, add "modifiée en 1549"; insert "Ps. 45, non traduit en 1542, mélodie de B. 1543, remplacée en 1551" (see pp. 645-6); Ps. 115, add "deux notes changées en 1551"; Ps. 138, for "1543" read "1549."—In p. 649 the last paragraph is not quite correct; in the third line from the bottom, for "soixante-deux" read "soixante," and omit from the list lii. and lvii., already translated; also in the last line, for "lxiii. sur l'air du xvii. et du lxx." read "lxii. sur l'air du xxiv."—In p. 655, after "Psalme cxxxviii." omit "Edit. pseudo-romaine 1542"; the melody quoted is that which replaced it in 1549.—In p. 680, line 3, "xc." seems a misprint for "cx." (see pp. 734 and 647).—In Vol. II., p. 76, line 19, for "liii." read "xliii."; and in p. 316 the respected name of Wilberforce ought to be spelled with a W, and not after the fashion recommended by the late Mr. Weller, senior.

We may also remark that the "profond mot, L'orthodoxie, c'est ma doxie," which M. Douen (I., p. 31) attributes to Lord Bacon, is doubtless of much later date than the reign of James I.; and as M. Douen is probably not versed in English argot, he would not perceive the double meaning contained in the aphorism.*

These, however, are but small matters. In general accuracy and lucidity of arrangement M. Douen leaves nothing to be desired. He seems to have neglected no available source of information, and has produced a work which is a model of its class, and will long remain the standard authority on the subject of which it treats. The numerous examples of harmonized melodies are of great interest to the musical antiquary; and that most necessary appendage to every book, a good index, will be found at the end of the second volume.

* "Doxie, the female companion of a tramp or beggar. Orthodoxy has been described as being a man's own doxy, and heterodoxy another man's doxy."—Hotten, "Slang Dictionary."

* Schumann, for other reasons, made a violent attack on Meyerbeer for introducing "Ein feste Burg" in the opera. See Schumann's "Music and Musicians," 1st series, p. 303. London, 1878.

† Thus we find that the sixth strain of the Genevan tune set in 1549 to Psalm xxv.—

is identical with the commencement of Haydn's well-known "God save the Emperor," but who would suggest that any connection existed between them? Musical phrases, like history, are apt to repeat themselves. We may even add that by the change of one note the phrase quoted above becomes the English drinking glee, "Here's a health to all good lasses."

Another example of unintentional coincidence is afforded by the first strain of the tune to Psalm xlvii.—

which is identical with the commencement of "Herberge" in Schumann's "Waldscenen."

We cannot conclude without noticing the liberal manner in which the interests of literature are provided for in France. Few publishers would be found to undertake the risk and expense of a work like this, which appeals to a limited number of readers; but we learn from the preface that the "Commission des impressions gratuites de l'Imprimerie nationale," composed of members of the different sections of the Institut, under the presidency of a minister of state, having examined the manuscript, unanimously recommended that it should be printed at the national expense, and this recommendation was carried into effect in accordance with a decree of the President of the French Republic.

We subjoin a table which will show at a glance the dates of the successive changes, so far as they have as yet been ascertained, made in the tunes of the Strasburg and Genevan psalters between 1539 and 1562. The letter "s" prefixed to a date implies that the tune is found in the Strasburg psalter of that date.

Dates in italics are those of the early tunes which were afterwards superseded by new ones.

Dates in Egyptian type are those of the tunes finally adopted and retained, although in some of them alterations were subsequently made, the dates of which are given in ordinary type.

Where two or more psalms are sung to the same tune, it is assigned to the psalm to which it was originally set.

M. Douen omits to notice the melodies of the Pater noster, the Credo, the Ave, and the Prayers before and after meat, as they were omitted from the Psalter of 1562.

It thus appears that of the one hundred and twenty-five distinct tunes finally retained in the Genevan psalter, eleven (all, however, with one exception, more or less altered) were derived from the Strasburg psalter of 1539; twelve were added in 1542; eleven in 1543; five (including the Decalogue and the Song of Simeon) in 1549; forty-six in 1551; and forty in 1562.

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

A MORE melancholy and touching letter than that addressed by Berlioz to his son after the death of the lad's mother has rarely been penned amid the fires that seem always to encompass great souls. It paints a sad picture needing no comment:—

"Poor dear Louis, thou hast received my letter of yesterday, and now thou knowest all. I am alone in the great room at Montmartre, writing to thee by the side of her deserted chamber. I have been again to the cemetery and placed two crowns upon the tomb—one for thee, one for me. I have lost my head, and do not know why I have come here. The servants remain for some days. They are putting everything in order, and I shall take care that there is as much as possible for thee. I have preserved her hair; do not lose the little pin that I gave her. Thou wilt never know what we suffered for one another, thy mother and I; and it was just those sufferings which so much attached us to one another. It was as impossible for me to live with her as to leave her. Happily, she saw thee before dying. For myself, I came later, on the morrow of thy departure; and I entered the house ten minutes after she, without pain, had rendered the last sigh. She was then free. I love thee, my dear son. We spoke of thee much yesterday in this sad garden, with Alexis Bertschold. . . . My cares will endure six months longer at least, for I must pay the doctor, and the sale of the furniture will bring in scarcely anything. . . . Adieu! I embrace thee with all my heart. Love me, as I love thee."

The boyish recklessness of Louis in money matters was always a sore trouble to his father, from whose scanty store he had to be supplied. Some reference to this matter appears in a letter written a few days (March 23, 1854) after the one just quoted:—

"Dear friend, thy letter gave me most unexpected pleasure. Thou hast now seventy francs a month, and if thou knowest how to conduct thyself, and to renounce thy method of using money, thou wilt be able, without doubt, to save a part thereof. Tell me if thou thinkest thou wilt be able to redeem the watch which, I fear, was pledged at Havre in the time of thy folly. It was given thee by my father. If thou canst not recover it, I will buy thee another with the money which I have of thine. I am having made for thee a watchguard with the hair of thy poor mother, and I earnestly desire that thou mayest religiously preserve it. I have also had a bracelet made, which I shall give to my sister; the rest of the hair I keep. . . . No doubt thou hast read the charming things which Jules Janin wrote about thy poor mother in his feuilleton of last Monday. With what delicacy he referred to my work on 'Romeo and Juliet,' in citing the words of the funeral march, 'Cast flowers,' &c. Yesterday's Sicle also contained some words, and many other papers that thou knowest not have spoken of our cruel loss. I start next Sunday evening at eight for Hanover, where I shall be till April 3 or 4. After that date I do not know where I ought to go, but in any case I shall certainly be at Dresden from April 15 to May 1. Write me as often as possible to let me know how thou art getting on. . . . God grant that my German trip may bring something in. The apartment at Montmartre is not let, and it may be that I shall have to pay another year's rent. Adieu, very dear child; my love for thee appears doubled since the loss we have sustained. I embrace thee with all my heart."

A few days later, Louis was ordered to the Baltic with the French fleet, then about to operate against the Russians; and this drew another letter from his father, in which the old money trouble again appears:—

"Take care. It seems to me that thou hast begun again to squander thy money. I have sent thee some twice this last month. Buy a watch, small of cost, but excellent. I have not received a sou since I have been in Germany. They ought to have sent to me here (Dresden) a sum of 400 francs from Hanover, together with the cross that the King has announced for me; but I have got neither cross nor money. I have written on this matter to three persons, no one of whom answered. . . . Adieu, dear child, write to me as often as possible, especially when thou hast left France. I embrace thee with all my heart."

A contemplated trip to Munich seems to have been interfered with by the candidature of Berlioz for a chair at the Institute, which he failed to obtain. Paris, it must be said for that fickle city, was consistent in her treatment of our composer. Berlioz, however, took this fresh rebuff with a more philosophic air than usual. Writing to his friend, Auguste Morel, he said (August 28, 1854):—

"They urged me to become a candidate, to make the calls and everything else usual under such circumstances. I did it all; I saw the academicians one after the other, and, after a thousand brave words, extremely flattering, a warm reception, &c., they elected Clapisson. Here's to the next vacancy, however. I am resolved to persist with as much patience as Eugène Delacroix and M. Abel de Pujol, who presented themselves ten times. Réber has shown me every possible mark of sincere sympathy, and the three other musicians of sincere antipathy. L— has worked for me with one hand; I don't know what he did with the other."

Three days later Berlioz wrote on the same subject to Hans von Bülow:—

"I resigned myself frankly to those terrible visits, to those letters, to all that the Academy inflicts on persons who would intrare in suo docto corpore (Molière's Latin); and they have selected M. Clapisson. Another time, however. I am resolute on this matter, and will present myself even to the point of death."

We next find the master taking an unexpected and startling step. Whether given up to one of those vagaries which were the bane of his life, or animated by just and generous sentiments, he married, in the early autumn of 1854, Mdlle. Récio, a lady with whom he had lived for some years. The terms in which he made this known to his son may be quoted:—

"I have to make known to thee a piece of news which will probably not astonish thee, and which I communicated in advance to my sister and uncle on the occasion of my last visit to the Côte. I have remarried. That connection, by its long duration had become indissoluble,* as thou well understandest; I could neither live alone, nor abandon the person who had been my companion for fourteen years. On his last visit to Paris, my uncle himself was of this opinion and the first to advise me. All my friends thought with him. Thy interests, as may be believed, are well safe-guarded. I have devised to my wife after me, if I should die first, only a quarter of my little fortune, and this quarter, I know, it is her intention to leave thee. She brings me, by way of dower, her furniture, the value of which is more than we think, but which ought, of course, to return to her, if I die first. . . . My position, more regular, is more agreeable thus. I do not doubt, if thou hast preserved some painful souvenirs, and some harsh feelings for Mdlle. Récio, that thou, for love of me, wilt hide them in the depths of thy soul. The marriage was accomplished en petit comité, without noise as without concealment. If thou writest to me on the subject write nothing that I cannot show to my wife, because I would not for anything have shadows in my home; however, I leave thy heart to tell thee what thou oughtest to do."

The master's second wedded life began, and his autobiography ended almost simultaneously. On October 18, 1854, he closed his memoirs with a paragraph so characteristic of his intense emotionalism that it eminently deserves translation here:—

"I finish, thanking holy Germany, where the culture of art is preserved in its purity, and thee, generous England; and thee, Russia, which saved me; and you, my good friends of France, and you noble hearts and spirits of all nations whom I have met. It was happiness for me to know you; I preserve and shall faithfully cherish the dearest recollections of our intercourse. As for you, maniacs, dogs, and stupid bulls; as for you my Guildensterns, my Rosenkrantz, my Iagos, my little Osrics, serpents and insects of all species, 'farewell, my friends'; I despise you, and I sincerely hope not to die till you are forgotten."

On January 1, 1865, Berlioz added a "postface" to his autobiography. This, however, does not bridge the interval of eleven years, and we must resort to the letters for information as to much that happened during that time. On March 2, 1855, we find him writing from Paris to M. Tajan-Rogé stating that he had just returned from Weimar and Gotha where the public had embarrassed him with all that which, in Europe, constitutes success. Some particulars of the last concert given in the classic town of Goethe and Schiller are decidedly interesting:—

"I had a monster programme ('L'Enfance du Christ'—the Symphonie Fantastique—'Le Retour à la Vie'). This last work, which you do not know, and of which I wrote the words as well as the music, is a lyric melodrama. The sole actor, who plays the rôle of the artist, does so before the curtain, which is lowered and conceals behind it an amphitheatre where the band, chorus, and chief singers are placed. The pieces of music are melodies and harmonies, which the artist hears in fancy alone, and which the audience hear in reality, a little dulled by the curtain acting as a kind of 'mute.' I was recalled four times after this work, which I wrote twenty-two years ago when vagabondising among the woods of Italy."

The same letter contains an indication of his future movements:—

"I must stir myself during the eight days I am passing in Paris, being engaged to give three concerts at Brussels, from the 15th to the 25th of this month. Then, on April 6, I must give another here, at the Opéra-Comique, with M. Perrin's united forces; organise the first performance of my 'Te Deum,' at St. Eustache, on March 1; and then start for London, where I am engaged by the New Philharmonic Society."

References appear in other letters to the 'Te Deum,' of which mention is here made. Addressing his friend, Morel, Berlioz says:—

"Behold me now plunged in the 'Te Deum,' and it is at such a moment that your absence appears to me strange."

Again, to Richard Wagner:—

"I sincerely wish I were able to send you the scores for which you do me the pleasure to ask; unhappily my publishers have not given me any for a long time. But there are two, or even three, the 'Te Deum,' 'L'Enfance du Christ,' and 'Lélio' (lyric monodrama), which will be out in a few weeks, and those, at least, I shall be in a position to send you."

Writing to his son on April 27, he says:—

"We had the first orchestral rehearsal (of the 'Te Deum') yesterday at St. Eustache, with the six hundred children. To day, I try the ensemble of my two hundred artist-choristers. The thing goes well. It is colossal. . . . There is a finale grander than the 'Tuba mirum' of my Requiem."

The performance of this work duly took place, and Morel wrote to Berlioz asking for particulars as to its character and effect. The master replied:—

"I will only say that the effect produced upon me was enormous, and the same with my executants. In general, the unmeasured grandeur of plan and style has struck them prodigiously, and you may believe that the 'Tibi omnes' and the 'Judea,' in two different manners are Babylonian, Ninevitic pieces, which will be found more powerful still when heard in a place less large and sonorous than the church of St. Eustache."

He adds:—

"On Wednesday I start for England. Wagner, who conducts the old Philharmonic Society in London (a post which I was obliged to refuse through being engaged to the other), is beaten down by the attacks of all the English press. But he remains calm, they say, assured that in fifty years he will be the master of the musical world."

The English campaign proved satisfactory. On July 21 he wrote to Morel:—

"I have made a brilliant excursion to London, where I got on better and better. I shall return there this winter, after a tour I have projected in Bohemia and Austria, if we are not at war with the Austrians."

This same year (1855) witnessed the production of a Cantata, "L'Impériale" written for performance at the distribution of prizes in connection with the Paris Exhibition, and subsequently repeated several times to such good purpose that the master received 8,000 francs as his share of the proceeds. He owed this distinctly to Prince Napoléon, whose gracious treatment of him is handsomely acknowledged in a letter containing the further expression: "The Emperor detests music liketen Turks." Our master's account of the performance of "L'Impériale," as it appears in the "postface" of his memoirs possesses a special interest:—

"The Prince Napoléon had proposed to me to organise a vast concert in the Exhibition Palace for the day on which the Emperor would make the solemn distribution of prizes. I accepted this rough task, while declining pecuniary responsibility. A bold and intelligent entrepreneur, M. Ber, presented himself. He treated me generously, and this time the concerts (there were several after the official ceremony) brought me nearly 8,000 francs. I had placed in a raised gallery, behind the throne, eleven hundred musicians, who, however, were very little heard. On the day of the ceremony the musical effect was of such small importance, that in the middle of the first piece (the cantata 'L'Impériale' which I had written for the occasion) they obliged me to stop the orchestra at the most interesting moment, because the Prince had his speech to deliver, and the music lasted too long. On the morrow the paying public were admitted, and we received 75,000 francs. . . . That day the performance was not interrupted, and I could light the match of my musical fireworks. I had brought from Brussels a mechanic known to me, who set up an electric metronome with five branches. By a simple movement of a finger of my left hand, I was thus able to mark the time to five different and widely sundered points in the vast space occupied by the executants. Five sub-conductors received my indications by the electric wires, and communicated them to the sections over which they had control. The ensemble was marvellous. Since then most lyric theatres have adopted the electric metronome for the direction of choirs behind the scenes, and when the chorus-masters can neither see the beat nor hear the orchestra."

For several years from this time Berlioz abated the frequency of his public demonstrations, and for the most part remained in Paris quietly engaged upon that which he fondly hoped would be his crowning work. In 1856 he became a member of the Institute, taking the chair vacated by the death of Adolphe Adam, and thus realising one of the dreams of his life. "He organised, each year," says M. Bertrand, "a festival at Baden, and there brought out his ravishing opera 'Beatrice et Benedict'; the youth of the town of Raab sent him a congratulatory address; the artists of the Paris Conservatoire made him an ovation a little while after the production of 'Tannhäuser'; the theatre at Bordeaux played his 'Roméo et Juliette'—this was all, or nearly all." For the rest, he merely supervised the rehearsals of "Alceste" at the Grand-Opéra. We need not, however, content ourselves with this bare outline of seven years' comparative calm, since the master's letters enable us to make acquaintance with numerous and interesting details.

His passion for Gluck seems to have survived the lapse of years. Writing to Theodore Ritter (January 12, 1856) he says:—

"As for me, I shall never forget that your artistic instinct has, without hesitation, recognised and adored with transport that, for you, new genius. Yes, yes, depend upon it, whatever the men of half-feeling and half-science, those who have only part of a heart and a single brain lobe, may say, there are two great superior gods in our art, Beethoven and Gluck. The one reigns over the infinitude of thought, the other over the infinitude of passion; and, although the first be strong above the second, there is nevertheless so much of the one in the other that these two Jupiters make but a single divinity, in whom our admiration and worship ought to be absorbed."

On May 23, 1856, we find the master writing to his friend Morel, entreating his good offices for Louis Berlioz, who desired to leave the imperial navy and enter the merchant service. This letter contains also a reference to his state of health, in which we may see the beginning of the end:—

"I am greatly occupied, and, to tell the truth, very unwell, without being able to discover what is the matter with me. A strange illness, I sleep in the streets, &c.; however, perhaps, it is the effect of the spring."

Further references to this malady will appear later; meanwhile let us hear the master as he discourses to various correspondents on more cheerful themes. His aversion from the fugued "Amen," so common in religious composition and so well burlesqued in "La Damnation de Faust," led him to speak very clearly to the Abbé Girod, who had written a work on Church music:—

"No doubt one might write a good fugue of a religious character to express the pious wish 'Amen.' But it ought to be slow; full of feeling and very short, because however well one may convey the sense of a word, that word cannot be, without ridicule, repeated a great number of times. Instead of this reserve, and expressive purpose, fugues on the word 'Amen' are all rapid, violent, turbulent, and resemble nothing more than a drinking chorus mixed up with peals of laughter, as each part vocalises upon the first syllable a . . . a . . . a . . . men, which produces a most grotesque and indecent effect. These traditional fugues are merely senseless blasphemies."

A letter to M. Bennet (January 26, 1857) contains anything but a complimentary remark about Handel, whom the writer styles a "barrel of pork and beer," but is chiefly remarkable for a touching paragraph which permits us to see how blank and bare life sometimes appeared to this ardent and disappointed man:—

"It is well that my letter has reached its end. The pale sunlight that illuminated my window when I began writing to you has gone, and I feel cold at heart and see everything grey, and I am about to stretch myself upon my couch, and there close the eyes of spirit and body in order to see nothing, but to rest as senseless as a tree without leaves dripping with rain."

The true spirit of the man blazes out, moreover, in the subjoined extract from a letter to Hans von Bülow (January 20, 1858):—

"Your faith, your ardour, your hatreds even, delight me. Like you, I still have terrible hatreds and volcanic ardours, but, as to faith, I firmly believe that there is nothing true, nothing false, nothing beautiful, nothing ugly. Don't believe a word of this; I libel myself. No, no, I more than ever adore that which I find beautiful, and, to my mind, death involves nothing more cruel than this: no longer to love, no longer to admire. It is true that, when dead, one does not know that one no longer loves. But, a truce to philosophy—in other words, a truce to stupidities."

A propos to Dr. Bülow we find in a letter of the master to his son (January 24, 1858) some observations having a general as well as a personal interest, especially at this time when a certain school of amateurs would number Berlioz among its lights:—

"I received some days ago a long letter from M. de Bülow, one of Liszt's sons-in-law, he who married Mdlle. Cosima. He informed me that he had given a concert in Berlin at which were performed with great success my overture to 'Cellini' and the little vocal piece 'Le Jeune Pâtre Breton.' This young man is one of the most fervent disciples of that senseless school known in Germany as the school of the future. They will take no denial, but absolutely insist that I be their chief and standard-bearer. I say nothing, I write nothing, I simply let them alone; men of sense will know how to discern what is the truth."

In this connection may fitly be cited some remarks upon the production of "Tannhäuser" at the Opéra in 1861, under Wagner's direction. Writing to his son (February 21), Berlioz says:—

"One cannot get rid of that 'Tannhäuser' music; the last general rehearsal was, I am told, atrocious, and lasted till one o'clock in the morning. . . . Liszt is coming to uphold the school of charivari. I shall not write the article on 'Tannhäuser,' and have begged D'Ortigue to undertake the work. . . . I have never had so many windmills to fight as this year; I am surrounded with madmen of all kinds. There are moments when rage suffocates me."

On March 5 he writes:—

"Our musical world is much agitated by the scandal which the representation of 'Tannhäuser' will produce. I meet only with men who are furious, and the Minister went away from rehearsal the other day in a state of rage. The Emperor is not satisfied, yet there are some genuine enthusiasts even among Frenchmen. Wagner is evidently insane: he will die, as Julien died last year, in a transport of madness. Liszt has not come, and will not be at the first performance. He seems to anticipate a catastrophe. As I have already said, I shall not write the article thereupon, but leave it to D'Ortigue. I mean to protest by my silence, free to pronounce later on if they push me to it."

The performance of Wagner's opera was noticed, in a letter to Madame Mussart (March 14), as follows:—

"Ah! God of heaven, what a representation! What shouts of laughter! The Parisian showed himself yesterday in a new light. He laughed at a bad musical style, he laughed at the antics of orchestral buffoonery, he laughed at the naïvetés of an oboe; and he now understands that there is a style in music. As for the horrors, they were splendidly hissed."

Subsequently Berlioz informed his son:—

"The second representation of 'Tannhäuser' was worse than the first. . . . The press is unanimous in exterminating him (Wagner). For myself, I am cruelly avenged."

It is now time to turn from these desultory matters to the last great achievements of our master's life—the composition and production of "Beatrice et Benedict" and "Les Troyens." In the postface of his memoirs Berlioz says, with regard to the first of these works, that it was written "at the request" of M. Bénazet for his theatre at Baden. The letters, however, contain several references to "Beatrice et Benedict" before the subjoined words appear (January 2, 1861):—

"Bénazet is here. He has engaged me for Baden. I have promised him my one-act (sic) opera for his new theatre now building at Baden."

From this it would seem that the master laboured at the smaller work without the stimulus of a "commission," and, perhaps, as a relief from the ponderous weight of the bigger. Be the fact as it may, "Beatrice et Benedict" was produced at Baden under the composer's direction on August 9, 1862, and with the greatest success. Moreover, at the instance of the Grand Duchess, a German version was played at Weimar some months later, with an equally gratifying result to Berlioz, who conducted the first two performances, and was overwhelmed with attentions. Upon "Les Troyens," however, he rested all his hopes. The importance he attached to this work cannot be exaggerated. He intended it as his greatest, and seemed to feel that it would prove his last effort for the lyric stage. Hence the continued references to "Les Troyens" in his letters, and the minute details with regard to it in his postface.

Regarding the conception of the work, he says:—

"Being in Weimar . . . at the house of the Princess of Wittgenstein . . . I was brought to speak of my admiration for Virgil and my idea of a grand opera on the Shakespeare model, having the second and fourth books of the Æneid as its subject. I added that I knew well what chagrins such a work would necessarily cause me, on account of which I could never attempt it. The Princess replied, 'From your passion for Shakespeare and your love of the antique, something grand and new should result. Come, you must write this opera, this lyric poem, call it and arrange it as you please. You must begin it and finish it.' As I continued to excuse myself, 'Listen to me,' said the Princess—if you are frightened at the trouble it will and ought to cause you, if you are feeble enough not to brave all for Dido and Cassandra, never present yourself at my house again; I will see you no more."

On this, Berlioz went back to Paris, and addressed himself to the great task, his whole soul, as well as all his hopes, being in it. For proof of this we need only turn to the letters. He writes to Morel (May 23, 1856):—

"I have undertaken an opera in five acts, the whole of which I write, words and music. I have reached the third act of the poem, having yesterday finished the second. This is between ourselves."

To the same (September 19, 1856):—

"I declare to you that the poem, which I have read to several persons, is a very great success. I believe that you also will find it good."

To M. Bennet (January 26, 1857):—

"Ill as I am, I push on. My score forms itself as stalactites form themselves in damp grottos, and almost without my knowing it. At this moment I am finishing the instrumentation of the monster finale of the first act, which up till now has, on account of its dimensions, given me serious uneasiness. . . . See how easily you draw me on to talk of my work. Ah! I have no illusions, no; and you make me laugh with that old story about a 'mission to fulfil.' What a missionary! But there is in me an inexplicable mechanism, which works in despite of reasoning, and I let it work because I am not able to hinder it."

To Morel (April 25, 1857):—

"In our little world my poem is at present making a success. I have read it twice before two competent tribunals, one at M. Edouard Bertin's, the other at my own house. They pronounced it good. At one of the Tuileries soirées lately, the Empress spoke to me about it a good deal. Later I will go and read it to their Majesties, if the Emperor has an hour to spare."

To Hans von Bülow (January 20, 1858):—

"You have no true idea, my dear Bülow, of the flux and reflux of contrary feelings which have agitated me since I began this work. At one time it is a passion, a joy, an emotion worthy of an artist of twenty years. Then it is a disgust, a coldness, a repulsion from my task which frightens me. I never doubt. I believe, and I cease to believe; then I rebelieve, and as the upshot I continue to roll my rock. Another great effort, and we shall arrive at the summit of the mountain, the one bearing the other."

These quotations, which might be extended to great length, show how "Les Troyens" possessed our master's mind during the three years and a half occupied in its composition. At last the work was finished, and Berlioz then took the bold step of writing a letter to the Emperor asking permission to read the poem at court. He was dissuaded by M. de Morny from sending it, but on one occasion, when at the palace, he ventured to address Napoleon III., and obtained permission to send the book for imperial inspection. Berlioz soon learned the wisdom of the counsel, "Put not your trust in princes." The Emperor never read the poem, and, although the Minister of State spoke fair words, nothing was done. But all the circumstances attending the fate of "Les Troyens" were disheartening—to a man of Berlioz' temperament, heartbreaking. At last, in very desperation, and against his better judgment, he consented to the production of the second part of the work, "Les Troyens à Carthage," by M. Carvalho, on the inadequate stage of the Théâtre Lyrique. The course of preparation nearly worried the composer to death. Point after point in the work was objected to by Carvalho or his advisers, and cut after cut had to be made. Finally (November 4, 1863) the first representation took place, and the critics, many of whom had felt the composer's keen lash, were let loose on the piece, which some of them treated with more passion than justice. Berlioz however, had his compensations. Letters poured in upon him; strangers stopped him in the street to shake his hand, and, although Carvalho cut the opera remorselessly after its initial performance, "Les Troyens à Carthage" ran for twenty-one nights. It should be added that, for twenty-two days, Berlioz was confined to his room by an access of his nervous malady, brought on through the worry of rehearsal. In this condition he wrote to M. Alexis Lwoff, who had spoken to him about another opera:—

"I thank you for the offer you have been good enough to make me of a subject for an opera, but I cannot accept it, my intention being decided to write no more. I have still three scores which the Parisians do not know, and I shall never find circumstances favourable enough to make them known. 'Les Troyens' was finished four years ago, and only the second part, 'Les Troyens à Carthage,' has been represented. There remains to produce 'La Prise de Troie.' I will never write again save for a theatre where I am blindly obeyed without remark—where I am the absolute master. And that will probably never be met with."

The bitterness of the composer's spirit is but slightly shown here. That only a part of his great opera should be performed, and performed indifferently, amid the sneers of enemies and the careless jokes of a public incapable of appreciating a great purpose, was a mortal blow. It struck him to the heart, and we do not wonder that he wrote some time after:—

"I am in my sixty-first year; I have no more hopes, or illusions, or vast conceptions; my son is nearly always far from me; I am alone; my contempt for the imbecility and untruth of men, my hatred of their atrocious ferocity, have grown to a head, and hour by hour I say to Death, 'When thou wilt.' What, then, is he waiting for?"

THE MUSICAL LIFE.

DR. STAINER, the Principal of the National Training School for Music, has adopted this heading, "The Musical Life," as the sub-title of his address to the scholars of that Institution. About the time that the address was delivered at Kensington Gore, Dr. Macfarren also gave his annual address to the pupils of the Royal Academy. The two distinguished musicians, with one common object at heart, have in different ways endeavoured to prepare the minds of the students under their charge for the artistic career before them, a career honourable and pleasurable, yet fraught with temptation and disappointment. Dr. Macfarren, in his address printed in our last number, has dealt chiefly with the technical side of the question; whilst Dr. Stainer, in his brilliant essay just published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co., has treated the subject more from a moral and social point of view. Looking at the question generally, were we asked what are the keynotes of the two addresses respectively, we should say that with Dr. Stainer it is "work," and with Dr. Macfarren "tradition"; not that the one would ignore the value of "five-finger exercises," or that the other would fail to instil in the minds of his young hearers a befitting reverence for the "forms" of the old masters. It is simply a matter of attacking the two ends of the same subject. We can all of us, and at any time of life, talk about great masters; but if in our youth we have sinfully neglected our five-finger exercises we can never be musicians, or at least in the opinion of the world, which will judge us not by what we know, but by what we can do. "To be musical," says Dr. Stainer, "is one thing, but to be a musician is quite another thing"; and he deplores the obtuseness of society, which cannot be induced to comprehend the distinction. A little talent for playing, or even for composition, may impose upon the ignorant, and lead the possessor to be looked upon as a prodigy; but the real question, says Dr. Stainer, is "whether he or she is capable of bearing technical training, intellectually, emotionally, physically; will the pretty stone we have found stand the process of polishing?" He judiciously adds, "Equally worthless is the hard worker, however successful, who lacks that refined sensitiveness which like some pure crystal seems to be ready to catch and reflect from all points even the faintest ray of the beautiful."

It is indeed a difficult matter for mothers to decide whether their children are of stuff hard enough to be polished, and at the same time crystalline enough to reflect the beautiful. The vulgar method with a family of daughters is to shake them up in a bag—that is, put them all to the piano and see what comes of it. Dr. Stainer very rightly condemns that rough and ready method as a waste of time and money; and seems inclined to favour the old Jesuit system of adapting education to special and individual capacities. He speaks also of "measurements of heads" and the convolutions of a child's brain. We thoroughly coincide with his general views on this subject; but, admitting the wisdom of applying the calipers and manipulating the crania of our offspring before delivering them into the hands of the music-master, still in face of prevalent prejudices against vivisection the particular convolutions of the brain will always be a difficulty. The more practical method, as Dr. Stainer advises, is to put the child who exhibits any musical talent at all under a careful and patient teacher, who "must be content with merely laying a good solid foundation."

He strongly warns parents against taking talented children from their ordinary studies to press forward their musical education. In such cases, the child at most creates a temporary sensation as an infant prodigy, and in course of time lapses as an adult into the ranks of commonplace people, and with a little knowledge of music and nothing else. Dr. Stainer is not an advocate for placing the laws of harmony before a child of tender years. He thinks it is liable to make it look too closely into the intellectual side of the art, and may engender a habit of anatomising chords and progressions which will somewhat damp the emotional side of the art. But in addition to the study of an instrument carried on simultaneously with a healthy school education, "the rudimentary grammar of music must of course be taught."

In regard to more advanced pupils, Dr. Stainer reminds them that a School of Music, such as that over which he presides, stands in exactly the same relation to a musician as a university does to a young man destined for the non-artistic professions. It improves his manners, takes the conceit out of him, and teaches the difference between honest rivalry and petty jealousy; but the stamp of the university, he is careful to remark, carries with it certain responsibilities. Dr. Stainer warmly encourages the patient workers in art, and cautions the alumni of Kensington against what the English politicians of an antique school used to call "those queer geniuses"; who with all their gifts are apt, as he says, to take a too easy-going view of the ordinary duties and responsibilities of life. He advises the students to vary their professional studies by dipping into poetry, philosophy and science, to rather eschew novels, to be polite to professional critics, and to otherwise fit themselves for their now recognised position in society. To these duties and accomplishments Dr. Macfarren would add a knowledge of languages as essential in widening the student's capacity for music. It is only to be hoped that it will not also widen their capacity for imbibing the revolutionary ideas which the worthy professor seems to so much dread, and lead to their imitating those composers of the present day who, Dr. Macfarren tells us, disregard principle and write combinations which abrogate the rules of harmony and of "form"—rules that are as "much rooted in the foundations of nature, as any subject which has engaged the attention of philosophers." That abstruse question we must leave Dr. Macfarren, the philosophers, and the unhappy musical students to settle amongst them. They will find it one of the plagues of a "musical life." If it be wholesome to warn the young musician against the moral vagaries of genius, it is not so clear why English students should be cautioned against revolutionary ideas. To give them their due, they are not over-prone to revolution. The great masters we are called upon piously to reverence and imitate from afar have all of them in their day been called revolutionists. We shall only be too happy to apply the term in a near future to any student of the Royal Academy, if we find the epithet be deserved.

ANOTHER SCHUBERT SYMPHONY?

EVERY student of Schubert's life notices with wonder the interval of six years between the composition of the symphonic fragment in B minor, and the Symphony in C, the one having been written in 1822, the other in 1828. The resultant question "Why did the master so long neglect the noblest form of instrumental art?" meets with no answer, and is so far from the possibility of answer that another instinctively shapes itself, and we demand, "Did he so neglect it?" As to this, the most earnest and diligent student of us all, Mr. George Grove, seems to have entertained a doubt eleven years ago, since, in a note to his Appendix to Coleridge's translation of Kreissle, we read:—

"Unless, indeed, the allusions in Schubert's letter to Kupelwieser, and Schwind's to Schubert, of March 31, 1824, and August 14, 1825 (see vol. ii., pp. 5 and 43), refer to a symphony written in the interval and not yet discovered."

At the time this incidental remark appeared amateurs were still excited by Mr. Grove's discovery of the "Rosamunde" music in Dr. Schneider's historic cupboard; and the words neither passed unnoticed nor without giving rise to hope that the trail, faint though it was, would be followed up and the quarry secured. The matter soon passed from the public mind, but not, it would appear, from that of Mr. Grove, who, in a letter to a daily contemporary, dated September 28 last, distinctly and formally reopened the question. It will be worth while to indicate with the utmost care, the points to which, in this letter, Mr. Grove drew attention.

First. "It is known that near the close of his short life Schubert dedicated a symphony to the Musical Society (Musik-Verein) of Vienna." This fact Mr. Grove absolutely proves by a quotation from a history of the Society written by "the accurate Herr C. F. Pohl," who, as librarian, had the fullest means of getting at the truth. The extract runs as follows:—

"At the meeting of the Committee of the Musik-Verein on October 9, 1826, Hofrath Kiesewetter mentioned that Franz Schubert, the composer, was anxious to dedicate a symphony of his composition to the Society. It was thereupon resolved that, without reference to the symphony, but simply as a recognition of his past services, and for his future encouragement and incitement, a sum of one hundred florins, C.M., should be paid to Schubert. At the same time, Herr Sonnleithner stated that if the treasurers were not in a position at the moment to pay the sum specified, he himself would advance it. Schubert thereupon, between October 9 and 12, 1826, sent in his composition with the following letter," &c.

So far all is clear. A symphony was written and handed over to the Society in 1826. What symphony? On this point Mr. Grove observed:—

Second. "This work must surely be a different one from that (the Symphony in C) referred to in the opening of my letter, of which the autograph is now in the library of the Musical Society of Vienna." How is this assertion supported? In the first place, by a point of date. The autograph is superscribed "March, 1828." Next, it contains no trace of having been specially intended for the Society; and next, it seems to have been in the possession of Ferdinand Schubert in 1838, when Robert Schumann saw it and obtained a copy. There is force, if not conclusiveness, in each of these facts. A work written in 1826 is not likely to be dated 1828; a manuscript dedicated and presented to a Society usually bears an inscription to that effect; and, having been so dedicated and presented, would not probably be found in the possession of the composer's brother, lying, with heaps of others, in what Schumann describes as "dirt and darkness."

Drawing an easy inference from all this, Mr. Grove asked, "Where is the score of the Symphony which Schubert submitted to the Society in 1826?" The first answer came from Vienna, out of the mouth of Herr Pohl, the already mentioned author and Society's librarian. Herr Pohl is "quite convinced that the Symphony in question is identical with the above" (that in C), and supports his conclusion by a series of assumptions. As to the date, Herr Pohl asks: "Is it not possible that Schubert took back his work for correction (and the corrections are many), and that he did not date it till afterwards?" In the next case, he declares that "Schubert's great symphony (in C) has been in fact among our archives since 1828, according to its number (xiii., 8,024); and if Schumann saw the score at Ferdinand Schubert's, it must have been a copy or the autograph lent for copying." Further, Herr Pohl contends that had a symphony been received in 1826, it would have appeared in the catalogue, and its existence would have been known to a number of the composer's contemporaries. Whereas the catalogue contains no entry of such a work, and Sonnleithner, who was mixed up with the transaction of 1826, and survived till 1873, never remembered its existence.

To all this Mr. Grove replies; and, first, as to the non-appearance of the work in the catalogue, he argues that "this is, at least, balanced by the statement in his (Herr Pohl's) own book (p. 15) that Schubert sent it in between October 9 and 12, 1826." The point that Schubert's contemporaries did not know of its existence is more directly met. Mr. Grove quotes from Schwind's letter to the composer, dated August 14, 1825: "How I long for our first meeting! We entertain great hopes of your symphony"; and also from a sketch of Schubert's life by his friend Bauernfeld written only seven months after the master's death: "Among the larger works of his later years belongs a symphony written in 1825 at Gastein, for which he had a peculiar affection." Further, Mr. Grove points out in the same sketch an entry in a catalogue of Schubert's then unpublished works: "1825. Grand Symphony. 1828. Last Symphony," while Kreissle's well-known biography mentions that Ferdinand Schubert ascribed one of his brother's symphonies to the year 1826.

Thus the matter stands at present. It is clear, as already intimated, that Schubert composed a symphony in 1825-6, and presented it to the Musical Society in 1826. As to the matter of its identification, the balance of argument goes to show that the work written in 1825 is not that which the Society possesses, with the date 1828. Herr Pohl's "possibility" that the master had the autograph back for correction and then dated it, may be admitted as a possibility, but is extremely improbable. It was Schubert's practice to date his MS. on the first page at the time of composing, and there is no evidence to prove that he departed from the rule in any case, neither is there any reason why he should have done so in this. Besides, we have the very positive statement of Bauernfeld, with its remarkable clause concerning Schubert's "peculiar affection" for his Gastein work. Too much importance cannot be attached to this. A biographer may hastily adopt and perpetuate a mere rumour as to the existence of a thing, but when he states a particular such as that just given, it is plain that he is dealing with more than a mere rumour—with, in short, a fact established long enough to gather around it other and confirmatory facts. If Schubert had a "peculiar affection" for the symphony of 1825, he must have done or said that which created an impression to this effect in the minds of his friends. And this, let us observe, argues very strongly against Bauernfeld being in error when he catalogued the "Grand Symphony" of 1825 as distinct from the "Last Symphony" of 1828. That the Musical Society's catalogue contains no entry of the earlier work, that the autograph is not in the library, and that men like Sonnleithner knew nothing about it, are facts of undoubted weight on the other side. But they are far from being important enough to settle the matter and bar all further inquiry. Investigation, indeed, may be carried on with hope, and especially should efforts be directed towards positively settling the question whether the "C major" dated 1828 is a corrected version of the Gastein Symphony of 1825. Till this is done, any search after the latter as an independent work would be purely speculative. Surely Herr Pohl will not entrench himself behind his firm conviction, and refuse to undertake a task for which no man is better equipped than he! And which may not, after all, be a difficult task. Once accomplished, amateurs will know that in searching for the Gastein symphony, they are not pursuing a shadow, but a substance.

In the course of his remarks upon the subject, Mr. Grove suggested a possibility that the missing work might be found in some nook or corner of the Society's library. In his eagerness he did it, not thinking of the somewhat heavy charge implied against Herr Pohl and his fellow officials. Mr. Grove is, doubtless, well assured that if the library contained the symphony its keepers would know where to put their hands upon it. At any rate what has passed need not lead to annoyance and lukewarmness in a cause which Herr Pohl and the Viennese amateurs have as much at heart as Mr. Grove and the amateurs of England.

JUBILEE OF THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE vitality of this Society, which has now reached its Jubilee year, is to be accounted for by the fact of its having been formed for a definite object, and conducted with a steadiness and perseverance in the good cause which has won for it the high estimation of all lovers of sacred music. Many still living can recollect the time when complete works by the great composers written to scriptural text had never been heard in this country. The "Ancient Concerts" provided the higher classes with some choice extracts from the best sacred writers, and the general public once a year was invited to a hybrid musical entertainment into which, although the religious element prevailed, secular pieces were freely admitted. It can scarcely, then, excite wonder that a sacred composition was popularly regarded as a collection of materials from which specimens were occasionally cautiously selected; and we can even call to recollection the remark of a country lady that, to the best of her belief, an Oratorio was "a concert in Lent." On August 21, 1832, five gentlemen met with a view to the establishment of an institution which should dispel this ignorance, and on January 15, 1833, a concert was given at the Chapel in Gate Street, Lincoln's Inn. The programme of the performance, however, proves that the promoters of this undertaking resolved, very wisely, that their lessons in sacred music should be at first suited to the capacity of their audience, for it consisted of selections from Handel's "Messiah" and "Funeral Anthem," and from Perry's "Fall of Jerusalem" and "Death of Abel," with Attwood's Coronation Anthem, "O Lord, grant the King a long life," and the Hymn, "Adeste fideles." In the following November the Society removed to a Chapel in Henrietta Street, Brunswick Square, afterwards to a room belonging to the Scottish Hospital in Fleur-de-Lis Court, Fleet Street; and at Midsummer, 1834, it established itself at Exeter Hall, which was its home until Michaelmas, 1880. At first the concerts were given in the Minor Hall; and although some short works were occasionally introduced, the programmes chiefly consisted of "selections." A performance given in the Large Hall, however, for the benefit of a Charity, was so successful that the Society was induced to retain the room for its own concerts, and at once to enter upon the system of giving complete Oratorios, a policy which has secured for it not only a large support in England, but an enviable fame in other countries. From this period the history of the Society became of the deepest interest. At the concerts in 1837 the first performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" in London took place, the work having afterwards been given twice under the composer's own direction. "Elijah," too, was conducted by Mendelssohn on four occasions, and the programmes also included the same master's "Lobgesang" and Forty-second Psalm. The devotion of the Society to the works of Handel has always been a distinguishing feature in the labours of this Association; and when it is said that as early as 1837 his great Oratorio, "Israel in Egypt," was performed, it will be seen that, although at first adapting the music to the level of the public taste, the directors speedily applied themselves to the nobler task of educating the public to the level of the music; for, notwithstanding that the "Messiah" had been for years growing into the hearts of the people, many of the composer's best Oratorios were only known in fragments, and "Israel in Egypt" had been long considered too "heavy" for general appreciation. Besides the works of Mendelssohn, those of other contemporary composers were constantly performed. Spohr's "Last Judgment," "The Fall of Babylon," and "The Christian's Prayer" were given under the composer's direction, and compositions by the Chevalier Neukomm had also occasionally a place in the programmes. The appointment of Mr. (now Sir Michael) Costa to the office of Conductor had an important and highly beneficial effect upon the affairs of the Society, for besides discharging in the most careful and conscientious manner the duties intrusted to him, he subjected both orchestra and choir to a more rigid supervision than had before been exercised; several reforms were carried out which had been for some time much needed, and the number of executants was increased to nearly 700. Under the conductorship of Sir Michael Costa, amongst the works introduced were Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" (in English), the fragments from "Christus," and music to "Athalie," Haydn's "Seasons," Spohr's "Calvary," Beethoven's Mass in D and "Mount of Olives" (with the original libretto), Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," Dr. Crotch's "Palestine," Benedict's "Legend of St. Cecilia," Costa's "Eli" and "Naaman," Macfarren's "John the Baptist," and Rossini's "Moses in Egypt." But it could scarcely be expected that an Institution so perfectly organised as the Sacred Harmonic Society would be content with merely appealing to the public to support a series of concerts every year. To preach the cause of high-class sacred music outside, as well as inside, the walls of Exeter Hall became almost a duty, and a triennial Festival in honour of Handel was the legitimate offspring of this self-imposed task. Gradually, however, the idea was developed; for on the centenary of the composer's death (in 1859), a performance of his works being contemplated (chiefly through the suggestion of the indefatigable Treasurer, Mr. R. K. Bowley), a preliminary Festival was held two years before, which established the fact that, with the powerful aid of the Sacred Harmonic Society, under the experienced conductorship of Sir Michael Costa, effect could be given to Handel's compositions such as had never before been heard. The Commemoration in 1859 (including the rehearsals) attracted 81,319 visitors, and this success led to the institution of a triennial Handel Festival which, under the auspices of the Sacred Harmonic Society, has continued to the present time. We may also mention that at the opening of the great Exhibition of 1851, and also at the inauguration of the Crystal Palace, the Society gave a significance to the musical solemnities of the occasion which cannot be overpraised, and certainly never can be forgotten by those who were present. When a change occurred in the proprietorship of Exeter Hall, the Society was compelled to quit a building around which so many associations had grown in the course of time; and the concerts, with a band and choir admirably fitted for the new locality, were given in 1880-81 at St. James's Hall.

The fiftieth anniversary of this institution is a fitting occasion for placing before our readers a record of its many claims to their regard. Had the Society merely kept sacred music alive at a time when operatic frivolities ruled the aristocratic world in the evening, and a few "benefit concerts" supplied musical light refreshments in the morning, it would have effected a great good, and earned a high name. But we have shown that it has done more than this; for, by the performance of entire Oratorios, it positively created that want which its vast resources enabled it so effectually to supply, and thus the public mind was led into a new channel, and the great sacred composers of the world began to draw around them a circle of true art-worshippers which has gradually widened to the present day. Let it not be thought, however, that the Society will rest content with the achievements of the past. A great future awaits it in its new abode, for the programme of the coming season proves that there is activity in the direction; and if this renewed vigour from within be met with increased support from without, the Jubilee year will assuredly be one of the most important epochs in the history of this excellent Society.

In reading notices of concerts, especially of those given in the country, we are often led to wonder why the persons engaged to write them are selected for that office. Assuredly it cannot be because they know anything of music, and the style of authorship amply proves that they have no claim to literary acquirements. From time to time we have given examples of the truth of these remarks; and a good specimen in a provincial paper now lies before us. The concert under notice, it is said, "commenced with a pianoforte solo from 'Oberon,'" played by a very young lady; and "the delicate precision and, for her strength, firmness with which she gave voice to the dumb wood before her to interpret through each varying phrase its emotions, evoked the wonder and heartiest applause of the audience." Then, speaking of a lady vocalist, who had a "charming presence," we are told that "the intelligent fidelity of her phrasing to the movement or the sentiment enables her to extract from the piece all the delight it is capable of yielding for the enjoyment of the audience." A violin-player with a foreign name, whose "beauty and cleverness" makes the impressionable critic "regret the apparent fact that she is not an Englishwoman," next appeared, "bearing a favourite violin beside her graceful form." After her performance a gentleman sang some verses "descriptive of the high jinks he indulged in while his wife was at the sea"; and a lady, "who had some minutes before set the audience on the broad grin" by her singing of "Thady O'Flynn," gave "'The Blue Alsatian Mountains,' as a voice near us whispered, divinely." Now if such a "criticism" as this can satisfy the readers of the journal in which it appeared, many persons may say that there can be no mercantile reason why anything better should be desired. But, even granting this, there surely is an artistic reason for a higher tone of writing. A concert may represent a low state of musical taste in a certain locality; but it is the duty of one who undertakes to comment upon the performance to do so in a manner calculated to raise that taste to a healthy appreciation of better works; and it will, we think, be freely admitted that this can scarcely be effected by dwelling upon a violinist's "graceful form," or by describing how a pianist "gave voice to the dumb wood before her."

WE had hoped that as a knowledge and love of music advanced, respect for those who practise the art would have advanced in proportion; and more especially had we deluded ourselves into the belief that persons to whom the duty of selecting an organist for a church is delegated were beginning to discover that artists competent to hold this position are not to be procured for a remuneration which would be considered extremely small even for a domestic servant where, in addition, "everything is found." A letter recently received, however, has undeceived us. It appears that, in answer to an advertisement for an organist to play a "fine new instrument" at a Presbyterian Church, our correspondent wrote for particulars, and the following was the reply: "The duties are two attendances on Sunday (and a third occasionally, if wanted) and one on Thursday evening, with a meeting once a week for practice with the choir. If we have a choirmaster, the organist's salary will be sixteen guineas a year. If the organist prefers to train the choir himself, the salary would probably be something more." We should have imagined that those who offered such terms for such duties would have been too glad to secure anybody who could drum through a simple service; but as the writer of the letter wishes to know whether the applicant, after this information, desires to become a "candidate," we may presume that there is to be a competition for the post. Unlike many of the advertisements of this kind which have come before us, there is no mention of anything which may be added to the duties of the organist by which the emolument may be slightly increased—such, for instance, as working at some handicraft trade when not wanted in the organ-loft, or sweeping out the church once a week; but it may probably be expected that the poverty of any artist who would become organist on these terms will excite compassion amongst the congregation, and that charity, which covereth a multitude of sins, will effectually cover the illiberality of an offer which for the due performance of so important an office is almost unparalleled.

OUR readers will doubtless remember that we have already commented upon the unseemly conduct of persons who, in spite of tacit remonstrances from those around them, will persist in holding an animated conversation during the performance of music, both at the Opera and in a concert-room. We find now that this subject has been warmly taken up by the press in Liverpool; for at the recent concert of the Philharmonic Society the talking of the majority of the fashionable portion of the audience so completely destroyed the effect of M. Saint-Saëns's Symphony as effectually to mar the enjoyment of those who had come to listen. The Liverpool Daily Post, in criticising this concert, spoke in no measured terms of this intolerable nuisance; and this drew, as might be expected, a torrent of letters, three of which were inserted. In thanking the editor for his public reproof of this growing evil, two of the correspondents suggest that the matter should be at once taken in hand by the committee, as any appeal to the offenders themselves has been fully proved to be useless. Strangely enough, however, one writer defends the practice, saying with charming candour, "A large portion, if not the majority, of the audience who attend the concerts go to them not to indulge any great passion for music, but rather to enjoy the facilities offered of seeing and conversing with their friends." The Philharmonic Concerts, he says, "are distinctly social, and the reason why past appeals to the committee have been futile is because the committee know and recognise this fact." The Liverpool Daily Post, in replying to this, very pertinently asks, "Then why have music at all? Why not have sofas and lounges plentifully provided, and give up the evening to social intercourse?" A very excellent suggestion indeed. The Philharmonic Society without music would quite meet the wishes of the talkers; and the listeners might go where music could be heard.

NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

ESTABLISHED in 1824, this Festival held its twentieth triennial meeting on Tuesday, the 11th ult., and the three following days. There were doubts at one time whether the enterprise possessed vitality enough for another effort. It had long been going downhill, with the usual increase of momentum under such circumstances, and even its best friends were growing despondent. The resignation of Sir Julius Benedict as conductor seems, however, to have determined the managers in not yielding without a struggle under new musical leadership. Signor Randegger was therefore appointed to the vacant post; the machinery was once more started, and now, speaking after the event, I am able to say that the Norwich Festival has taken a fresh lease of life.

Signor Randegger, being too experienced a man not to know how much a workman is dependent upon his tools, made as careful a selection of artists as the liberality of the committee allowed. With larger funds he might in some respects have done better; but on the whole he did well, engaging as solo vocalists Mesdames Albani, Osgood, Davies, Mudie-Bolingbroke and Patey; Messrs. Lloyd, McGuckin, King, Brockbank (a local bass) and Santley. The band numbered seventy-six instruments, selected with extreme care, Mr. Carrodus holding the principal violin, supported by players of exceptional ability, like Messrs. Burnett, Howell, Reynolds, Svensden, Dubrucq, Lazarus, Hutchins, Harper, &c. In fact, no better orchestra could have been engaged, and it rightly constituted the chief musical attraction. The chorus, nearly three hundred strong, and trained by Dr. Horace Hill, a musician of local repute, was not equally good. This, however, could hardly be charged to Dr. Hill, whose singers knew their work and did it intelligently, but lacked physical means. There were too many elderly people among them, from whose voices years had stolen freshness and resonance. Youth is wanted in a chorus, and no delicacy of feeling, however praiseworthy in itself, should permit veterans to "lag superfluous on the stage." With regard to the programme, it will be seen in the course of this record how boldly the new conductor assumed the existence at Norwich of a healthy musical curiosity. His policy, let me now say, was not, on the whole, a failure; but the statistics of the Festival show that the attraction of more familiar works alone secured a balance on the right side.

The proceedings may be said to have begun on the evening of Monday, the 10th ult., when more than 1,200 people paid half-a-crown each to attend a full rehearsal of "La Damnation de Faust" in St. Andrew's Hall. This was an innovation at Norwich, and is likely, I should say, to become an established practice. The formal opening took place, as usual, on Tuesday evening, Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" being then performed, in lieu of "Elijah," to a full house. "St. Paul" was of course familiar, as a whole or in part, and the audience seemed thoroughly to enjoy its many beauties; nor did the performance per se fail to deserve and receive admiration. Signor Randegger had his forces well in hand; the ensemble, if not perfect, was good; while special effects were made by the splendid singing of Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Mrs. Osgood, to whom fell the soprano solos, was, for her part, unwell, out of voice, and unable to do herself justice. On the whole, the Festival began capitally with Mendelssohn's elder oratorio, giving rise to a hopeful feeling hardly less a guarantee than a harbinger of success.

The doings of Wednesday began with a morning Concert, having in its programme a selection and Mr. Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch." No better selection was possible. It included Schubert's Symphonic Fragment in B minor; Bach's Motett, "Blessing, glory, wisdom, and thanks"; Mr. E. Prout's Concerto in E minor for organ and orchestra; a new "Ave Maria" by Verdi; and the Overture to Macfarren's "St. John the Baptist." Certainly this group may be called miscellaneous, but the miscellany was one of excellence; every item having a distinct value and a positive attraction. The performance of Schubert's lovely music showed the orchestra and the conductor at their best. We have had nothing superior in London for delicacy, expression, and unity. It was a genuine triumph, and as such acknowledged by delighted connoisseurs. I cannot say this for the execution of Bach's work, in which, though under the familiar direction of Dr. Hill, the chorus did not shine. Nor am I able to praise unreservedly the rendering of Mr. Prout's masterly Concerto. The composer conducted with, of course, a perfect knowledge as to requirements, but the orchestra failed him somewhat at times, while the organist, Dr. Bunnett, able as we all know him to be, seemed to lose nerve in presence of the more difficult pages of the work. It is no slight task, that of playing an elaborate Concerto under such circumstances as obtained at Norwich, and if a man has a weak point in his nervous system he is sure to suffer from it. To some weak point or other of this kind, and not to lack of skill, I attribute Dr. Bunnett's occasional want of clearness and his apparent confusion. The performance was quite good enough, however, to bring out the merits of a work which can boast of many, and entitles its composer to hold his head high among our creative musicians. Verdi's "Ave Maria," sung by Mrs. Osgood, belongs to the sickly sentimental school, for which I entertain no affection, and am unable to praise. Nevertheless, anything from Verdi's pen has interest, and should be heard with the respect due to a master. The Overture to "St. John the Baptist" impressed all with a sense of the power and imaginative strength that are its great characteristics. I need not enter upon a discussion of Mr. Sullivan's now well-known "Martyr of Antioch." A few words will suffice to record a good performance, under the composer's direction, and a flattering reception. The solos were sung by Madame Albani, Madame Patey, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Brockbank, and Mr. King, with an effect easy to conjecture, while the choruses of the Pagan maidens once more called forth admiring regard. The attendance at this Concert was not particularly large, there being many empty seats. In the evening Berlioz' "Faust" was performed to an audience smaller than that of the morning. It should, however, be remembered that eleven hundred people attended the rehearsal of this work, including many who no doubt would otherwise have heard it in the ordinary course. Some feeling appears to have been excited against "Faust" in Norwich. Religious susceptibilities were offended by the subject, and it is said that many members of the chorus were with difficulty persuaded to take part in the performance. This may have accounted for the small attendance of "patrons" and others over whom the "respectabilities" are dominant. But it did not impair the success of the work with its actual audience, who took to it in a very kindly spirit, and seemed to derive from it a good deal of enjoyment. The rendering of "Faust" had exceedingly familiar features in Miss Mary Davies's Margaret, Mr. Lloyd's Faust, and Mr. Santley's Mephistopheles. Mr. Brockbank, as Brander, completed a cast of sterling excellence, upon which it is needless to dilate. The chorus sang fairly well, but the orchestra carried off chief honours, playing magnificently, and being compelled to repeat the Hungarian March, the Dance of Sylphs, and Dance of Will o' the Wisps. "Faust" was an unquestionable success, and the fact is of good omen for its provincial fortune.

The Concert of Thursday morning opened with Beethoven's Overture to "Egmont," by way of prelude to the sacred Cantata, "St. Ursula," composed expressly for the Festival by Mr. F. H. Cowen, who conducted its performance. Mr. Francillon, the author of the poem, has founded his work upon one of the many versions of a legend which says that Ursula, daughter of Dionotus, King of Cornwall, being asked in marriage by Conan, Prince of Brittany, requested three years' grace in order that she, with 11,000 virgins, her companions, might obey the Divine behest and sail from their native shores whither Providence would direct. So sailing, the legend goes on to tell, they proceeded up the Rhine to Basle, and from Basle to Rome, returning whence, they were attacked at Cologne by an army of Huns and all put to death; Ursula preferring martyrdom to the throne of the savage prince, and Conan, who had come in search of his love, dying with her. This story is dealt with only in part by Mr. Francillon. He takes from it three scenes; first, that in which Ursula receives the heavenly command and asks leave to depart; second, the departure itself; and third, the massacre and martyrdom. It is, of course, to be regretted when a narrative presents itself after so fragmentary a fashion, but no other course was possible within the limits of a Cantata. Much had to be left out, and that which has been retained includes the more important and exciting episodes. Mr. Francillon's poem is, however, not at all exciting. Even in its crises it stirs no one's blood, but goes calmly on, with a sedateness and monotony of style somewhat exasperating under the circumstances. This was not in Mr. Cowen's favour, and he has reason to complain of not having enjoyed all the support that a libretto written with studied reference to musical effect so readily gives. The composer, however, set about his task in a very earnest spirit; not thinking so much of popularity as animated by true zeal. Wherefore his music commands the sincere respect of those who cannot entirely approve the principles which have determined its character. Up to this point Mr. Cowen had laboured on the classic lines of the great masters, not even his Scandinavian Symphony, with all its distinctiveness, showing the smallest departure therefrom. But here he suddenly starts up as an illustrator of the "advanced" school, the entire machinery of which he sets in motion. "Representative themes" are displayed from first to last in even an exaggerated style, so that the ear becomes weary of the continual iteration and reiteration of a few phrases. The orchestra is relied upon for effect—even tuneful effect—much more than the voices; there is an obvious sacrifice of melody for the sake of mere chords, and the leading themes are, in many cases, as angular as the attitudes of an æsthetic. These remarks do not, of course, apply in the same measure to every number, for there are instances in which Mr. Cowen has not been able to shake off the influences of his old love. They do apply, however, in the main. I am sorry for it—sorry to see a composer of ability yielding to the temptations of a false and unworthy form of art. He may thereby catch the "most sweet voices" of a turbulent minority; but if he be wise he will hark back to the point where he diverged from the path trodden by the great masters—the only path of honour and safety. "St. Ursula" will no doubt be performed in London during the forthcoming season, till when a consideration of details may be postponed. Yet let me at once testify to certain beauties that lie on the surface—amongst them masterly and picturesque scoring, great force of expression without strained use of means, and a facile adaptation of music as an illustrative medium to the varied scenes of the story. Looking at these things the connoisseur takes off his hat to "St. Ursula," even while wishing that the work was other than it is. The Cantata was well, if not enthusiastically, received, and so performed as to put its merits in the best light. With Madame Albani as Ursula, Madame Patey as Ineth, a companion of the princess, Mr. Lloyd as Conan, and Mr. King as Dionotus and the Chief of the Huns, the leading parts were in safe hands, while, if the chorus was but moderately good, the orchestra made amends by surpassing excellence. The applause bestowed upon Mr. Cowen at the close of his work may be imagined. Mendelssohn's "Athalie" followed the novelty: solos by Mrs. Osgood, Miss Davies, and Madame Bolingbroke; Mr. Santley reading the illustrative verses. Our eminent baritone made a successful début as an elocutionist; giving the lines with a clear enunciation, just emphasis, and a fervour of style that left no doubt as to the fact of his heart being in his task. He was much applauded, as was the performance of "Athalie" generally. The favourite trio, "Hearts feel that love Thee," had to be repeated, almost as a matter of course. In the evening of Thursday took place a "grand symphonic, operatic and ballad" Concert; the programme, as may be imagined from the title, containing many things appealing to many tastes. To this, perhaps, was due the fact of a larger attendance than usual, though the result seemed doubtful till the Committee made a special arrangement with Madame Albani, whose name did not originally appear. Then the tickets sold. With such a public, let Festival managers note, they have to deal, and let them shape their course accordingly. The chief feature in the programme was Mr. A. Goring Thomas's Choral Ode, "The Sun-Worshippers," a notice of which appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES for October. To the remarks made last month little need be added beyond what is required to justify the composer's special treatment of his subject. The pianoforte score could not reveal the bright, picturesque style in which Mr. Thomas has illustrated Delavigne's poem, nor the wealth and propriety of his orchestration. Let me say emphatically that in all essential respects the "Sun-Worshippers" is a notable addition to English music, and one that must ensure a hearing for anything its composer chooses to bring forward in future time. The reception of the work was eminently favourable, all the numbers being applauded, and one—the solo and chorus, "Fairest of lands"—encored, while at the end Mr. Thomas was called to the platform and warmly congratulated. The solos were taken by Mrs. Osgood and Mr. Barton McGuckin, of whom the lady, with her voice restored to her, made a decided "hit." A second novelty of importance at this concert was Mr. Walter Macfarren's Overture to "Henry V.," composed for the occasion. Mr. Macfarren here seeks to depict the martial enthusiasm of England, the state of the English army on the eve of Agincourt, Henry's courtship of the French princess, and his triumphant return home. The work is well done. Brilliant effects naturally predominate, but the love subject is a charming contrast, and highly melodious in itself. Moreover, the design of the Overture is so clear, and its details so musically, that I cannot but speak of it in terms of praise. The orchestra gave the new piece an effective rendering under the composer's guidance, and elicited much applause. The rest of the programme contained Haydn's Symphony in E flat (No. 3), the Overture to "Rienzi" and a number of vocal selections that need not even be named.

Friday, a day of tempest; day, also, of the "Messiah." Result of the one, in spite of the other, a room crowded to suffocation, and everybody gratified. So may it be—save the tempest—always. The Festival closed in the evening with another "symphonic, operatic, and ballad concert"; symphony being represented by a new work from the pen of Mr. J. F. Barnett. This novelty was described in the jargon of modern music as a "symphonic poem," and entitled, the "Harvest Festival," because written to illustrate verses wherein Miss Mary Lemon gives an idyllic description of a harvest-home. There are four scenes presented, viz., Gleaners in the Cornfield—a moderato leading to an allegretto vivace; Reapers entering the Village Church—andante con moto, andante religioso; Dance of Reapers and Gleaners—allegretto pastorale; Harvest Home—allegretto moderato, leading to Hymn of Thanksgiving for chorus and orchestra. This is a comprehensive and ambitious programme, but Mr. Barnett has treated it with studied simplicity, so as not to be in any sense at variance with the character of the subject. His themes are tuneful and pleasing, while their treatment is easy, natural and effective. Nowhere does the composer go himself, or take his hearers out of depth; and, if the work cannot be credited even with the greatness now often supposed to lie hidden in that which is obscure and unintelligible, neither can it be charged with a suspicion of ugliness. The first three movements, especially, are examples of suave and soothing music, "such as charmeth sleep," or falls on the sense like the south wind that has blown over a bank of violets. Mr. Barnett should be thanked instead of blamed for giving us a musical sedative at a time when composers generally are less scrupulous than the ghost of Hamlet's father, and take a pride in harrowing up our souls. No doubt this "symphonic poem" will, in the form of a pianoforte duet, pass into general circulation. Besides the "Harvest Festival," capitally played under the composer's direction, the programme contained the Overtures to "Prometheus," the "Naiades" and "Ali Baba," together with a considerable number of songs and ballads in which the audience took great delight.

That the twentieth Norwich Festival was a success, both artistic and pecuniary, is creditable to all concerned, but especially to Signor Randegger, whose unsparing labours and great skill as a Conductor mainly brought it about. The Committee honoured themselves when, on the Friday, they expressed a hope that he would direct the Festival of 1884, and also compose a work for that occasion.

HUDDERSFIELD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

In this thriving, rapidly growing, and musical town two events of great interest and of more than local importance have recently taken place. On the afternoon of Tuesday, the 18th ult., the mayor (Alderman Thomas Denham) formally opened the first Town Hall in the borough, erected at a cost, including the corporation offices, of £60,000. On the following Thursday, Friday, and Saturday the opening of the Town Hall was celebrated with a Musical Festival. Hitherto the town has had no building in which first-class concerts on a large scale could be given or listened to with comfort and pleasure to musicians or the public; but the new Town Hall has provided a large, very beautiful, and suitable room, capable of seating 2,400 persons. The Choral Society, the Glee and Madrigal Society, and the Orpheus Amateur Vocal Society, zealous in the cause of music, determined upwards of twelve months ago to arrange for the Musical Festival to be held, and obtained from the Corporation a promise of the free use of the Town Hall, upon its being completed, for the purpose. The Corporation also granted the use of a very fine organ, purchased for £1,500 from the Albert Hall Company, Newport, Monmouthshire, built only a few years ago by the eminent firm of Willis & Co., of London, and removed and re-erected at Huddersfield

Town Hall by Messrs. James Conacher & Sons, organ-builders, Huddersfield. At a meeting in the Mayor's parlour a guarantee fund was set on foot and a committee appointed. A large number of influential noblemen and county gentlemen also gave their names as patrons, and in a short time a sum of nearly £5,500 was guaranteed by 414 ladies and gentlemen for the expenses of the Festival, which it was estimated would be rather over £3,000. Mr. Joshua Marshall, the Conductor of the Choral Society and the Glee and Madrigal Society, was appointed Chorus-master, and it was decided to have a chorus of paid singers and amateurs, seeing that with more amateurs than usual at the last Leeds Festival the chorus singing was fully as powerful as, and even more expressive than, on any previous occasion. The requisite number of vocalists was speedily obtained from Huddersfield and surrounding towns, including many who sang at the Leeds Festival, and was made up as follows: 67 sopranos (27 amateurs), 40 contraltos (24 amateurs), 26 altos (5 amateurs), 68 tenors (15 amateurs), 62 basses (18 amateurs), and 14 boys (trebles and altos), or a total of 277 voices, of whom (excluding the boys) 89 were amateurs. Mr. Walter Parratt, Mus. Bac., of Magdalen College, Oxford, a native of Huddersfield, was appointed Festival Organist. The committee arranged for four principal Concerts (one miscellaneous) and one popular Concert, and selected for performance Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Spohr's "Last Judgment," Rossini's "Stabat Mater," and Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Mr. Hallé's fine band was engaged, and Mr. Hallé himself was chosen as Conductor. The following principals were also engaged: Madame Albani, Miss Mary Davies, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Santley, and Mr. King. The chorus rehearsed the above-named works, as well as Wesley's chorus, "In exitu Israel," and a number of part-songs and glees (including a part-song to Longfellow's "Stars of the summer night," by Mr. Marshall, the Chorus-master), twice a week for several months. Mr. Hallé conducting a full rehearsal with principals and band on the day before the Festival commenced. The Committee was placed in some difficulty as late as the 19th ult., in consequence of receiving a letter from Madame Trebelli's agent saying that cold and sore throat would prevent her from leaving Russia; but fortunately arrangements were made with Madame Patey to sing the music previously announced to be sung by Madame Trebelli.

The Festival commenced on the Thursday morning with every prospect of success. "Elijah" was the work performed. The chorus was not quite so well balanced as it might have been, owing to the altos and tenors being weaker than the trebles and basses, which were exceptionally brilliant. The music, however, was familiar to most of the singers, and the whole of the choruses were sung with wonderful spirit, unanimity of attack, precision, power, and good intonation. The "Baal" choruses were splendidly declaimed, without a shade of clamorous roughness, and "Thanks be to God" was given with fine effect. Miss Mary Davies sang the principal soprano music in the first part, and was joined by Madame Albani in the second. The former sang with much success in the duets "Zion spreadeth her hands" and "What have I do with thee?" Madame Albani gave a brilliant rendering of "Hear ye, Israel," and Madame Patey produced her usual effect in "O rest in the Lord," for which she was encored. Mr. Lloyd sang "If with all your hearts" and "Then shall the righteous," the latter being redemanded. Mr. Santley proved that he can still sing the music of the Prophet in an unrivalled manner, and his efforts were rewarded by warm and well-deserved applause throughout. The double quartet, as usual, was not well sung, chiefly in consequence of want of rehearsal. The other quartets were carefully rendered, the local singers contributing their share in a creditable manner. The trio, "Lift thine eyes," by Madame Albani, Miss Davies, and Madame Patey, created a marked effect. The accompaniments by band and organ were very finely played throughout.

In the evening a miscellaneous Concert was given. The chief features were the magnificent playing by the band of the Overture to "Oberon," Beethoven's Symphony in F major, the Overture to "Tannhäuser," Valse (lente and pizzicati), by Délibes, and the Pageant March, from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba," an excellent rendering of Wesley's chorus, "In exitu Israel" (except in regard to the attack by the altos), of Mr. Marshall's part-song, "Stars of the summer night" (a composition not very original, but with a nice smooth melody and effective modulations), an organ solo, "Air, with variations and Finale Fugato" (composed by Henry Smart for the opening of the organ in the Albert Hall), well played by Mr. Parratt; a splendid rendering by Madame Albani of the air, "Souvenir dei prim' anni," from Hérold's "Le Pré aux Clercs" (with violin obbligato by Herr Straus), and the expressive and beautiful singing by the same lady of "Angels ever bright and fair." Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, and Mr. King also contributed successfully to the programme.

On Friday morning Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" were performed. Spohr's solemn and impressive work successfully tested the finish and expression of the choir; and the solo vocalists, Miss Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, and Mr. King, were thoroughly satisfactory. In the performance of the "Stabat Mater" Madame Albani took the place of Miss Davies, the other principals being the same as in the previous work. Madame Albani sang the air in the "Inflammatus" magnificently, and she and Madame Patey were compelled to repeat the duet "Quis est homo."

On Friday evening "La Damnation de Faust" (which had been looked forward to with much interest) was performed. Miss Mary Davies, who is so well acquainted with the part of Margaret, sang finely; Mr. Lloyd, as Faust, displayed his voice and musicianly ability with wonderful effect; and Mr. Santley was exceedingly successful in the sardonic part of Mephistopheles. Mr. King was not so satisfactory as Brander, especially in the Rat Song. The band was exceptionally good throughout, the brilliant Hungarian March, the enchanting Dance of Sylphs (both of which were encores and repeated), the peculiar yet beautiful Dance of the Will o' the Wisp, the terrible Ride to the Abyss, and the Apotheosis of Margaret creating quite an enthusiasm with the audience. The choir sang with wonderful brilliancy and power, particularly in the Easter Hymn, and the Soldiers' and Students' Chorus, and with much expressiveness in the Celestial Chorus. After the performance Mr. Hallé told the members of the choir in a very felicitous manner that he could not possibly go away from Huddersfield without thanking them personally for the great treat they had given him; he never, he said, had conducted a better chorus, and perhaps hardly so good a one for refinement, perfect truth of intonation, expression, and, considering the number, for power. Three hearty cheers were then given for Mr. Hallé, with whose conducting the choir was delighted.

The Festival was brought to a close on the Saturday evening with a popular concert, in which Miss Davies, Madame Patey, Mr. Maas, Mr. King, and a local rising tenor, Mr. H. Beaumont, took part. Mr. Marshall conducting the chorus and sharing the accompaniments with Mr. E. Ibesson, his pupil, who was the accompanist at nearly the whole of the rehearsals. The success of the Festival was in a great measure due to the efforts of the committee, the well-directed and untiring energy of the honorary secretaries (Mr. G. Lewis Batley and Mr. T. G. Sharpe), the incessant labour of Mr. Marshall (the chorus-master), and the perseverance and ability of the choir. In conclusion, it may be said that the majority of those who attended the concerts have expressed the hope that a Festival on a similar scale will be organised triennially.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE two Crystal Palace Concerts which fall within the scope of the present notice have not been remarkable for any very interesting or novel features. The opening performance given on Saturday, the 15th ult, introduced, besides Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Overtures to "Der Freischütz" and "Guglielmo Tell," the Ballet-music from Gounod's "Le Tribut de Zamora," produced at the Grand-Opéra on April 1 of the present year. In this class of dramatic art a ballet-interlude is de rigueur, and M. Gounod, like most other French composers, is remarkable for the graceful and characteristic dance-tunes which it thus becomes his duty to produce. At the performance of the opera in Paris the ballet indeed was one of the prominent and most immediately popular features. There are five distinct numbers, of which the second, a Danse Grecque and Pas des Guirlandes, is the most graceful. In the case of none of the pieces, however, is the absolute musical value sufficient to warrant its performance in a concert-room. Music of this kind belongs to the stage, and the directors of the Saturday Concerts might have left it there with advantage to themselves and their clients. The Misses Robertson were the vocalists at this Concert.

The second performance of the series was, all things considered, an improvement upon the first. In the first instance it introduced a new work by an English composer. It is true that the work in question—an overture, "Niagara," by Mr. F. H. Cowen—cannot be called an important or favourable specimen of its author's skill. Perhaps it might have been considered as such a year or two ago; but since the production of his Scandinavian Symphony, followed up by the great success of "St. Ursula" at Norwich, Mr. Cowen may claim a lasting, if not the first place, amongst English composers; and the demands raised by such a position are scarcely realised in his new overture, which is remarkable neither for boldness of conception nor yet for that pictorial element which the title implies. As an ordinary concert overture it might pass muster; as a musical representation of one of the grandest natural phenomena in the world it is colourless and altogether inadequate. In this, as in other cases, noblesse oblige.

The Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz formed a second important item of the programme. It was heard twice last season at Mr. Ganz's Concerts, but was new to the Sydenham audience. Mr. Ganz, it will be remembered, secured a very admirable performance, as far as possible in accordance with the composer's instructions. The orchestra had been enlarged for the purpose, and even the bells demanded by Berlioz had been procured at considerable trouble and expense. The directors of the Saturday Concerts had taken a more matter-of-fact view of the case, and the aforesaid bells were represented by a grand piano—with what result those may imagine who know with what amount of care and minuteness Berlioz designed his orchestral effects. The performance under Mr. Manns was upon the whole praiseworthy, but the Ball scene was wanting in that delicacy of light and shade and rhythmical nuance which alone distinguish its chief theme from an ordinary valse. Of the work itself we have previously spoken. Its sequel, "Lelio, ou le Retour à la Vie," an afterthought of Berlioz, was to be performed at the third Concert of the series, too late for notice in this month's issue. This work, a curious mixture of declamation, orchestral music, and song, will on that occasion be heard for the first time in England, and we shall therefore return to it in our next number.

Not having had an opportunity of commenting upon the prospective arrangements for the current season of Saturday Concerts, we may subjoin a list of the principal novelties promised to the subscribers. These are, in addition to those already named, scenes (instrumental and vocal) from Goetz's posthumous opera, "Francesca da Rimini," and a symphony, entitled "Chivalry," by Mr. Henry Leslie, provided it is finished in time. Every endeavour will also be made to secure the new pianoforte concerto by Brahms, composed not many months ago. This list—which, however, may very probably be enlarged as the season goes on—cannot be said to be very promising. But then, as the directors say, "the main interest of the selections for the season will be placed in the favourite works of the established classical masters"; an announcement less open to objection than that contained in the continuation of the sentence, to the effect that "more prominence will be given than has hitherto been the case to the popular overtures of Rossini, Cherubini, Auber, and Weber, and the best specimens of ballet-music of eminent composers." Popular overtures and dance-music have not contributed much to the acknowledged excellence of the Crystal Palace Concerts, which every one but the directors hitherto thought to be perfectly satisfactory. Perhaps experience will teach them the wisdom of leaving well alone.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

ALTHOUGH the director of these Concerts found it expedient to abandon his proposed autumnal campaign with Herr Richter, as far as regards the provinces, the London part of it was carried out; two Concerts having been given in St. James's Hall, one on the 24th and the other on the 29th ult. We can only now speak of the first, which was largely attended and in every respect successful, as well as of great interest, owing to the production of new or unfamiliar works. The performance opened with the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger"—music too well known for comment. It was splendidly executed under the vigorous and decisive bâton of the Viennese conductor, who, unless he be made of stone or wood, must have felt stimulated to particular effort by a reception the warmth of which approached enthusiasm. Following this example of the "Zukunft," came a setting by Berlioz (Op. 7) of six lyrics, "Les Nuits d'Été," from the graceful pen of Théophile Gautier, and admirably rendered into English by Francis Hueffer. Looking at the character of the audience at this Concert, we will not go so far as to say that the performance of the entire work was a mistake; but it cannot be rash to assume that many amateurs present were disposed to do the music injustice, through very weariness of its unchanging melancholy. Several of the songs are long drawn-out, one or two are extremely sad, and all are serious. The way to ensure their acceptance, therefore, is to produce them one at a time, which course may be the more easily adopted, because, though a connecting link is obvious, each can stand alone. Very few particulars respecting the songs are obtainable. Berlioz makes no mention of them in his "Memoirs," nor do his biographers notice them so as to throw any light upon their history, while the opus number cannot even be depended upon as indicating the period of their composition. They were originally published by Richault, of Paris, for voice and piano only; but the nature of the accompaniment is sufficient evidence, were none other forthcoming, that it was written for a small orchestra. Berlioz, indeed, was not likely to use the pianoforte, if he could avoid it. He could not play the instrument, and is "reasonably suspected" of caring very little about it. To the rule of neglect, however, the pianoforte part in "Lélio" forms a conspicuous exception. An elaborate review might be written upon the distinctive features of these remarkable works, but we must be satisfied here with a few passing observations. The opening number, "When the time of happy spring is nearest" has a certain air of appropriate simplicity, the effect of which, however, is neutralised by the surprise of repeated and unexpected transitions, which invest the whole with a strained and artificial character. It is difficult to sing well, and the obstacle, we are bound to say, was not overcome by Mdlle. Louise Pyk. Number two, "The spectre of the rose" (for contralto), is more elaborate in structure and, while not less individual, much more beautiful. The scoring is imaginative in the highest degree, distracting attention alike from the voice and poem. In these respects number three, "My own true love has left me" (for baritone or contralto), forms a worthy companion, while its sadness deepens into a gloom through which one may at times dimly discern marble tombs and sheeted ghosts. The song was rendered excellently well by Mr. King, who obtained loud applause. Number four, "Return, return, unto my bosom" (for soprano or tenor), is altogether beautiful—a "gem of purest ray serene," to the brilliancy of which voice and accompaniment contribute in just proportion. Nothing more intensely expressive and, at the same time, more truly lovely can be found within the range of vocal art. In this piece Mdlle. Pyk, as may be supposed, did herself greater justice. Number five, "Know ye the tomb of marble stone?" (for tenor), furnishes another striking example of Berlioz' resources in orchestration; while what in this respect number six, "Say, fairest maiden," loses is made up for through a welcome approach to cheerfulness. Although the performance, by Mdlle. Pyk, Miss Orridge, Mr. Shakespeare, and Mr. King, aided by Herr Richter's orchestra, was, on the whole, careful and intelligent, and although the interest of the music obtained frank recognition, so long a course of gloom made the end welcome.

The work of Berlioz was followed by a Pianoforte Concerto composed and, as to its solo part, played by Mr. Eugene D'Albert, whose reputation as a juvenile wonder ensured an attentive and sympathetic hearing. There is always a danger, in cases where very young people come forward with a production beyond their years, of running into extravagant assertion and raising hopes in proportion. We wish to avoid that, because so many instances have occurred in which a highly promising and even sensational début has led to nothing in the end. Our purpose therefore is not prophecy. We shall not say that Mr. D'Albert is a genius, nor lead our readers to see in him a shining light of the future. Let that be as it may. Our business is, however, to speak of the Concerto as we find it, and to recognise in the work a very remarkable, nay, an astonishing thing for so young a composer. It seems to claim nothing on the score of juvenile authorship, but is uncompromising in its pretensions to rank with the chief of its kind; largely developed, ambitious in style and character, and rigidly observant of classic form, while redundant in matter. Redundancy, in point of fact, together with a certain reckless daring, are its principal failings. Each movement contains too much, episodes being expanded till they are co-ordinate with the principal themes; nor is the harmonic wealth less profuse than the melodic. Such exuberance surprises, and to a certain extent gratifies; but the Concerto loses through it in point of clearness, order, and the consciousness that should always prevent the saying of a word more than is necessary to logical and dialectic completeness. We might have expected this, since in music, as in other things, "youth will be served." With this, however, we must recognise a mastery over the resources of art—resources alike of fancy and expression—such as are very rarely met with in one so young. Into the details of the work we purposely refrain from going. It must be heard again before either description or judgment would be warranted; but no little is said for Mr. D'Albert's success by the fact that desire to hear it again is strong. The Concerto was admirably played as regards the orchestra, but the solo would have gained in the hands of a stronger performer than Mr. D'Albert, and by being executed upon a better instrument than was chosen for the occasion. The composer was loudly applauded after each movement, and three times recalled at the close, amid genuine excitement.

Beethoven's Choral Symphony ended the Concert, and, generally speaking, was rendered in better style than on any former occasion, the chorus being thoroughly up to its work and singing faultlessly. The solos, intrusted to the artists already named, have been heard to greater advantage. Saturday's concert included in its programme Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and a selection from the works of Richard Wagner.

BRIGHTON AQUARIUM CONCERTS.

THE Classical Concerts so successfully begun at the Brighton Aquarium last season, under the direction of Mr. F. Corder, were resumed on Saturday, the 15th ult., and have since been continued weekly, attracting good audiences and giving great satisfaction to the more cultured amateurs of the town. As far as the programmes have yet gone, they convey the very gratifying idea that pecuniary considerations, which necessarily govern more or less all such enterprises, do not find orchestral symphonies and other works of a class equally high incompatible with their requirements. Had an opposite result obtained there would have been no occasion for surprise. A classically minded audience cannot be got together in a day, nor in a year, and good prospects are often ruined by sensitive financiers, who, because returns are not immediate, refuse to credit the possibility of any returns at all. There seems to be more faith somewhere in the councils of the Brighton Aquarium, and hence perseverance to the present time. This perseverance, if continued, will meet its reward, since we cannot suppose that Fortune, even in her most fickle mood, will make at Brighton an exception never yet presented elsewhere.

The orchestral selections at the first Concert were the overture to "Tannhäuser," Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Beethoven's First Symphony, and Massenet's "Scènes Pittoresques"; to which was added an "arrangement" for strings of the little piece entitled "Traumerei" in Schumann's "Kinderscenen"—though why the pretty trifle should have been presented save as the composer wrote it is hard to discover. Familiar as all these works are, we need only touch upon the character of their performance by Mr. Corder's small yet well-selected orchestra. Every piece was played with great care, and in a style that spoke no less for the skill of the executants than for the ability of the conductor. Circumstances, moreover, made up for the limited number of the instruments. Recent alterations in the conservatory have turned the place from a bad into a good concert-room, and the effect even of a diminutive orchestra is now pretty nearly all that can reasonably be desired. The Violin Concerto, we should add, was played by Signor Guerini, who appeared to be over-weighted by its difficulties. Mrs. Osgood was the vocalist.

The 22nd ult., being the anniversary of Liszt's birth in 1811, afforded justifiable reason for the performance of several works by that much-debated composer; choice falling upon the pianoforte concerto in E flat, "Mazeppa"—the "symphonic poem" so called—and two songs for which an orchestral accompaniment had been written by Mr. Corder. This was undoubtedly a bold venture, especially as regards the extraordinary combination of sounds to which Liszt has given the name of the Prince of the Ukraine. Here, if anywhere in music or in the regions lying just outside the art, noise is required—what sort of noise may signify little, but there must, at any rate, be "sound and fury." Under these circumstances the effect actually produced was remarkable. With such spirit and energy did the executants discharge their task that even amateurs who thought their labour and skill might have been directed to a better purpose must have applauded the conductor and his followers without reserve. The solo in the concerto was ably executed by Mr. Oscar Beringer, whose sympathies aid his executive ability in overcoming the difficulties of modern music. With Beethoven's Second Symphony as representative of the noblest order of classical art, with Chopin's delightful Ballade in A flat as a relief from graver matter, and with songs by Miss Ronayne and Mr. Henry Guy, the Concert ran a very successful course.

Last Saturday the "Eroica" Symphony was to be performed for, it is said, the first time in Brighton; Mr. Kuhe being announced as pianist and Madame Sterling as vocalist. If the inhabitants of Brighton do not adequately support an enterprise managed like this, they deserve to have reflected upon themselves all the ignominy of failure.

LYCEUM THEATRE.

THE performances of Italian Opera at this establishment, which commenced on the 1st ult., demand record rather than criticism, for nothing has been included in the series save the well-worn works presented to the subscribers of our two lyrical theatres during the fashionable season. On the opening night Mdle. Marimon was warmly welcomed as the heroine in Meyerbeer's "Dinorah," and Signor Padilla (who made his début on the occasion) achieved a decided success in the part of Hoel. His voice is a baritone of agreeable quality, and when he gets thoroughly accustomed to the limited size of the house, his singing will be heard with more pleasure. Madame Rose Hersee made her reappearance as Gilda in "Rigoletto" on the following Monday, and proved that she had lost nothing of her former qualifications, either as singer or actress. Mdle. Léon Duval, who made a tolerably good impression as Leonora in "Il Trovatore," suddenly disappeared from the company; and with the exception of Miss Helen Armstrong, who displayed a good mezzo-soprano voice in the character of Azucena in the same opera, no other first appearances deserve mention. The operas have been frequently varied, and the attendances tolerably good. Signor Tito Mattei has replaced Signor Li Calsi as Conductor; but neither band nor chorus is what we should expect in a well-appointed opera-house.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

THE first Gentlemen's Concert of the season was given on the 17th ult. The principal orchestral work was Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale in E, a work replete with the singular beauty of melody of which Schumann was master, and free from the complicated figures which occasionally detract from the lucidity of his compositions. It was exceedingly well played, as was also Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors," in which the great pianist shows that his skill in developing themes is not equal to his power of producing them. Herr Tivadar Nachèz, a Hungarian violinist, who made his first appearance here, was unfortunate in his choice of Ernst's Concerto in F sharp minor, a work as weak and formless as it is difficult. Herr Nachèz is an excellent executant, his tone is of good quality, though rather thin, and his harmonics are of unusual accuracy. In the Concerto the fact that his violin was not in tune with the orchestra completely counteracted any merits his performance would otherwise have had; but in two clever "Danses Tsiganes" of his own he was thoroughly successful. Madame Marie Roze and Mr. Barrington Foote were the vocalists.—Mr. De Jong commenced his eleventh series of Popular Concerts on the 8th ult. His orchestra, which numbers sixty performers, is better balanced than that of last season, and considerable improvement is evident in the string and wood-wind departments. The Overtures to "Der Freischütz" and "Marco Spada," a selection from Meyerbeer's "Roberto," and sundry smaller pieces were excellently played; the accompaniments were not, however, altogether satisfactory. Mr. Howard Reynolds gave his own Fantasia for the cornet on "Sonnambula," and played a prominent part in some of the orchestral numbers. The vocalists were Mesdames Marie Roze, Samuël, and Damian; Messrs. Maas, Hollins, and King.—At the Concert on the 22nd ult., the Overture to "Egmont," a selection from "Mignon," and Adam's Overture "Le Roi d'Yvetot" were well played, with the exception of a few inaccuracies in Beethoven's overture. The vocalists were Mesdames Rose Hersee, Edith Wynne, and Hope Glenn; Messrs. H. Piercy and Albert McGuckin. Madame Edith Wynne gave "There be none of beauty's daughters," to a harp accompaniment played by Madame Priscilla Frost, and other songs with her usual facility. Miss Kate Ockleston played in excellent style and with commendable accuracy the Andante and Scherzo from Saint-Saëns' Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, a Gavotte by Niermann, and an excerpt from "Le Bal" by Rubinstein, the latter, however, requiring more physical power than she possesses.—The Manchester Vocal Society commenced its fifteenth season on the 12th ult., when the programme included S. Wesley's Motet, "Exultate Deo"; Spohr's Cantata, "God, Thou art great"; Schubert's Mass in F, No. 1; and several glees and part-songs. The Society, which has done excellent service in former years in rescuing from oblivion many fine works, promises to maintain its high reputation, though the balance of the choir was disturbed by a preponderance of basses, and the sopranos were not invariably accurate in either pitch or execution.—The first of a series of Classical Chamber Concerts was given in the Memorial Hall on the 5th ult., the executants being Messrs. Risegari, Speelman, Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps. The programme consisted of Quartets by Mozart in B flat, Raff in D minor, and Mendelssohn in E minor. Raff's fine but unequal work had not been heard here before. The performance throughout was most admirable.—Mr. Hallé gave his first Concert of the season on the 27th ult. The programme included Mozart's Symphony (No. 1) in D, Brahms's Academic Festival Overture, Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in C, and Schumann's "Phantasie-stücke." The vocalist was Madame Schuch Proska, from Dresden.—During the season, in addition to the choral works we announced last month, the following instrumental novelties will probably be introduced: Brahms's Tragic Overture, Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet," Symphony and Overture to "Waverley," Mozart's Ballet-music to "Idomeneo," Gluck's Ballet-music to "Paris and Helena," Raff's Symphony, "Im Walde," Dvorák's "Danses Slaves," Cowen's Overture "Niagara," and Rubinstein's Second Concerto.

MUSIC IN LEIPZIG.

Leipzig, October 21.

Of the two musical associations which hold the highest place in Leipzig, the lesser—that of the Euterpe Concerts—has not yet begun; but three of the more famous series of performances that take place weekly in the Gewandhaus have already been given. The great boast of the Gewandhaus directors is that their orchestra is reserved strictly for one single end, hardly any of its members being suffered to degrade their artistic training by occasional engagements of a lighter kind. Res severa est verum gaudium is the inscription upon the cornice of the hall, and it gives the note and the character of its performances. The Gewandhaus is considered as a sort of temple, whereof the ministering priests have before all things to be kept pure, and wherein, unfortunately, the initiated must be equally select. For, owing to the smallness of the building and the renown of the concerts, it has become an absolute impossibility for any new comers to be sure of a place; there is hardly a seat that has not been subscribed for years, and for the vacancy of which probably there are several patient applicants. Consequently the rehearsals, which take place at the early hour of nine in the morning, are crowded by the students of the Conservatorium and the unlucky multitude to whom the concerts themselves are closed. Distinguished from the Euterpe management, which inclines towards the works of Liszt, the aim of Herr Reinecke has been to preserve in the Gewandhaus Concerts a definitely classical character. Thus the three performances hitherto given have included Haydn's Oxford Symphony, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and the Second (D major) Symphony of Brahms—a work which, on repeated hearing, assures one more and more of its author's right to be held as the successor of Beethoven in massive strength, in mastery over the orchestral body, and in the creation and solid manipulation of inspired melody. Herr Reinecke has, however, always sought to be prompt in acknowledging the worth of new compositions which have the stamp of artistic workmanship on them. Accordingly, the classical basis I have named receives a perhaps disproportionate superstructure of "novelties." Each week a virtuoso of a special instrument arrives, and with him a special—and new—concerto. First Xaver Scharwenka played, with fine execution and good taste, a pianoforte concerto of his own. Herr Heckmann, the concert-director of Cologne, followed with a violin concerto of Niels Gade. The work contains no very striking element, unless the last movement, which combines a sort of humoresque with the normal form of a fast finale, may be called striking by force of its incongruity; and the performance was hardly redeemed by the playing of the accomplished, but not remarkable, violinist. The third concert brought from Paris M. Adolphe Fischer, an excellent and powerful violoncellist, who played an Adagio by Max Bruch and led a violoncello concerto by C. H. Witte. Witte's concerto is the only one of the compositions I have mentioned that was not performed for the first time; and to complete the list of novelties we have to add a very bright orchestral intermezzo, "Wald und Berggeist," by Philipp Scharwenka, at the third concert.

The singers who have visited the Gewandhaus this month are Herr Gudchus of Dresden, a tenor with a well-trained voice but who has not yet given evidence of very high capabilities, and Fräulein Fides Keller, of Frankfurt, who created a deep impression by her finished rendering of songs by Handel, Schumann, and Reinecke. At the concert of last night Frau Schimon-Regan, an esteemed member of Leipzig society, resumed the place she has long occupied here, as a graceful singer of lyrical pieces.

It would be far from the truth if we were to assume that all the music of Leipzig is represented by the two great orchestral associations. In fact, many severe musicians regret that they are generally accepted as representative by the outer world. The classical standard of the Gewandhaus is held by them to be fixed too low; and the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung of last Wednesday recorded with dismay that, at the rehearsal of the second concert, when, as a rare exception, Handel's exquisite A major violin sonata was given, the students of the Conservatorium left the hall in a body. Accordingly the stricter school finds relief in an admirably conducted Bach-Verein, which has only deviated from its high character by producing some English glees. In popular estimation the weekly performances at Bach's own church, St. Thomas's, retain their position; and nothing can excel the purity and precision with which, for instance, the wonderful motett, "The Spirit also helpeth our infirmities" ("Der Geist hilft unser Schwachheit auf"), was rendered last Saturday. The choir is still under the management of the learned editor of the Bach-Gesellschaft, Wilhelm Rust.

It is a misfortune to have to add that there is bad music in Leipzig, in the midst of all this good. I do not speak of the coffee-houses, where one expects nothing. But it is disappointing to have a concert given at the Neue Kirche, opening with an organ Toccata of Bach played without taste or execution, and followed by a programme of the most superficial and worthless music, mixed with stock classical pieces wretchedly performed. Let it be only remembered that this is an exception—I hope, a rare exception.

At the Newcastle Church Congress, Professor W. H. Monk read an interesting paper on Music, which we regret that we cannot quote in its entirety. Speaking first of rural choirs, he suggested that where there were not the materials for properly balanced harmony, the tenors and basses should be persuaded to sing the air, with, perhaps, a verse or two of the hymn in harmony for pleasure's sake. "Some time ago," he said, "I was present in St. Paul's Cathedral on one of those occasions on which the choir is very fine and powerful, and the church full to overflowing. For lack of a better place, I stood against the west door. As long as the chant was in harmony, the total of its effect might have been summed up in the remark that music was going on; but the 'Gloria Patri' was in unison; in a moment everything was changed, and, like a sudden broad bright ray of sunlight in the midst of darkness, the whole atmosphere seemed full of tone, broad and massive, of glorious fullness, while every word, for the first time, was heard distinctly. The same lesson is taught once or twice a year at the Festival of the Gregorian Association." As to the excellent choirs which were often to be found in town churches, Mr. Monk suggested their affiliation to the cathedral, and their frequent meetings there. "Sometimes the service might be held on a Church festival like Ascension, in which a grand service at the mother church might both teach the lesson and assert the day. At other seasons, a day near the great feast may be chosen (after it, not before), say December 26 (St. Stephen) or 27; perhaps the evening of Shrove Tuesday, Easter Monday or Tuesday, Whitsun Monday or Tuesday, Trinity Monday, St. Michael and All Angels, All Saints' Day, and some day in the middle of the Trinity season, as might be convenient. The idea, of course, includes practice, united and constant, which should be directed by the cathedral organist and choirmaster personally. But the services of this officer should be properly remunerated," and Professor Monk dwelt with much emphasis upon the disastrous effects which the Cathedral Commission had had in crippling choirs. Proceeding to another part of his theme, that of music-writing, he said there were wanted compositions of a character fitted for the use of large bodies of choristers, of a style large, lofty, sublime, and fitted to the recurring festivals of the Church's year. "There is in existence, it is true, a large and varied collection of Church music, in the editions of Boyce, Arnold, and others, some of which has every claim on attention, and which the formation of these permanent bodies will resuscitate. Much fine Church music, worthy of perpetual preservation, has also been produced within our time; and we shall not 'willingly let die' the writings of such living men as Ouseley, Stainer, Sullivan, Armes, Steggall, Hopkins, &c., or of such departed heroes as Goss, Attwood, Wesley, Croft, or Purcell. The Church anthem of the length and pretension of Bach's 'Blessing and Glory,' Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion,' Bennett's 'Woman of Samaria,' 'The Chandos Anthems' of Handel, Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus,' Armes's 'St. John,' Caldicott's 'Widow of Nain,' is the Church composition of the future, in combination with settings of the Church's own canticles such as we have recently welcomed from the like sources. Such of these as we have already will, however, soon be

The musical score is written for four vocal parts (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and organ accompaniment. The key signature is three sharps (F#, C#, G#) and the time signature is common time (C). The lyrics are:

The organ accompaniment is written on a grand staff (treble and bass clefs) and includes a pedal part in the bass line. The score is divided into three systems, each containing vocal staves and organ staves.

A Folio Edition of this Anthem, with an Accompaniment for the Organ, with Pedal part, is also published by Novello, Ewer and Co., price 1s.

METZLER AND CO.,

exhausted, and there is a lack of compositions strictly adapted to the whole course of the ecclesiastical year. J. S. Bach wrote a great variety; but the English of those that have been translated is hardly satisfactory, and has an exotic feeling which is uncomfortable and strained—the common lot of all translations. I was this year chairman of a committee invited by the Royal Academy of Music to adjudicate the annual prize for composition called the Lucas Medal. Five compositions of considerable length for chorus and orchestra (without solo voices) were sent in, any one of which I should have been proud to conduct. They exhibited a command of counterpoint, and a knowledge of choral and orchestral effect, of which the Academy may well be proud." After urging the formation of a Society for the Promotion of Church Music to help young composers, he concluded by some remarks on orchestras and the performance of oratorios in church. As to the latter, he pointed out that the libretti even of some of Handel's great compositions were unfit for the purpose. He also demurred to organ recitals. There was no one instrument so sublime in tone, and capable of such infinite variety, as the church organ; but it was because of its connection with the daily office of praise, that one would desire to guard its use; just as one would guard the church itself, as a building, from use for any other object than the worship of God. The organ should only be touched as an adjunct to this worship; and, if for the nonce it be used as a solo instrument, it must be made to conduce to true religious thought by the unvaried solemnity of its utterances. Many acute observations upon the present state of Church music were afterwards made by the Rev. E. H. Bickersteth, the Rev. Precentor Rogers (Durham), and Mr. William Rea (Organist of the Town Hall).

The death of Mr. Arthur Herbert Jackson, which took place on September 27, has thrown quite a gloom over the Royal Academy of Music, of which institution he had been an earnest student, and at the time of his decease was a Professor of Harmony and Composition. Mr. Jackson was more than a student of promise, for he had already given to the world some important compositions, amongst which may be mentioned a Pianoforte Concerto, played by Miss Agnes Zimmermann at one of the Philharmonic Society's Concerts; a Violin Concerto, performed by M. Sinton at the Orchestral Concerts given by Mr. Cowen; an Intermezzo for orchestra, played at the Alexandra Palace, under Mr. Weist Hill; an Overture, "The Bride of Abydos," introduced at the Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden by Mr. Cowen; besides some works heard for the first time at Brighton. At the Concerts of the Royal Academy he was also highly successful in an Overture and some chamber compositions. A Magnificat for voices and orchestra, two Masses for male voices, besides vocal and pianoforte solos, sufficiently proved his versatility as a composer whilst yet a student; and it must also be recorded that he won the Lucas medal for composition, besides the bronze and silver medals awarded at the annual examinations. He had, shortly before his death, finished a Cantata called "Jason and the Golden Fleece"; and considering that he was only twenty-nine years of age, we need scarcely say how bright a future has been suddenly blighted. Mr. Jackson was held in high estimation by all who knew him; and his fellow-students, as well as his fellow-professors, can amply attest how modestly and unassumingly he received the many proofs of success which he had so fairly won.

AFTER an unusual delay, the stewards of the recent Festival of the Three Choirs, held at Worcester, have had a final meeting for passing the accounts, and, contrary to general expectation, report a deficiency in the receipts, though a small one. The total cost of the Festival amounted to £4,582, and the total receipts from the sale of tickets and books to £4,517, leaving a deficiency of about £65, which the stewards have to make good. As the amount is so small, however, and the number of stewards so large (173) a call of 10s. each was all that was required, and the call was accordingly made. The total of receipts for the Clergy Widows and Orphan Charity amounted to £1,121 12s. 5d., which amount intact was ordered to be divided amongst the three dioceses in equal proportions as usual.

THE South London Choral Association, under the able direction of Mr. Leonard C. Venables, is rapidly spreading a love for high-class music in the district where it has been for so long located. Established in 1869 for the practice of vocal music by means of the Tonic Sol-fa notation, it has gradually advanced to its present high position. In the prospectus of the fourth season, 1881-82, it is announced that the concerts will be given in the new rooms of the South London Institute of Music, Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell. The first Concert, at which Weber's "Praise to Jehovah" was given, is noticed in our present number; and the other works promised during the season are Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" and "Messiah," Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," and Mendelssohn's unfinished opera "Loreley." At the South London Institute of Music, in connection with the Choral Association, instruction is given in every branch of music; and the Camberwell Choral Society for the practice of cantatas, glees, and part-songs has been also established. The Principal of the Institute and Conductor of the last-mentioned society is Mr. Venables.

THE Belfast Philharmonic Society announces the opening Concert of the eighth season, 1881-82, for Monday evening, the 7th inst., when Madame Marie Roze, Mdle. Papritz (her first appearance in Belfast), Mr. Joseph Maas, and Signor Foli are engaged as vocalists, and M. le Chevalier Niedzielski as solo violinist. This concert will be given at St. Mary's Hall, and be limited to subscribers; but the other concerts will take place in the Ulster Hall, the programmes of which will include Handel's "Israel in Egypt," Haydn's "Spring" ("Seasons"), Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," selections from Rossini's "William Tell" and Mackenzie's Cantata "The Bride," which was so successfully produced at the recent Worcester Festival. A collection of works of the most distinguished ancient and modern masters—the ancient compositions to be rendered a capella—will also be given in chronological order. The Conductor is Herr Adolf Beyschlag; honorary organist, Mr. John Shillington; accompanist, Herr Louis Werner, jun.; and leader of the orchestra, Mr. Henry Cohen.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at the Church of St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, on September 28, before a very large congregation. At the celebration of the Holy Communion Field's Communion Service in D was sung in its entirety. A midday service was held, when a sermon was preached by the Bishop of Bedford, the music consisting of Smart's Te Deum in F and Stainer's anthem, "Sing a song of praise." Evensong commenced with a Processional Hymn, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis being Gadsby in D, and the anthem, "The Lord hath done great things for us" (Smart); and at the conclusion of the service Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus was sung by the choir with the greatest precision. Miss Westrop presided at the organ with her usual ability. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. C. E. Tutill, the choirmaster. The services were repeated on the following Sunday, when the church was crowded both morning and evening.

THE Harvest Festival Service at St. Paul's, Avenue Road, Regent's Park, was held on Saturday, the 15th ult. The Canticles were sung to Stainer in A, and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" was the anthem, the "Hallelujah" Chorus being also given. The two former were accompanied by Mr. Warwick Jordan, of St. Stephen's, Lewisham; and the latter and other portions of the Service by Mr. Carpenter, the organist of the church. After the service Mr. Warwick Jordan played Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C minor and the Fugue in D major. The Rev. J. W. Bennett, Vicar of the church, conducted the service, which was also accompanied by a very efficient string band.

A SERIES of Concerts, under the title of the Bermondsey Popular Entertainments (conducted by Mr. Stretton Swann), commenced in St. James's Schoolroom, Bermondsey, on the 10th ult. The artists were Miss Lizzie Reid, Miss Featherby, R.A.M., Mr. Hanson, Mr. Campbell, and Mrs. Campbell, R.A.M. (solo pianoforte), all of whom were highly successful. Mr. Stretton Swann was the accompanist.

THE seventeenth Concert (the opening night of the season) was given by the Victoria Glee Club on Saturday, the 8th ult., at Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street. The glees, madrigals, and part-songs were all well sung, many being encored. Messrs. Sexton, Bryant, Bishop, and Skinner took the quartets with much taste and refinement. Schumann's Grand Quintet in E flat at the opening of the second part was a great success, the executants being Dr. F. E. Gladstone at the piano; first violin, Mr. A. Pawle; second violin, Mr. J. Kitcat; tenor, Mr. T. Murby; violoncello, Mr. L. Wildman—all members of the Queen's band. The soloists on this occasion were Mr. W. Sexton, Mr. E. Bryant, and Mr. Egbert Roberts, each receiving an encore for his song. Dr. J. F. Bridge was present as President of the Club, and Dr. F. E. Gladstone as Chairman, supported by other eminent musicians. Mr. W. Sexton was the musical director and conductor.

DR. SPARK, of Leeds, gave an interesting musical lecture at the Bow and Bromley Institute on the 17th ult., on "English Glees and Part-Songs for Male Voices." He pleaded for a better recognition of native talent, and for a more general cultivation of glee-singing in the home. The glee was a native of England, and English people should preserve the traditions of the last generation in this regard. After listening to the most perfect of human instruments, we all recurred with never-failing satisfaction to the human voice, the organ not made with hands. Dr. Spark spoke of the glee as far superior in musical quality to many of the sickly ballads and flimsy opera choruses that are now sung. He drew an amusing picture of the convivial singing of our young men of to-day, and wished it could be improved. The Yorkshire St. Cecilia Quartet sang a number of illustrations very finely. There was a large and appreciative audience.

THE researches of Mr. Hipkins in the Palace at Potsdam, with the sanction of the Crown Princess of Germany, have resulted in the discovery of three early Silbermann pianos, which are identified with those on which John Sebastian Bach improvised before Frederick the Great. These are, we learn, all copies of the action invented by the Italian maker Cristofori—a circumstance which is considered to dispose of Silbermann's claims to the invention of the piano. A piano has also been discovered which is believed to be by Mozart's friend Stein, of Augsburg, besides two Schudi harpsichords—one dated 1766, and having solid silver keys. The bearing of these discoveries on the history of our musical instruments will be discussed by Mr. Hipkins in essays to be contributed by him to the "Encyclopædia Britannica" and Mr. Grove's "Dictionary of Music."

THE following is the award of Sir Julius Benedict, the adjudicator of the National Prizes offered for competition at the Local Examinations in Elementary Musical Knowledge at Trinity College, London, held on June 17 last:—

Of the papers sent for examination in the Junior Division, No. 1,647 is the best, and No. 380 is the next best. In the Senior Division I fear I cannot allow a first prize. No. 362 would be entitled to a second prize, and No. 298 to commendation, though the example of sequences is entirely wrong. Some of the definitions in the other papers are faulty also.—JULIUS BENEDICT.—October 7, 1881.

Since this award was made it has been ascertained that candidate No. 362, being over the age of twenty-one years, is prevented by the College regulations from taking the second National Prize in the Senior Division, which prize therefore now falls to candidate No. 298. The names of the successful candidates are Eleanor E. Wearing (1,647), Alice Maud Guppy (380), and Mary Cecilia Gray (298).

A SPECIAL Service was held at the Church of St. Augustine and St. Faith, Old Change, Watling Street, on the 6th ult. The music comprised "The Lord is my Shepherd" (Schubert), Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Smart in B flat), "Be thou faithful unto death," "See what love," "Happy and blest" (Mendelssohn), and "The Daughter of Jairus" (Stainer). The singing throughout was good, especially the tenor solos, which were rendered with exquisite taste by Mr. A. B. Newth. Mr. Kempton and a few of the boys of the Cathedral choir ably assisted, Master Bartlett being the treble soloist. The accompaniments and voluntaries were admirably performed by Mr. Charles F. South, the organist and choirmaster.

THE Harvest Festival Service at St. Matthew's, New Kent Road, took place on Wednesday, September 28, and was attended by a crowded congregation, the sermon being preached by Bishop Piers Claughton. The choir of seventy voices rendered very efficiently Henry Smart's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat, and Dr. Wesley's fine anthem, "The wilderness," the solo parts being ably sustained by the Misses Webber and Carter, and Messrs. Cornwall, Webb, and Blofield. After the sermon Mr. Cornwall effectively sang "In splendour bright," the choir terminating the service with "The heavens are telling." The whole of the musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. W. Taylor, the organist and choirmaster, who presided at the organ, playing as voluntary Handel's Second Organ Concerto.

WAGNER'S "Nibelungen-Tetralogy" will, it is positively stated, be produced in May next at Her Majesty's Theatre. Herr Angelo Neumann, the successful impresario of the recent performances of the "Ring" at Berlin, writes as follows to the Berlin Musik-Welt: "The 'Nibelungen' will commence on May 5, 1882, with Herr and Frau Vogl, Herren Niemann and Scaria, Frau Reicher-Kindermann, &c. I shall proceed to London this month (October) in order to make the final arrangements. On my return I shall visit Paris for the purpose of fixing the time of my 'Lohengrin' representations." We can only add the sincere hope that Herr Neumann will be successful in both these artistic enterprises, of which the last mentioned is doubtless, speaking comparatively, the bolder of the two.

THE Festival of the Guild of St. Luke the Evangelist was held at St. Paul's Cathedral on Tuesday evening, the 18th ult. The musical portion of the service (with the exception of the anthem) was Gregorian, and was rendered by the London Gregorian Association, under the direction of Mr. Warwick Jordan, who presided at the organ. Mr. Spenser Nottingham acted as Conductor, and the voices were reinforced by four brass instruments. The Rev. Montague Villiers preached an eloquent sermon, and after the offertory a Te Deum was given, the service being concluded with the singing of a processional hymn. Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor was played as a concluding voluntary.

ONE of the few Concerts which took place during the "dead season" was given at Marlborough Rooms by Messrs. Ascherberg, the piano manufacturers, for the purpose of introducing their instruments to the English public. They had secured the services of Herr and Frau Rappoldi, two eminent artists on their respective instruments. The lady well deserves the praise bestowed upon her by such high authorities as Bülow and Liszt. The programme included, among other pieces, Schumann's Sonata for violin and piano (Op. 121), and the E flat Pianoforte Concerto by Weber, with the accompaniment of a second pianoforte instead of the orchestra, performed on two Ascherberg grands.

THE Harvest Festival of St. John's Church, Walworth, was resumed on Sunday, the 16th ult. The anthem in the morning was "O give thanks unto the Lord" (E. A. Sydenham), and the Communion Service Woodward in E flat. In the evening the choir was augmented by a string band in connection with the church. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Stainer in F), the anthem, "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), and the "Marche Romaine" (Gounod) and Mendelssohn's War March of the Priests ("Athalie"), were given with good effect, the former during the offertory and the latter as the concluding voluntary. Mr. J. E. Capel, organist and choirmaster, presided at the organ.

THE 153rd monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was held at the Pimlico Rooms on Friday, the 7th ult. The soloists were Miss Kate Hardy, Miss Belval, Mr. Arthur Thomas, Mr. Theodore Distin, and Mr. F. R. Kinke. The programme included G. Fox's comic Cantata, "The Jackdaw of Rheims," Martin's "Meek twilight," Pinsuti's "In this hour of softened splendour," and several solos, all of which were very well received.—The handsome sum of £323 16s. 10d., being the net proceeds of the Garside Memorial Concert, has been duly handed over to Mrs. Garside as a mark of the Society's esteem for its late Conductor.

ON Tuesday, the 11th ult., a Concert was given by the South London Choral Association at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, when Weber's Jubilee Cantata was performed, with Misses Marriott and Orridge, Mr. Hanson (of St. Paul's Cathedral) and Mr. James Budd as soloists. The members of the choir acquitted themselves admirably in some of the choruses, and the quartet and chorus, "Praise the Lord," was well rendered. The second part consisted of a miscellaneous selection, the choir singing some favourite part-songs with great spirit, and solos being contributed by all the above-named vocalists. Mr. W. H. Harper accompanied, and Mr. Venables conducted.

IN the Cheltenham Musical Society Record, recently published, the attention of the members is especially called to the falling off in the number of subscribers to the Society; and it is said that if the Montpellier Rotunda is to be retained for the practices, and two subscription Concerts given on the same plan as heretofore, until the list of subscribers is materially augmented the Concerts must inevitably suffer as regards the accompaniments. Considering how excellent have been the performances of this association, we sincerely hope that the non-performing residents of Cheltenham will liberally respond to this appeal for encouragement and support.

ON Thursday evening, the 20th ult., a full Choral Service was held in St. Mark's Church, Camberwell, it being the Festival of the Harvest Thanksgiving. The ordinary choir was augmented by several gentlemen from neighbouring choirs. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were well sung to Banks's setting in E flat, and the anthem was Dr. Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land." After the blessing Sullivan's Te Deum in D was sung, the choir being grouped round the altar. Mr. Alfred Physick, the organist and choirmaster of the church, presided at the organ, and played as concluding voluntary Beethoven's "Hallelujah."

A HARVEST Home Concert was given on Thursday, the 13th ult., at Claremont Chapel Schoolroom, by some members and friends of the King's Cross Senior Band of Hope. Gounod's "Ave Maria" was the chief item in the programme. Songs were also given by Misses Ethel Harwood, F. Davies, and M. Tensh, Messrs. H. T. Probert, A. Probert and W. H. Mason, varied with a pianoforte solo by Miss Willcocks (who also accompanied during the evening), a duet for piano and harmonium, violin solos, and selections by the orchestra, all of which were well received by a numerous and appreciative audience.

THE members of the Norwood Choral Society gave a Concert in the Concert-room at the Crystal Palace on the evening of September 29. The soloists were Madame Clara West, Miss L. Robins, Mr. Michael Dwyer, and Mr. F. T. Wright (a pupil of the Conductor). Mr. F. Aldridge played a pianoforte solo, and Mr. A. J. Phasey a solo on the euphonium, which was highly appreciated. The concert closed with a performance of the "Macbeth" music. The precision of the choral singing was highly commendable, and great credit is due to Mr. Henry Dubber, who is a most painstaking and efficient Conductor.

THE Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Festival was celebrated in Christ Church, Mayfair, at evensong, on Wednesday, the 12th ult. The service was fully choral, and comprised Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Barnby, in E), and two anthems by Sir John Goss, "O Praise the Lord of heaven" and "Fear not, O land." The music was carefully and correctly rendered, reflecting credit alike upon the organist and choirmaster, Mr. R. Stokoe, F.C.O., and the individual members of the choir. At the close of the service Mr. C. W. Pearce, Mus. Bac., Cantab., played a selection of organ music.

MR. T. B. BIRCH has organised a series of three orchestral Concerts at the Mechanics' Institution, Stockport, the first of which took place with much success on the 12th ult. As the performance of symphonies is rather the exception than the rule in Stockport, it is to be hoped that this feature in the programmes, and the general high character of the music selected, will prove sufficiently attractive to repay Mr. Birch for his earnest endeavours in the cause of art.

A VERY successful Concert was given by Madame Worrell at Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on Thursday evening, the 20th ult., before a crowded audience. Madame Worrell's solos, which were excellently rendered, were Mendelssohn's scena, "Infelice," and a new song by Mr. Charles E. Tinney, "Lost in the wood," the latter unanimously encored. The other artists were Mesdames Adeline Paget, Florence Winn, Bucknall-Eyre, Misses Matilda Roby, Marian Burton, Marie Newson, H. Dunbar Perkins (violin), Messrs. Henry Guy, Dalzell, Winn, C. E. Tinney, and James Budd. Mr. Turle Lee accompanied.

THE Harvest Festival at St. Barnabas, South Kensington, was held on Friday evening, the 14th, and Sunday, 16th ult. At the Sunday evening service a selection from the "Creation" was given, the solos by Messrs. Bell and Carter, of Westminster Abbey, and Masters Charlton and Luke, of the church choir, the accompaniments being played by a selected orchestra. The choruses were excellently rendered under the able conductorship of Mr. Baxter, of Westminster Abbey, the choirmaster; Mr. Frederick Holliday, the organist of the church, presiding at the organ.

HARVEST Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Thomas's Church, Elm Road, Camden Town, on Friday evening, the 7th, and on Sunday, the 9th ult. The music comprised the Te Deum (Stainer in A), Jubilate (Sullivan in D), Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Parry Cole in D), anthems, "Praise ye the Lord for His goodness" (Garrett) and "Blessed be the Name of the Lord" (Gadsby). After each evening service Mr. J. Baptiste Calkin gave an organ Recital. The services were intoned by the Rev. Arthur Vaughan Colston, Curate of the church.

MISS MARIAN BURTON gave her first evening Concert at Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on Thursday, the 6th ult. The bénéficiaire elicited warm manifestations of approval for each of her contributions, the principal of which was Gluck's recitative and air, "Che farò." The other artists were Madame Worrell, Misses Agnes Larkcom, Annie Matthews, Pauline Featherby, H. Dunbar Perkins (violin), Florence Danby (pianoforte), Messrs. Henry Guy, Arthur Thompson, W. Coates, F. Bevan, F. H. Horscroft, and Turle Lee (Conductor).

The work, which was well received by a crowded audience, was given under the direction of Mr. G. R. Egerton, the Conductor of the Society.

The service was fully choral, and included Prout's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F, and Macfarren's anthem "And God said, Behold I have given you every herb." Before the Benediction Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus was sung. The service was brought to a close by the organist (Mr. J. R. Griffiths) playing an Offertoire in F, by Wely. The service was repeated in its entirety on the following Sunday evening.

THE Annual Harvest Festival was held at All Saints' Church, South Lambeth, on Friday evening, the 21st ult. The choral portion of the service was commendably given, and comprised Bunnett's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F; anthem, "O taste and see" (Goss); and the usual harvest hymns. The service was repeated on the following Sunday, with the addition of Barnby's "O Lord, how manifold." On each occasion Mr. W. H. Holmes ably presided at the organ.

A SERIES of six Ballad Concerts have been organised at the Royal Victoria Coffee Music Hall. The first took place on the 20th ult., under the personal direction of Mr. W. H. Cummings, who, together with a number of excellent artists, executed a popular programme to the great delight of the audience, which consisted very largely of veritable working-people. Four concerts follow, organised by Clement Hoey, Esq., and the sixth is under the direction of Miss Everett Green.

WE understand that the vocal score of Wagner's latest dramatic work "Parsifal" is in the engravers' hands, and will be ready shortly after Christmas. The full score will appear later on, but hardly before the Bayreuth performance of the work. Messrs. Schott and Co., of Mayence and London, have acquired the copyright for all countries, and Mr. Corder's English translation will be added to the German original.

THE first of a series of monthly Concerts, which have been arranged for the ensuing season at the Lewisham and Lee Liberal Club, was given on the 19th ult. The vocalists were Madame L. Vernon, Mrs. A. W. Gedge, Mr. Douglas Vernon, Mr. E. Pierpoint, and Mr. Graham, all of whom acquitted themselves much to the satisfaction of the audience. REVIEWS.

Novello's Music Primers. Edited by Dr. Stainer.

Double Counterpoint and Canon. By J. Frederick Bridge, Mus. Doc., Oxon.

WE sincerely hope that all students desirous of availing themselves of the laws of Double Counterpoint, so ably laid down by Dr. Bridge in the Primer before us, will first become thoroughly acquainted with his previous work on simple Counterpoint, which also forms one of the valuable series of popular musical instruction-books issued by Messrs. Novello. The earnest study of the contrapuntal rules framed before the harmonic derivation of chords was known is assuredly one of the best preparations for that greater freedom which springs spontaneously from the advance of musical knowledge; and we are glad therefore to find our received modern authorities on the subject impressing upon pupils the positive necessity of working under those restrictions which have guided and controlled in their early studies all the great creative artists of the world. "An effort has been made," says Dr. Bridge in the preface to his book, "to avoid all useless and pedantic rules: but at the same time, for the student, rules are absolutely necessary until he has acquired the knowledge which will justify him in departing from the strict letter, while he is observing the spirit." Such an assurance as this from so accomplished a contrapuntist cannot but inspire confidence in his pupils, for they will feel that whatever may be the number of rules insisted upon, not one can be spared without detriment to the due elucidation of the subject. We are glad to find that our author confines his attention to Double Counterpoint in the octave, tenth and twelfth; for as he truly says, although occasionally instances of that in the ninth, eleventh, thirteenth and fourteenth may be met with, after the examples given these can be worked out by the student without guidance. In the preliminary rules we are told that, as the inversion of any interval within the octave can be discovered by referring to the number nine—"since each interval when added to its inversion will make up that number"—this method can be expanded to apply to inversion in other intervals, the principle being to add one to the number of the interval in which the inversion is to be made. This certainly appears a very simple and remarkably obvious system of finding what an interval will become by inversion, and yet we do not remember to have seen such rule given in any work on Double Counterpoint up to the present time. Before passing to Triple and Quadruple Counterpoint a chapter is devoted to "Added Thirds," respecting which some very excellent advice is given; and afterwards, so clearly and simply are the possible faults in writing counterpoint with three or four distinct subjects pointed out, that few pupils, with diligent study, would be likely to go astray. "Imitation," both strict and free, is fully explained; and the several chapters on the various forms of "Canon" may be said so thoroughly to exhaust the subject that the student, after carefully analysing the examples given in illustration of the explanations, may be fairly left to himself. The specimens of the "Polymorphous Canon" are particularly happy; and the final chapter, headed "Hints to the Student," contains some valuable rules for the construction of this species of composition. It is impossible to speak too highly of the judicious manner in which the examples have been selected throughout the work. It is almost needless to say that very many have been taken from the works of John Sebastian Bach; but the various extracts from other composers, which in every case most aptly enforce some special point, are of the deepest interest, and may perhaps even have the effect of more strongly drawing the attention of the pupil to the compositions from which they are quoted. One especially we may mention from Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 28 (popularly known as the "Sonata Pastorale"), which is too often passed over by mere "finger pianists" without any thought of the passage being a really fine example of Double Counterpoint. Amongst the canons in the "Appendix," one written by Mendelssohn, in fulfilment of a jocular promise to Sir George Smart to compose a viola duet for their mutual performance, is here printed for the first time. It is an "infinite canon"; and in his letter to Sir George Smart the composer says: "You see in this manner it goes to eternity, and perhaps you would like to have the duet somewhat shorter." We cannot close Dr. Bridge's excellent book without awarding him the highest praise for the energy he has thrown into his task. It is easy enough to write a work on Double Counterpoint which shall be little more than a reproduction of the works which have preceded it; but our author, like a true artist, has dared in many places to hazard his own opinions, and to abide by the result. That the Primer will have an extensive sale we have no doubt, for solid musical study is now becoming rather the rule than the exception; and even those who believe that the various forms of Counterpoint should only be mastered as a means to an end, when they see to what a noble end it leads, can scarcely understate the vital importance of the means.

Summer Nights (Les Nuits d'Été). Six Songs by Théophile Gautier. Set to Music, with accompaniment for small Orchestra or Pianoforte, by Hector Berlioz (Op. 7). English version by Francis Hueffer.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE compositions of Hector Berlioz are now—thanks to the energy and perseverance of a few zealous pioneers in the cause—so rapidly growing in public estimation that we shall not rest content until all his works are before us; and when time shall have gauged their relative value, assuredly the charming group of songs now under notice must take high rank. Though not to be judged by any standard save that of excellence—for, like all this composer's writings, they follow no conventional model—the delicacy and melodiousness of the vocal phrases, and the excessive beauty of the instrumental figures which are woven in with the voice part must strongly commend them not only to singers, but to listeners. No. 1, "Villanelle," is an exquisitely simple but impassioned love song, with an obstinate quaver accompaniment in chords almost throughout, the unexpected changes of key giving much eloquence to the text. No. 2, "The spectre of the rose," has an elaborate accompaniment, the voice, in sympathetic broken phrases, relating the little poem upon which the song is founded with excellent effect. No. 3, "On the lagunes," is a pathetic lament in F minor, the conclusion of the song, on the dominant harmony, dying off on the word "Ah!" being a point of much interest. No. 4, "Absence," is a brief composition, but it is probable that in performance it may prove the most popular of the set; and Nos. 5 and 6, "The tomb: Moonlight," and "The unknown land," will well repay earnest study both with the vocalist and pianist. In the first the dragging three-crotchet accompaniment at the commencement well intensifies the feeling of the words; and in the second the tuneful character of the vocal part, although attended throughout by some complicated instrumental figures, is never weakened. We sincerely hope that the publication of this set of songs will prove that Berlioz could write purely vocal music when he felt so disposed. A good word must be said for the English version by Mr. Hueffer. It is no easy matter to translate Gautier's poetry, and to preserve sufficient sympathy with Berlioz' music, but this task has been well accomplished, and deserves recognition.

Ottaviano da Petrucci, da Fossombrone, inventore dei tipi mobili metallici della musica nel secolo XV, del professore D. Auguste Vernarecci, membro corrispondente dell' Istituto Germanico Archeologico.

[Fossombrone: Tipografia di F. Monacelli, 1881.]

THIS is not only a readable but also a very interesting book of nearly 200 pages. The life and labours of the so-called inventor of movable types for music-printing is a study which commends itself especially to these times, when endeavours are made by means of Caxton Exhibitions and other memorial meetings to recall the memory of the early pioneers in the art which has so pre-eminently benefited mankind at large. Petrucci's work was apparently almost unknown to our musical historians, Burney and Hawkins; but later writers have recognised its importance and value. Fétis, in his Biographical Dictionary, devotes several pages to the subject; and Anton Schmid, of Vienna, in 1845 published a book of 342 pages, in which the life and works of Petrucci were exhaustively, but not impartially nor discriminatingly, treated. The work now under review is much more concise. In the first chapter the author gives his reasons for undertaking to write a history of Petrucci; the second treats of the birth and education of the early music-printer, and special reference is made to the fact that Petrucci was born in the same year that Fust, the companion of Gutenberg, died. Chapter iii. is devoted to a consideration of the invention of Petrucci and his first essay in printing with movable types at Venice. It seems that though of noble birth he was a poor man, and would have found great difficulty in developing his projects but for the liberality and assistance of his wealthy friends, Amadeo Scotto and Nicholo di Raphael. The chapter concludes with a reprint of the curious preface from Petrucci's first work, the "Harmonice Musices Odhecaton," published in 1501, an elaborate description of which is given in the following chapter. The books published by Petrucci under the title "Le Frottole" are described in the fifth chapter, and the works which he printed after he left Venice and returned to his native town, Fossombrone, are fully spoken of in chapter vi. The remaining chapters—seven to eleven—detail Petrucci's return to Venice, and his other migrations. The Municipality of Venice had granted him exclusive privileges for twenty years at the commencement of his career as a printer, and Pope Leo X. gave him privileges for the space of fifteen years to print "books of florid-song, and tablatures for lute and organ." It seems, however, that, notwithstanding the limitation of the terms of the privilege, Petrucci found it to his advantage to print works not musical. This is not the place to describe the method or process employed by Petrucci; suffice it to say that it needed two operations of printing. The first gave an impression of the lines or music stave; the second added the notes. The result was beautiful, but probably its cost prevented its general adoption. It was, however, of the greatest use to the distinguished harmonists and contrapuntal writers of music of that age; and but for some such invention it is possible that the composition of figurative music would not have advanced and spread over the Continent with rapid strides. It is to be hoped that Vernarecci's work may find an English translator; it would be welcomed by many readers to whom at present the book is a sealed volume. In thanking the author for his welcome addition to the literature of music, we cannot help expressing a regret that he had not appended to his book a list, so far as known, of all the works issued by Petrucci, and of the dates of publication—a period extending from 1501 to 1523.

Nirwana: Orchesterfantasie in Ouverturenform. Von Hans von Bülow Op. 20. Partitur.

[München: Jos. Aibl.]

ALTHOUGH Dr. Hans von Bülow is in this country much better known as a pianist than a composer, he enjoys in the latter capacity considerable reputation on the continent, especially among musicians of the "modern German" school. We have several times seen the work now under notice in the programmes of concerts abroad; though we believe his "Sänger's Fluch" is the only important work from his pen which has yet been heard in London.

We approach the study of the "Nirwana" with the respect due to the composition of one of the most eminent, and unquestionably one of the most gifted, of living artists. The work is of extreme complexity, and, even after repeated and careful study of the score, we despair of giving our readers any clear and intelligible idea of its character. The chief reason for this is that we take the work, though it is written in the form of an overture, to be essentially programme-music; and not the slightest clue is furnished us as to the nature of its programme. In one respect this may possibly be an advantage, because it compels us to consider the composition from the point of view of abstract music; yet we feel while reading it that there is some hidden meaning which we are unable to fathom, and which, if we only grasped it, would probably make much clear to us which now seems obscure.

We shall perhaps give the best general idea of the work by saying that in its style, its harmony, and especially its orchestration, it bears considerable affinity with the later works of Wagner, particularly the "Tristan und Isolde." This is chiefly noticeable in the predominance of chromatic harmonies, and the comparatively rare occurrence, we had almost said the studious avoidance, of perfect cadences. The work opens with a long introduction, Grave, occupying fifteen pages of the score, the chief subjects of which in a more or less changed form are found again in the succeeding Molto mosso. The general character of the music is restless, even stormy, though the composer is by no means unaware of the value of contrast, as we see from the charming second subject (Molto tranquillo, p. 36). But the quiet is but of short duration; and it is the constantly changing character of the music that impresses us with the belief that there must be some underlying programme. The whole work bears traces of the hand of a master, and the score is a most interesting study. It is very difficult for all concerned, both from the nature of the passages and the frequent changes in the time; but it is quite worthy of the attention of the conductors of our large orchestral associations.

Classical Gems. For the Pianoforte. Transcribed by Hermann Eisoldt. [Duncan Davison and Co.]

ANY music which will help to make pupils sing on the pianoforte must be of service; and transcriptions of good songs, therefore—provided only that they do not degenerate into finger display—should be always welcomed, not only for the useful practice which they enforce, but because they make young instrumentalists acquainted with the standard vocal works. In this set of three we have Haydn's "Mermaid's Song," Mozart's "Violet," and Beethoven's "Mignon's Song" ("Knowest thou the land?"). All of these, of course, do not lend themselves equally well to "arrangement" for an instrument; but Herr Eisoldt has acquitted himself of his task with much credit. It need scarcely be said that the pleasing accompaniment to the "Mermaid's Song," apart from the melodious character of the theme, will render this the most popular number of the three, but Mozart's beautiful vocal gem must also attract young players, and there is sufficient variety in Beethoven's well-known song to interest even those who hanker after "pretty" music. Very little fingering is marked, except in the "Mermaid's Song."

Nocturne Poétique. For the Pianoforte. By John Storer, Mus. Bac., Oxon. [Ashdown and Parry.]

We have always been of opinion that the character of a piece should be determined by the music and not by the title. "Valse Sentimentale" and "Polka de Salon," for example, used as descriptive names for these compositions, cannot enhance the value of either in the slightest degree; and although in the piece before us we acknowledge that there is much poetical feeling, we care not that the author shall acknowledge this also by a declaration of the fact upon his title-page. Mr. Storer has based his Nocturne upon a melodious theme in G minor, and his second subject, in the tonic major, effectively contrasts with this, not only from the nature of the melody, but from the substitution of an arpeggio in quavers for a crotchet accompaniment. A little variety in the original theme on its return would have been desirable; but the conclusion of the piece is graceful, although we cannot see the reason for writing the final four bars in three lines merely because the arpeggio is taken with the left hand over the right.

Only the sound of a voice. Song. Words by Adelaide Procter. Music by Michael Watson.
[Metzler and Co.]

MR. MICHAEL WATSON is a prolific composer, but he has produced nothing better than the song before us. If in the due colouring of the words he occasionally becomes a little restless in his modulations and figures of accompaniment he must be freely forgiven, not only on account of his artistic intentions, but because in every case the mere workmanship is skilful and thoroughly satisfactory. The opening phrase is extremely melodious, the chromatic progression on the words "tender and sweet and low" effective and well harmonised, the change to the triplet accompaniment in happy sympathy with the text, and the conclusion of the song expressive without exaggeration. The music is carefully written for the register of a contralto voice, and has been sung in public by Miss Orridge.

Our Island of love. Barcarole, for two voices. Words by Charles Searle. Music by Francesco Berger.
[Moutrie and Son.]

A FLOWING and melodious theme, in G-8 time, simply harmonised, is here set to some very harmless lines which we may fancy just such a lazy lover as we see floating down the stream on a hot summer evening might be supposed to sing to his fair companion. Under such circumstances we can scarcely expect that either poetry or music will be very exciting; but both are pleasing and refined enough to satisfy the majority of amateur vocalists.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE seventieth anniversary of the birth of Franz Liszt, which occurred on the 22nd ult., was celebrated in various ways throughout the musical world, taking the form of musical ovals, congratulatory addresses by representative artistic bodies, or special articles, devoted to the career of this unique artist, in the public press. Were we to make even a brief reference to the more important of these manifestations of the esteem in which Liszt is universally held, we could do so only by the exclusion of all other matters from these columns. Suffice it to say that at Weimar—his former artistic home—the oratorio "St. Elizabeth" in the guise of a sacred opera, was given on the stage of the Hoftheater, on the 23rd ult. From Rome, where the pianist-composer is just now residing, a Times correspondent reports as follows, under date the 23rd ult.: "A charming musical fête, including the inauguration of the new Roman Quintet Society, was given yesterday afternoon at the Palazzo Caffarelli, in the Capitol, the residence of the German Ambassador, on the occasion of the seventieth birthday of the celebrated pianist and composer Liszt. Among the pieces given were a quintet for piano, two violins, viola, and violoncello, by his pupil Sgambati; and a fragment of a symphonic poem of his own composition, entitled "Le Berceau," for two violins and viola. The venerable artist was greeted with enthusiastic plaudits by the distinguished company with which the room was crammed, and for a long time after the concert was finished he stood surrounded by a crowd pressing forward to offer him their congratulations." The fragment of a symphonic poem here referred to, is doubtless the first movement of the composition inspired by a drawing from the pen of Michael von Zichy, to which allusion has been made previously in these columns.

A similar jubilee was celebrated on the 24th ult. in his native Germany, and more especially in his native town of Frankfurt, on the occasion of the seventieth birthday of Ferdinand Hiller, the veteran champion of the classical school in music, whose distinguished merits both as composer and orchestral leader, as well as his high personal character, have won for him the unqualified esteem of musicians and art-lovers throughout Europe—a fact which has but recently obtained fresh confirmation by the public ovations offered to him on the occasion of his visit to Barcelona.

Herr Xaver Scharwenka's newly founded Conservatorium was formally opened at Berlin on the 9th ult. with a concert consisting exclusively of compositions by masters of the young institution, and likewise executed by them. Professor Jähns spoke an appropriate prologue, written by Carl Wittkowsky.

The season 1881-2 of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts commenced on the 6th ult. We insert the programme in our usual appendix to these columns.

The authenticity of the manuscript of a posthumous opera by Donizetti, "Il Duca d'Alba," has been further confirmed by a Commission named by the Academic Council of the Milan Conservatoire, consisting of SS. Bazzini, Dominicelli, and Ponchielli. "The pieces of music," a Times correspondent writes, "that are entirely finished, or can be easily finished following the indications of the master, are eighteen in number, and consist of three airs and three choruses, four duets, two tertets, three complete pieces, and three dramatic scenes. The fourth act only is wanting in two important pieces. But, in spite of this, the great line traced by the master is so clear that the Commissioners are persuaded the 'Duca d'Alba' can be intrusted to safe and expert hands to be presented to the public as the indubitable work of Donizetti." The interesting manuscript has been purchased by the publisher, Francesco Lucca.

Operatic performances in the Flemish language have been instituted at Antwerp under the direction of M. Van der Ven, and were inaugurated on the 8th ult. with the "Wonderdoctor" by Mertens. In the course of the season works by Bénéoit, Miry, Block, and other Belgian composers will likewise be produced, and the novel undertaking is likely to prove a very successful one.

Johannes Brahms, the Wiener Abendzeitung informs us, has recently played before a circle of intimate friends in the Austrian capital his latest composition, viz., a pianoforte concerto in B flat major, which is described as "a giant-opus, a veritable pianoforte-symphony in four movements, and, both as regards its formal dimensions and its grand artistic intentions, without a parallel in musical literature." Herr Ignaz Brüll, on the occasion referred to, supplied the orchestral part on a second pianoforte. The composer will shortly proceed to Meiningen for the purpose of rehearsing his new work with Hans von Bülow and his famous orchestra.

The pianoforte used by Carl Maria von Weber at his residence in Dresden has been bequeathed by the son of the great composer, Max Maria, to the Berlin Museum, where the interesting relic is now preserved.

Dr. Hugo Riemann, the eminent musical savant, has accepted a professorship at the Hamburg Conservatorium.

We extract the following from the Berlin Musik-Welt: At Wiesbaden, a new opera, "Cleopatra," by Freudenberg, the director of the Conservatorium of that town, is shortly to be produced. This is the fifteenth "Cleopatra" composer. The fourteen preceding operas with the same subject and title were composed by Castrovillari (1662), Graun (1742), Monza (1776), Anfossi (1778), Danzi (1779), Cimarosa (1790), Guglielmi (1798), Weigl (1807), Paër (1809), Nasolini (1813), Combi (1842), Truhn (1853), Maistre and Rossi (1876).

Arrigo Boito's "Mefistofele" will be produced for the first time, at the Imperial Opera of Vienna, in February next, with Madame Lucca in the part of Margaritha.

A very successful revival of Gluck's opera "Armida" took place on the 13th ult., at the Dresden Hoftheater, under the direction of Capellmeister Schuch.

Swedish papers are full of reports and anecdotes of the enthusiastic reception accorded to Madame Christine Nilsson on the occasion of her recent visit to her native town of Christianstad. Crowds of people met the prima donna wherever she went, flags being displayed from numerous houses, and no kind of demonstration was omitted which could tend to show how proud the people of Christianstad are of their gifted countrywoman. As an instance of the latter fact may be mentioned the religious care with which the wooden gate, some little distance outside the town, in the roadway, had been preserved, which, when a little girl, Christine Nilsson had been in the habit of opening for passing vehicles, in order to gain a few pence towards the purchase of a much-coveted violin.

With reference to a controversy recently set on foot in the musical world, the Leipzig Signale remarks ironically: "Mozart's Requiem is said to have been only just discovered; search is made after a symphony, by Franz Schubert, as yet unknown. And now it is asked, what has become of a tenth symphony and a second oratorio by Beethoven? The symphony, as is well known, was bespoken and paid for in advance by the London Philharmonic Society (Beethoven sent his Ninth in its stead, after its first performance at Vienna); the oratorio had been asked for by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna, and likewise paid beforehand: ergo, where are the two works?—R.S.V.P."

We read in Le Ménestrel: "M. Dupin, better known by the name of Père Dupin, the Nestor among dramatic authors (ninety-four years of age), has just completed a comic opera, entitled 'Ploch le Soldat,' to which M. Marietti will write the music."

The new season of the Paris Concerts Populaires, as well as of the Concerts de l'Association Artistique (Châtelet), commenced on the 16th ult., as will be seen by the respective programmes appended to these columns.

A new opera by the maestro Cortesi, entitled "L'Amico di casa," recently represented at the Theatre Nicolini, at Florence, under the direction of Signor Marino Mancinelli, has met with great success.

The death is announced of Richard Wüerst, a pupil of Mendelssohn, and well known in Germany as a composer of numerous operas, symphonies, and minor compositions. He was also a member of the Royal Academy of Arts at Berlin. Among his pupils may be named Xaver Scharwenka and Heinrich Hofmann. Wüerst died suddenly on the 9th ult., at Berlin, at the age of fifty-seven.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

MALE VOICE CHOIRS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—As a person deeply interested in music, I feel that one of its component parts is ignored in London, when I find the absence of a grand and firmly established chorus of Male Voices, capable of producing the great works written expressly for them, with satisfaction and delight to themselves and their audiences.

Knowing the very happy results attainable by such an organisation, from a membership in the "Apollo Club" of Boston, Mass., U.S.A., which has had unwonted prosperity during the first ten years of its existence, I think I may uphold what I am about to say on this subject.

The formation of this club, and the manner in which it has been so successfully carried on, should be of the first importance to those interested, and I shall therefore confine myself to these points.

For a number of years previous to 1870, Messrs. Chickering and Sons, whose pianos are known the world over, gave the use of their hall to a number of gentlemen, professional and amateur, who formed what was known as the Chickering Club, their object being to practise male part-songs and glees, very wisely eschewing the heavier works. They gave chamber-concerts to invited friends at intervals during the season, and the great pleasure they afforded, coupled with a desire to attempt greater things, gave rise to the idea of forming the "Apollo Club."

The leaders selected the members, called active or singing members, from the best talent in the city, and always endeavoured to have a goodly number of first tenors, keeping the other parts as much as possible small in numbers, so as to make a well-balanced chorus. The club now numbers about eighty members, nearly twenty-five of whom are first tenors. It is supported by subscribers, who are admitted as associate members upon an annual payment of £3 each, which entitles them to four tickets to each of six concerts given in the season, besides admission to rehearsals.

The associate membership is limited to 500, and, to show the eagerness to join, I need only state that there are upwards of 400 names on the list, of persons awaiting admission into the place of any who may withdraw.

The concerts are given in the Boston Music Hall or the Tremont Temple, each having a seating capacity of within 2,500. No matter how inclement the weather there is never a vacant seat, and the reception which the élite of Boston gives to its favourite club is most enthusiastic.

It is found that the yearly income is £1,500. This is devoted to the expense of hiring a fine hall for rehearsals and a suite of rooms for its active members, nicely furnished and adapted to their comfort, while the walls are hung with choice paintings and engravings. Still more is spent in acquiring and publishing new music for the exclusive use of the club, and the balance is placed in a fund which, when it shall have reached a proper amount, will be devoted to building a hall for the use of the club, and, without doubt, for the general good of music, since the leading spirits are those who have made Boston the London of America in Oratorio and the English School, the Milan in Italian Music, and who are the closest adherents to and admirers of the works of the best composers in Germany and France.

The leading position which the "Apollo Club" holds in Boston shows the fallacy of an argument which endeavours to prove the impossibility of maintaining male choruses without being detrimental to those of mixed voices.

The scarcity of first tenors is also urged as a powerful obstruction. Let the call go forth, and the number of applicants, although perhaps not large, will be more than adequate.

I sincerely hope that some steps may be taken to form in London the finest Male Chorus in the world.

Yours faithfully,

GEORGE D. W. LENNON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Permit me briefly to answer your correspondents writing upon the proceedings of the recent Organ Conference. I may point out to one of the writers that the principle which suggests that composition pedals applied to the great should act upon corresponding combinations of the pedal organ, seems to be dictated by the fact that the tone gradations of the great organ call for greater and more varied degrees of pedal power than is ever necessitated in the employment of the other manuals. The position of "C under C" is based upon considerations bearing upon the mental associations in connection with C as a convenient theoretical and not inconvenient practical centre; not affecting the use of high pitched solo stops on the pedals, which would not be likely to be confined to the use of the upper three or four notes. Radiation has been generally and emphatically condemned; but the lengthening of the extreme short keys of the pedals would bring them better within reach, without introducing the disturbing and changeable distances characteristic of the fully radiating pedal-board. One balanced swell pedal and the use of the notched rod were duly considered; but so far no inventions in these directions seem to have claimed the position of being accepted as in every way satisfactory.

The Council of the College of Organists are anxious to advance every invention which can be thoroughly proved to be of real service to the player. If the correspondent to whom I have already alluded, has any definite proposals with regard to the improvement of the pedal-board, the College Council will be glad to know of them. The resolutions and recommendations were framed, after much anxious thought, in a moderate and in no sense dictatorial spirit. The gentlemen who assisted at the conference and the Council of the College alike desired to advance the art of organ-building, while claiming for the player, what has been secured for the pianist, such points of uniformity as will provide a measure at least of certainty and comfort. The reasonable, practical, and moderate character of this programme, has already secured a sufficient acceptance, to reward the labours of those who took an earnest and active interest in the questions at issue.—Yours very sincerely,

College of Organists.

THE FIRST DULCIANA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I read in Mr. E. J. Hopkins's admirable article on the Organ, in Grove's "Dictionary," page 597: "The Lynn organ is the first that contained a dulciana" (1754).

In Walbran's "Guide to Ripon," page 63, I read: "The organ above this screen usurped, in 1833, the place of one constructed on the spot by Gerald (Gerhard?) Schmidt in 1695-6, and accounted one of the sweetest-toned in the kingdom. . . . The whole of its choir organ, comprehending the open and stop diapason (really a rohrflute), principal dulciana, and flute, are, however, fortunately retained in the present instrument, which was built by Booth, of Leeds."

Mr. Booth's organ has since been replaced by a splendid instrument by Messrs. T. C. Lewis and Co., but the dulciana is retained.

I may say that in our parish register there is an entry recording the baptism of a child of "Gerhard Schmidt, Organ Builder"; and further, that the stopped diapason of the great organ (retained as a flute bass on the pedal) is of oak, of which wood I believe Father Schmidt was accustomed to make his pipes.

Mr. Edwards, in his work on the Organ, says: "The old organ in Ripon Cathedral is supposed to have been by this maker" (Schnetzler), but I cannot hear of any evidence of this. The presence of the dulciana alone seems to have led to the conclusion.

I may mention that the dulciana is of very small scale and has a "beard."

The sound-board on which the dulciana stood is destroyed. It was retained in Booth's organ, and showed no sign of having been enlarged.

It would be very interesting to ascertain whether this dulciana of ours is really Schmidt's, and I shall have much pleasure in showing the stop to any one who may be able to decide it.—Believe me, yours very truly,

EDWIN J. CROW,

Ripon, Sept. 24, 1881.

BENEDICT'S "LIFE OF WEBER."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to a notice on Sir Julius Benedict's "Life of Weber," contained in the April number of this year of your esteemed Journal, wherein the following passage occurs:—

"The appended catalogue of Weber's works is valuable to the English reader because containing translations of Otto Jahn's descriptive and critical observations upon each Opus. This alone is worth more than the price charged for the entire book."

These remarks would be flattering enough for the late Otto Jahn (the famous biographer of Mozart), assuming that he had ever written anything of importance concerning Weber's works. Such, however, has not been the case; and my own modest work on the subject being most likely unknown to the writer of the notice in question, the mistake of confounding my name with that of Otto Jahn was but natural, although it might have been avoided by a reference to Sir Julius's volume itself.

The repeated and kindly mention you have made in your columns of my "Carl Maria von Weber in seinen Werken" encourages me to hope that you will give publicity to these lines, intended as they are merely to remove a misapprehension which, having been published in your widely read journal, assumes an importance it would not otherwise possess.—I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

FRIEDRICH WILHELM JÄHNIS,

Professor Royal C.C.

[The writer of the notice cannot plead guilty to ignorance of Professor Jähns's valuable work on Weber. His mistake, therefore, was not "natural," and he accepts the full penalty due to haste and inadvertence.—ED. M. T.]

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ALNWICK.—A Festival Service was held in the Parish Church (St. Michael's) on September 29, when Dr. Armes's sacred Cantata, St. John the Evangelist, was given by the choir, together with that of St. James's Church, Morpeth, and a few amateurs, numbering about ninety voices. The choruses were sung with great precision, and the solo numbers were most ably rendered by Mrs. Metcalfe, Miss Cockburn, Miss Wright, Messrs. Moir, Common, McClellan, Egdel, McDowell, Strafford, and Orange, all amateurs. Much of the success was due to the Rev. J. Powell Metcalfe, who conducted. Mr. C. S. Wise, Organist of the church, accompanied skilfully, and played as voluntaries an Andante of Smart's and Mendelssohn's First Sonata.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—On Tuesday evening, the 19th ult., a popular Concert was given in the Queen Coffee Tavern, Stamford Street, by Mr. J. Greaves's Concert Party, which consisted of the Misses Dodd and Messrs. Wyld, Springthorpe, Greaves, Fennell, and McKay. Solo flautist, Mr. Tom Smith. The programme contained some excellent pieces, which were all well given. Mr. J. Greaves accompanied.

BACTON, SUFFOLK.—On Sunday, the 9th ult., Harvest Thanksgiving Services were celebrated in the Parish Church (St. Mary) and continued throughout the week, the usual hymns from "Ancient and Modern" were sung, the Responses were the Norwich use, and the Psalms and Canticles were sung from the "Cathedral Psalter," which the Organist, Mr. J. Marsh, successfully introduced. This is the only surplised choir for some miles round, and a good choral service is very much appreciated.

BAGSHOT.—The Harvest Thanksgiving was held at the Parish Church on Sunday, the 16th ult. There was a full congregation, including their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Connaught. Appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. Canon McCall, the service being intoned by the Vicar. Special psalms were sung to chants by Dupuis and Battishill. The anthem "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Stainer), "The strain upraise" (Sullivan), Merbecke's Nicene Creed, and appropriate hymns were also performed, the solos being well rendered by Mr. Sears and Master Cave. The volunteers were selected from the works of Mendelssohn, Smart, Elvey, Lefebure-Wely, &c.

BATH.—A new organ, erected by Messrs. Clarke and Son, organ-builders, of this city, was opened on the 5th ult. at Timsbury Wesleyan Chapel by Mr. J. Foote, Organist of Christ Church. A short service was held, when the Rev. W. Nicholson delivered an eloquent and impressive address, in the course of which he complimented the organ-builder and the organist on the manner in which both had carried out their respective duties. In the afternoon a few anthems varied the programme, and were rendered effectively by the Misses Winckworth and Messrs. J. and W. Winckworth. In the evening Mr. J. Foote gave a Recital.

BIRMINGHAM.—The fifty-second Saturday Evening Cheap Popular Concert was given in the Town Hall on the 8th ult., with a result, artistically and commercially, which must be most encouraging to the promoters of these excellent concerts. 3,218 persons paid for admission: one of the largest audiences ever assembled at a concert. Miss Evelyn Bawtree, Madame Edwyn Frith, Mr. Arthur Wilmot, and Mr. Edwyn Frith were the vocalists. The instrumentalists decidedly carried off the honours of the evening, Mdlle. Marie Brunelle (solo piano) and Mdlle. Hélène de Lisle (solo violin) creating a marked effect.

BOURNE, LINCOLNSHIRE.—A Violin and Piano-forte Recital was given on the 15th ult. in the Assembly Rooms, Angel Hotel, by Messrs. Bertolle and Lewis, assisted by Mr. F. Cundy, vocalist. The programme was selected from the works of Beethoven, Schubert, Mozart, Schumann, Gounod, &c. The Recital was well attended and highly successful.

BRADFORD.—On the occasion of the Harvest Thanksgiving Service at St. Mary Magdalene's Church, Handel's Dettingen Te Deum was given by a powerful chorus, selected from the Festival Choral Society, and a band of twenty performers. The choruses were well sung, and the solos ably rendered by Mr. W. Emsley. Mr. W. Paley played the trumpet obbligato, Mr. F. A. Sewell presided at the organ, and Mr. G. F. Sewell conducted.

BRIDGWATER.—The Harvest Festival Services have been highly successful, and the rendering of the music met with general appreciation. The choirs of St. Mary's and St. John's Churches, under the direction of their respective Organists, Mr. C. Lavington and Mr. Garton, were effective, and the volunteers were listened to with much interest.—The Choral Association (under the direction of Mr. C. Lavington) have Lauda Sion in rehearsal for the opening Concert of the coming season.

BRISTOL.—On Monday, September 26, Mr. George Riseley gave the first Concert of the fifth season of the Monday Popular Concerts, originated by him, at the Colston Hall. Notwithstanding the high character of the Concerts in past seasons, the excellence of the programmes, and the efficient orchestra, it is announced that the concerts have not been of a remunerative character; but the energetic Conductor has again come forward at the risk of further pecuniary loss, and it is to be hoped that his efforts to provide music of the highest class at regular intervals will be more appreciated in the future. The programme, which was admirably rendered, included Gade's Symphony in B flat (No. 4, Op. 20); the Overtures, "A calm sea and prosperous voyage" (Op. 27, Mendelssohn) Oberon (Weber), and Le Médecin malgré Lui (Gounod), and Mr. F. H. Cowen's suite de ballet, "The Language of the Flowers," a new work which was looked forward to with interest, and its graceful and artistic character acknowledged. Madame Florence Winn and Mr. George Cox were the vocalists. Mendelssohn's War March of the Priests (Athalie) closed a most enjoyable Concert. Mr. A. W. Waite was leader of the band, and Mr. Riseley conducted. On Monday, the 10th ult., the second Concert of the same series was given in the Colston Hall, and was very largely patronised. On this occasion the principal items in the programme were Beethoven's Symphony (No. 5) in C minor, Weber's Overture to Euryanthe, Rossini's Overture to Siege of Corinth, and Wagner's Overture to Tannhäuser. Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette," Boccherini's Minuet in A major for muted strings, and Meyerbeer's Coronation March (Le Prophète), were also included in the programme. The vocalists were Madame Evans-Warwick, and Mr. C. Fredericks. Mr. Waite led the band, and Mr. Riseley conducted.

—A Harvest Thanksgiving Service was held at St. Nicholas Church on September 29, when the usual choir of the church was augmented by the choirs of Christ Church, Broad Street, and St. Peter's, Peter Street, numbering altogether sixty voices. The service was Goss in A (unison), and the anthem, "Behold I have given you every herb bearing seed," specially written for the occasion by Mr. William Fear Dyer, the Organist and Choirmaster of St. Nicholas, the words being selected from various passages of Scripture by the Rev. J. G. Alford, M.A., Vicar. The solos were sung by the members of St. Nicholas' choir. After the sermon, which was preached by the Rev. Ambrose M. Foster, of Wilton, near Taunton, Dr. Stainer's anthem "O clap your hands" was sung, the quartet being taken by the members of Christ Church. Mr. Brookes, Organist and Choirmaster of St. Peter's and lay-vicar of the Cathedral, conducted the service. The offertory was for the Church Missionary Society.—A Union of twenty-eight Congregational and Baptist Choirs of the city has recently been formed. The inaugural meeting was held in Brunswick Chapel, when

Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, of London, gave an address. The Mayor was prevented by indisposition from attending.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—On September 29, an organ, built by Messrs. Norman, of Norwich, for the Northgate Congregational Church, was opened by Dr. Bunnett (Norwich). The choir sang Jackson's Te Deum, which was followed by a Recital by Dr. Bunnett.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Services in connection with St. Mary's Church were held on the 2nd ult. At the morning service, Dykes's Te Deum in F and Winchester's Benedictus in F were given by the choir of the church, numbering fifty voices. A special feature in the evening service was the anthem "Thou, O God," composed by the Organist and Choirmaster, Mr. T. B. Richardson, which was rendered in a very efficient manner, Masters Richardson and Tozer and Mr. Frederic Pattle taking the solos. The Rev. A. W. Snape, M.A., preached the sermons. The concluding voluntary consisted of a selection from the Creation, excellently played by Mr. T. B. Richardson.

CARDIFF.—Organ Recitals have been given by Mr. R. M. Atkins in the Drill Hall, upon a very fine three-manual organ built by Brindley and Foster, of Sheffield, and Concerts every day by the leading professional men of the town, during the Fine Art Exhibition. Mr. G. F. Davies with his excellent band has occupied three evenings; Mr. Frost gave two admirable Concerts; Mr. Walter Scott, three evening and one morning performance, when Schubert's Song of Miriam was well performed, Mr. E. H. Turpin accompanying in a masterly manner. Mr. F. Atkins, Mus. Bac., gave six concerts, chiefly of chamber-music, at one of which his son, a boy of ten years, played solos on the grand organ, and accompanied Miss Gertrude Lewis, R.A.M., in one of her songs. Three excellent Concerts were given by the Choral Society, conducted by Mr. D. C. Davies. Two by the Blue Ribbon Choirs, led by Mr. Jacob Davies; one by the Newport Choral Society; one by Caradoc's Choir; two by Mrs. Righton; an excellent glee and madrigal concert by Mr. C. S. Mann, led by Mr. Morgan Edwards; and two by Mr. Atkins, the appointed Organist of the Exhibition. Mr. C. J. Frost, of London, specially engaged, gave an excellent Organ Recital. Mr. E. H. Turpin, also specially engaged, gave two admirable and well-appreciated Recitals on the organ. The St. Andrew's Choir, conducted by Mr. S. Aiken, gave some well-selected vocal part music. Altogether the Concerts have been most attractive, and it is hoped that about £3,000 will be realised for the object for which it was intended—namely, that of having a Fine Art Gallery connected with the Free Library.

COLNBROOK, NEAR WINDSOR.—The Colnbrook Choral Society's first Concert of the season took place in the Public Rooms on Wednesday, the 5th ult. The programme consisted of instrumental music from the compositions of Schubert and Mozart, and vocal selections from Handel, Spohr, Dr. Crotch, Dr. Callcott, Dr. Greene, Novello, Rimbaud, &c. Mr. Richard Ratcliff conducted.

COVENTRY.—Elijah was sung in St. Michael's Church at a special Service on Thursday evening, the 20th ult. A performance of The Messiah some time previously having proved somewhat unsatisfactory, owing to the chorus being located in the choir-stalls and the band in the centre, a temporary orchestra was on this occasion erected across the middle of the chancel, and answered admirably. The band and chorus, conducted by Mr. Arthur Trickett, F.C.O., numbered upwards of 150, and the solos were sustained by Mrs. Mason, Miss Chatterton, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Bridson.

DELPH.—The Saddleworth Amateur Choral Society opened its season (1881-82) on Saturday, the 15th ult., in the Wesleyan School. The principal artists were Mr. De Jong, solo flute; Mr. J. Wadsworth, solo clarinet; and Mr. J. C. Whitehead, F.C.O., solo pianoforte and accompanist: Vocalists, Miss Mellor and Mr. Howard Lees. Mr. De Jong was encored for his excellent performance on the flute, and Mr. Whitehead's solos were warmly applauded. Miss Mellor sang "The Lost Chord" and "Bid me discourse," and Mr. Howard Lees made his first appearance at these Concerts, and sang "Arm, arm, ye brave" (Handel) and "I fear no foe" (Pinsuti). The band and chorus of the Society, numbering upwards of eighty performers, gave selections from Handel's Acis and Galatea and Alexander's Feast with good effect, the singing of the Choir being also much admired. Mr. C. Wood led the band, Mr. C. W. Cave presided at the piano, and Mr. F. T. Whitehead officiated as Conductor.

EALING.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Festival was celebrated in Christ Church on Thursday evening, September 29, the choir being joined by that of the Mission Church of St. Saviour's. Ebdon's Service in C was sung to the Canticles, and an anthem by Sydenham, "O give thanks unto the Lord," was most effectively rendered. Dykes's hymn, "A sower went forth sowing," was impressively given before the sermon, and the "Gloria" from Mozart's Twelfth Mass was sung during the collection in an admirable manner. A very eloquent and appropriate sermon was preached by the Vicar's son, the Rev. G. Hilliard. The prayers were intoned by the Rev. W. Petty, and the blessing was pronounced by the Vicar. On the following Sunday morning the sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Sanderson, Principal of Lancing College, after which there was a choral celebration of Holy Communion, when the service sung was Smart's in F. Mr. Harold E. Stidolph's accompaniments and voluntaries were played with his usual ability.

EDINBURGH.—On Saturday evening, the 1st ult., the Edinburgh Select Choir inaugurated the musical season by performing a number of glees, part-songs, and choruses, interspersed with solos, in the Music Hall. There was a large audience, and the Concert was in every sense a successful one. Some of the part-songs by H. Smart, Pinsuti's "Spring Song," and Hatton's "When evening's twilight" were most tastefully rendered. Several solos were contributed by Mr. J. Smith and members of the choir. Mr. John Hartley played the pianoforte accompaniments exceedingly well, and Mr. H. Hartley conducted.

ENFIELD LOCK.—The Harvest Festival took place at the Royal Small Arms Factory Church on the 2nd ult. The musical part of the service was excellently rendered by the choir, under the direction of Mr. E. Holt, Mr. E. J. Holt presiding at the organ. The morning Service was Sullivan's in D, and the anthem, "The heavens are telling" (from The Creation); the evening service being Barnby's in E, and the anthem "Fear not, O land" (Goss). Appropriate sermons were preached, that in the morning by the Vicar of Enfield, and in the evening by the Chaplain (Rev. C. H. Roberts, B.A.).

FALMOUTH.—A most successful Concert was given by Mr. C. W. Robinson in the Polytechnic Hall on Monday evening, the 3rd ult. The vocalists were Miss May Bell, Madame Antoinette Sterling (who met with an enthusiastic reception), Mr. Barker, and Mr. C. Vincent. Mr. Pardey's violin solos were highly appreciated and encored.

GAINSBOROUGH.—The Third Annual Concert given by the Britannia Band took place in the Temperance Hall on Tuesday, the 18th ult. The following artists were engaged: Miss Lilly Mason, Master F. Taylor, Mr. E. Dunkerton, and Mr. J. Bingley Shaw (vocalists), accompanist, Mr. G. Robinson. The band, under the direction of Mr. Crabtree, gave several excellent selections with the greatest care. The Concert was an entire success, and great credit is due to the management and all concerned.

HALIFAX.—On Sunday, the 9th ult., the new organ, built by Messrs. Halmshaw and Sons, of Birmingham, and presented to St. James's Church, Halifax, by J. W. Balme, Esq., was opened by Dr. Roberts, Organist and Choirmaster of the Parish Church. On the following Friday evening an Organ Recital was given by Dr. Roberts, and the choir of the church sang several anthems. The organ is a very superior instrument, and reflects the greatest credit upon the builders. It contains ten stops in the great, eleven in the swell, and six in the choir, besides a pedal organ of three stops, with the usual couplers and accessories. The bellows are worked by a hydraulic engine.

HANDSWORTH.—On the 10th ult. the Choir of the Parish Church gave a Miscellaneous Concert, which included The Fates, a Cantata by Dr. Belcher. The solos were admirably sung by Mrs. Britton, Miss N. Sanders, Miss E. Moreton and Mr. Westwood. The choruses were given with power and precision, and the Cantata was well received. A selection of songs, &c., a violin solo by Miss A. Burr, the Overture to L'italiani in Algeri for pianoforte and string band, and some part-music were well rendered. Dr. Belcher, the Organist and Choirmaster of the church, conducted.

HOLLINWOOD, OLDHAM.—On Tuesday evening, the 18th ult., Mr. Josef Cantor's Concert Company gave a Concert in Bourne Street Schoolroom to a large audience. The artists were Madame L. Mills, Miss K. Nono, Miss Richardson, Messrs. Barton, Broadley, and Cantor. Accompanist, Mr. J. Cantor. The Concert was a success.

HORNCastle.—Tuesday, the 18th ult., being St. Luke's Day, the usual Harvest Thanksgiving Services were held. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion at eight o'clock, and a choral service was held at eleven o'clock, when an admirable sermon was preached by the Rev. Prebendary Disbrowe, Rector of Benington, near Boston. In the afternoon Mr. Wakelin gave a Recital on the magnificent organ of the Parish Church, the programme including the Overture, Occasional Oratorio, one of Bach's grand preludes and fugues, Handel's "I know that my Redeemer liveth," a Funeral March, &c. In the evening the Rev. K. Bullock, of Welton-le-Wold, and Prebendary of Lincoln, preached to an immense congregation; the anthem was "Ye shall dwell in the land" (Dr. Stainer). The choir, under the skilful training of Mr. Wakelin, acquitted itself admirably, and the whole Festival was a complete success.

IRVINE.—An Organ Recital was given in the Parish Church on the 19th ult. by Mr. Hinchliffe, the Organist. The programme comprised selections from the works of Handel, Haydn, Spohr, Smart, &c., all of which were well rendered. The solo vocalist was Miss Irvine, from the Glasgow Choral and Orchestral Concerts, who was highly successful in all her songs.

LEEDS.—The inaugural Lecture at the Mechanics' Institution was given on September 27 by Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, A.R.A.M., on "The Popular Uses of Music." The Leeds Harmonic Union sang a number of glees very finely, in illustration of Mr. Curwen's lecture. There was a large audience.

LEWES.—On Sunday, the 16th ult., Thanksgiving Services were held at St. Anne's before large congregations. The Rev. J. R. Parr, of Brighton, officiated at both services, also delivering the customary sermons. The choir, led by Mr. B. C. Scammell, was assisted by a number of ladies. The services were fully choral, the morning anthem being Stainer's "Ye shall dwell in the land," the bass and tenor solos by Messrs. E. T. Hall and J. Mowbray being well sung. In the evening Barby's "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works" was exceedingly well rendered, no pains having been spared to make the choir efficient. After the evening service, Mr. P. J. Starnes, organist, performed in excellent style some selections, including Choral Song and Fugue, Wesley; Friere, Guilman; Festive March, Smart; "If with all your hearts" (Elijah), Mendelssohn; "Jerusalem the Golden," Spark; "Nazareth," Gounod; Pastoral Sonata, Rheinberger; March (Eli), Costa.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—The first of the second series of People's Concerts, promoted by the Corporation, was held in the Town Hall on the 1st ult. The hall was crowded in every part—the large orchestra included—a long time prior to the commencement of the proceedings, and the applause throughout was of the most genuine and enthusiastic kind. Mr. Rea—to whom the public owe so much for the inauguration of these cheap and popular Concerts—was received with a perfect burst of cheering on making his appearance on the platform, and this was renewed after his masterly performance of the opening piece—Jubilee Overture (Weber)—on the grand organ. The vocalists were Mr. and Madame Edwyn Frith, the latter of whom was in excellent voice. Mr. Rea's organ solos were throughout received with every mark of delight, and the lovers of instrumental music had the additional benefit afforded them of listening to Madame Helène de Lisie's charming solos on the violin.—The Church Congress, which held its annual meeting here in the early part of last month, was deemed a fitting opportunity for the furthering of the Church oratorio movement, and on Tuesday, the 4th ult., a special Musical Festival was held in St. Andrew's Parish Church, when Dr. Armes's St. John the Evangelist was performed. The choir, consisting of 130 voices equally balanced, had been carefully trained by the Organist of the church, and the result was perfect. The principal solo parts were well sung by the Misses May Wardroper, Thompson, and Lewis; Messrs. Catchside, T. H. Armstrong, and R. Armstrong. The choir was conducted by the Rev. Thomas Rogers, M.A., Precentor of Durham Cathedral. The organ accompaniments were played with the utmost refinement by the organist of the church, Mr. T. Albion Alderson.—A Special Musical Service was held on the 5th ult., in St. Peter's Church, Oxford Street, which formed an extra event in the Church Congress week. The service was the ordinary choral evensong, shortened; and a special feature was made by introducing a selection from Mendelssohn's Oratorio St. Paul. The choir was strengthened by the addition of the best voices from all the choirs of the town and district, and was composed of over sixty vocalists, the whole being under the conductorship of Mr. C. Chambers, Mus. Bac. Mr. William Rea presided at the organ. The soloists were Mrs. Vinycomb, Mr. F. Mace, and Mr. Rowley. The choruses as a whole were excellently rendered.—On Saturday afternoon, the 15th ult., Miss Hildegard Werner and Mr. J. H. Beers gave the first of a series of popular chamber Concerts in the Central Hall to a large and fashionable audience. The instrumentalists were: pianoforte, Miss Hildegard Werner; violins, Mr. J. H. Beers and Mr. H. Beers; viola, Mr. A. A. Hunt; violoncello, Mr. S. Beers. The vocalist was Miss Helen Armin. A quartet for stringed instruments by Haydn, Op. 77, in G; a quartet for piano, violin, viola, and violoncello, by Rheinberger, Op. 38, in E flat; a trio for piano, violin, and violoncello, by Reissiger, Op. 85, in E major; and a quartet for stringed instruments, by Mendelssohn, Op. 44, in D, No. 1, were well executed, and elicited much applause. Miss Armin's songs were also well received.

OLDHAM.—On Tuesday evening, the 4th ult., Mr. Josef Cantor's Concert Company (Liverpool) gave a Concert in the Co-operative Hall, Greenacres Hill, to a very large audience. The artists were: Madame Louise Mills, Mdle. Ternan, Miss Kate Nono, Messrs. Thomas Foulkes and Edward Grime, Mr. Josef Cantor being pianist as well as vocalist. The programme was well executed.—On Monday evening, the 10th ult., the fourth popular Concert was given in Henshaw Street Coffee Tavern, the soloists being Messrs. Fennell, McKay, Thomas, Brett, and Cribbs. There was a good audience. Mr. J. Greaves accompanied.—On Tuesday evening, the 11th ult., a Lecture-Concert was given by Dr. Spark, of Leeds, in the Co-operative Hall, King Street, assisted by a quartet party.

PENICUIK.—Mr. Mangelsdorff's afternoon Concert took place at the Town Hall on the 19th ult. The pianoforte duets of Masters Christy and Arthur Mangelsdorff were much appreciated by the audience, the youthful players giving evidence of sound training and natural talent. The vocalists were Miss Goodwin and Mr. Boyack. Miss Laing and Mr. Mangelsdorff officiated as accompanists.

PENZANCE.—Mr. R. White, jun., gave a very successful Organ Recital at St. John's Hall on the 7th ult., the various solos being performed with much artistic skill. The vocalist, Miss Gennys, sang several solos with excellent taste, and met with a cordial reception.

PRESTON.—On Tuesday evening, September 27, the annual miscellaneous Concert, arranged by Mr. J. Greenwood, was given in the Guildhall, before an appreciative audience. The vocalists were Miss Marsh, Miss K. Oscar Byrne, R.A.M., Mrs. Winter, Messrs. John McMahon, R. Taylor, and J. Ivison; and the instrumentalists were members of Mr. T. Gray's military band. Mr. and Master Greenwood presided at the pianoforte. The programme was a very attractive and varied one, and was gone through in a very creditable manner.

ROYTON.—On Wednesday evening, the 19th ult., a Concert was given in St. Mark's Schoolroom, Heyside, by Mr. Joseph Greaves's Concert Party, consisting of Miss Greaves, Miss S. Greaves, Messrs. Tom Smith, Jos. Greaves, P. Peplow, J. McKay, and Fennell. Pianists, Miss S. Greaves and Mr. J. Greaves. The programme was well rendered, the singing of Miss Greaves and Mr. Fennell being much admired. There was a good audience.

SLEAFORD.—On Monday evening, the 3rd ult., an orchestral Concert was given in the Corn Exchange by the members of the Scarborough Aquarium band, under the direction of Herr Alois Brouill. The programme was a very attractive one, and was highly appreciated, many of the pieces being encored. The hall was well filled.

ST. HELENS.—The Harvest Thanksgiving Service which was held at Holy Cross Church, on Thursday evening, the 20th ult., was one of peculiar interest, Weber's Jubilee or Harvest Cantata being selected for performance. The opening chorus, "Your thankful songs upraise," was exceedingly well rendered by the choir, and showed at once that the work had been carefully studied and rehearsed. The solos were excellently sung by Miss Helen Swift, Mr. Lepp, and Mr. John Sephton. Mr. Unsworth, as Organist, displayed his usual skill.

TRURO.—The Concert given on the 20th ult. by Madame Marie Roze, Madame Enriquez, Signor de Monaco, Mr. Farley Sinkins, Signor Foli, Signor Zoboli, Signor Papini, and Signor Antonio Mara was a great success. The violin performances of Signor Papini were highly appreciated, and the distinguished vocalists were several times encored.

WALSALL.—On Thursday evening, the 20th ult., the Third Annual Concert and distribution of certificates and prizes in connection with Trinity College music examination took place in the Temperance Hall. Dr. Gwinnett Sharp presided and made the presentation. The programme consisted of a selection from Flotow's opera Martha, by the Butts Choral Society, assisted by Miss Miner, Miss Bourne, Mr. F. Adams, and Mr. Carless. The band was led by Mr. C. Hayward, who was encored in his violin solo. Miss Atkins, one of the successful competitors, gave the same solo on the piano which she played at the examination, with much success. Mr. Banton presided at the piano, Mr. Moss at the harmonium, and Mr. Rogers, the local hon. sec., conducted. There was a large and appreciative audience.

THE BRIDE

A CANTATA

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF R. HAMERLING

A. C. MACKENZIE.

Op. 25.

PRICE ONE SHILLING AND SIXPENCE.

"The Cantata begins with a short instrumental introduction in the key of F minor. The movements suggest the rhythm of a solemn march, and the orchestration, with its effective use of the trombone, tends to support that character. We are thus prepared for tragic events that are to follow, in spite of the gentle and joyous strains of the opening chorus, in which a lady is serenaded on the eve of her wedding day: 'Sweet lady, thy lover awaits thee,' the singers are heard to chant to a melody which might have been written by Mendelssohn in his happiest mood. . . . The next number is a Wedding March and Chorus, the most popular, but by no means the best section of the score. Infinitely more worthy of distinction, and, indeed, very fine, was the final chorus, in which we are informed that, for reasons unknown, the bride, instead of being at the altar, 'lies 'neath the tide, down, down in the sea's chilly bosom.' Mr. Mackenzie's chorus is essentially founded on the prelude, other melodic materials also being reintroduced with excellent effect. From a musical point of view this piece is very interesting, but still more remarkable is the intensity of feeling sustained throughout."—Times.

"Mr. Mackenzie scores for the orchestra like one to whom all its resources are familiar. He lays on colour deftly, and, better than deftly, with truth, leaving, indeed, hardly anything to be desired. . . . Taking the work as a whole, I am bound to see in it not only a praiseworthy achievement, but an earnest of far better things to come. . . . The music (of the duet) shows a power of intense and, at the same time, beautiful expression, such as may ultimately expand into something deserving special homage."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Mackenzie's instrumentation is singularly graceful and effective, he has an unflinching fount of melody, and he writes for the voices with skill and knowledge. . . . The chorus, 'Sweet lady, thy lover awaits thee,' is full of delicacy and charm, a pleasing figure pervading the accompaniment (principally in the strings), and the entire number being wrought out with an absence of effort, though there is variety in abundance. . . . In a work of this character a march of some sort is a sine qua non, and the composer has provided a bright, animated, and tuneful bridal chorus, tempo di marcia, 'Now dawneth the bright wedding morning.' . . . There is revealed in the Cantata so much power, and such a command over the means of musical expression, that 'The Bride' will endure, not only for its own sake, but as an earnest of the able work which we may confidently look forward to from the same pen. . . . The brightly scored and spirited bridal march and chorus were immensely encored."—Standard.

"The bright chorus, 'Sweet lady,' is melodious and graceful in the vocal part, and comprises some characteristic orchestral writing, with delicate and fanciful varieties of instrumental effects. The love duet which follows, 'Why droops thy head?' is graceful and expressive, and is especially well written for vocal effect, in the contrasts and combinations of the voices. This duet—without plagiarism—is strongly reminiscent of the style of Gounod, both in its melodic structure and the delicate orchestral surroundings. . . . The music is evidently the production of genuine thought and skilful workmanship."—Daily News.

HAVE BEEN ADJUDGED THE

GOLD MEDAL

FOR UPRIGHT IRON-FRAME PIANOS.

MELBOURNE, March, 1881.

We, the undersigned Jurors for Musical Instruments at the Melbourne International Exhibition, have no hesitation in certifying that Messrs. Challen & Son, of London, have obtained the highest number of points for Cottage Pianos, in the British Court.

The award was based on the excellence of the quality, combined with the cheapness and solidity of the instruments exhibited, which we consider to be well adapted to the requirements of the Colonies.

PRIZE MEDALS—1851, 1855, 1862, 1865, 1866, 1872, 1875, 1877, 1879, AND AT THE PARIS EXHIBITION, 1878,

the highest distinction was conferred upon Messrs. HOPKINSON by the Musical Jurors—viz., the only Gold Medal awarded to any British Manufacturer.

MESSRS. HOPKINSON, therefore, feel fairly entitled to repeat the opinions expressed in the year 1845, by the most celebrated Pianists and Musicians then living—viz., THALBERG, Sir JULIUS BENEDICT, Madame DULCKEN, Sir HENRY BISHOP, and others, as still being correct—that their Pianofortes are "unsurpassed in tone and touch by those of any other maker."

Since these opinions were expressed, the leading musical judges in all parts of the world have confirmed them.

Messrs. H. having also, after carefully conducted experiments, introduced improvements of great value, with confidence invite the Trade, Professors, and the Musical Public, specially to inspect and judge of their Metal-framed Grand and Cottage Pianofortes, which they believe to deserve the eulogium passed upon them by the President of the Musical Jurors at Paris, 1878, that—

"THEY ARE FAULTLESS."

J. F. BRIDGE AND JAMES HIGGS,

Mus. Doc., Oxon.

Mus. Bac., Oxon.

BOOK I.—EIGHT SHORT PRELUDES AND FUGUES.

PRICE 2s. 6d.

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL, 1882.

ON the 10th ult. the Orchestral Committee of the Birmingham Festival met the members of the General Committee, and, for the first time, revealed the upshot of their labours in view of next year's solemnity. That those labours have been arduous and prolonged no one can doubt. That they have been zealous also is easy of credit, for particular reasons. We disclose no secret when we say that there were features in the proceedings of 1879 which gave alarm to many minds lest the Birmingham Festival should lose somewhat of its artistic supremacy. We need not revert more particularly to the matter. Every reader of contemporary musical record knows enough about it to spare us a rekindling of extinct fires, and to make unnecessary a setting forth of reasons why a change of management became advisable. That change effected, the normal responsibility of office was increased by a sense of obligation to justify what had been done. The "new blood" in the management could not but feel that it was on its trial, and we may well believe in a resolve to spare no effort likely to secure a triumphant issue.

The matter specially in hand at the meeting to which we refer was that of new works, and none more important could occupy the attention of a Birmingham Committee. In this case, it may emphatically be said noblesse oblige. The Midland Festival has, throughout its whole course, been honourably distinguished by a desire to encourage composers, while, in the particular instance before us, the policy is as justifiable as the obligation is onerous. A century of judicious management in the midst of an enterprising and wealthy community has lifted the institution to a place of national—nay, of universal importance. Its public are, to some extent, the connoisseurs of both worlds, and its duty is higher and larger than any defined by local exigencies. Herein lies the special gravity of the subject discussed on the 10th ult.; and by the Committee's handling of it, as every member knew, the forthcoming Festival stands or falls.

The Report of the Orchestral Committee set out with an acknowledgment of the obligation resting upon them to encourage native composers. In the discharge of this they applied to Mr. Arthur Sullivan for a new work. They could hardly have overlooked him with justice to their constituents. Mr. Sullivan's position is such that he cannot be left out of account. On the other hand, the position of the Birmingham Festival and the greatness of the honour implied by its patronage, made Mr. Sullivan's co-operation almost a matter of warrant. Yet that co-operation was refused; the Committee observing that "owing to numerous engagements Dr. Sullivan found self unable to accept a commission this time for a vocal or an instrumental work." In "numerous engagements" of our English composers we thoroughly believe, but that they were all of greater pith and moment than the provision of a novelty for Birmingham is a proposition wanting definite particulars, we regard as too doubtful. The Committee applied also to Mr. Barnby, who, after some preliminary correspondence, accepted a commission to write a cantata. But it likewise came to naught, under circumstances which, judging from the tone of the Report, were not quite satisfactory. "Unfortunately, on the 15th of June last, some months after the commission had been placed in his hands, Mr. Barnby wrote to say that he found himself quite unable to complete the cantata in time for the Festival, and that he must reluctantly relinquish the engagement. The late period at which this decision was made known to your Committee necessarily restricted very much their field of choice in looking about for another composer to fill the gap caused by Mr. Barnby's defection." It seems to us that the lateness of his decision proves the reluctance with which the composer of "Rebekah" arrived at it, and affords conclusive evidence against caprice. It should not be overlooked, in cases of this kind, that a musical work is prepared under conditions very different from those that regulate the manufacture of a stove or a rifle. Mr. Jaffray, the chairman of the Orchestral Committee, speaking without special reference to Mr. Barnby, laid the fact down with clearness and force when he said, "Genius is not subject to the ordinary commercial rules of business men. The Roman centurion of old could say to his servant 'Do this' and he would do it. He 'saith to one go and he goeth, and to another come and he cometh,' but inspiration was not subject to any of those exact rules and commands." Bearing this in mind, we may take for granted that Mr. Barnby had sufficient reason for returning his commission and declining an honour the very offer of which constituted something like a patent of musical nobility.

Failing Mr. Sullivan and Mr. Barnby, the Committee applied to Mr. Alfred R. Gaul, a local professor of more than local repute, and that gentleman is now engaged upon a Cantata entitled "The Holy City." Mr. Gaul, however, is not the sole representative of English art, Mr. Villiers Stanford having undertaken to furnish an orchestral "Serenade" in three movements. As to this, the chairman of the Orchestral Committee remarked, "Mr. Stanford's productions are not much known in Birmingham, but he is a professor of music at Cambridge, and he has recently produced an opera, received with great acclamation in Germany, called 'The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan,' founded upon Moore's 'Lalla Rookh.' I think you will find Mr. Stanford is a man of the future, whose fame is gradually reaching its meridian." We have no doubt whatever as to the wisdom of the Committee in engaging Mr. Stanford's pen. The Cambridge composer will produce a clever and scholarly work, certain, at least, of commanding respect. At the same time English amateurs can hardly feel satisfied with the representation of their national art in the scheme of the Festival. Whatever may be its quality, it is undeniably meagre in quantity, and lacks the recommendation of names generally known and esteemed. Yet we decline to argue therefrom a wilful neglect of native talent. The real fact is that but little native talent exists, either for neglect or encouragement. A man may count English composers of Festival rank upon the fingers of one hand; and Birmingham cannot, if expected, failing these, to draw liberally and of a haphazard from the ranks of men who are only known. Sir Julius Benedict's cantata "The Holy City," a work originally intended for the Festival at Norwich in October, has been deferred for the Midland solemnity, and will occupy an intermediate place between the novelties of native and purely foreign origin. Mr. Stanford's cantata is of the poem as "dramatic" and "full of life" regarding the cantata generally as a novelty to the interest of the Festival. We are ready to believe. Sir Julius is advanced in years, it is true, but there is no proof that his powers have decayed. Evidence rather inclines the other way, and we should not be in any measure surprised to find "Graziella" marked by almost youthful vivacity.

The works obtained from foreign composers are two in number, of which one is written by Niels Gade. It will be remembered that the Danish master contributed his Cantatas, the "Crusaders" and "Zion," to the programme of 1876, and by their means obtained no mean share of the honours then awarded. Under such circumstances, renewed application to Mr. Gade was the most natural thing in the world, while the composer as naturally accepted an engagement which even he was bound to regard in the light of a distinguished compliment. His new work, entitled "Psyche," will soon be completed and forwarded to England. The composer of the second and principal novelty is M. Gounod, who has, moreover, engaged to conduct its performance in person. Upon the subject of this important addition to the Festival programme and to sacred art we cannot do better than quote from the speech of Mr. Jaffray:—

They were fortunate in approaching M. Gounod just when his great work was within what it was now the fashion to call a measurable distance of completion. They were fortunate also in finding a spirited firm of publishers who would enter with spirit and liberality into negotiations with M. Gounod; and he must also add that to the tact and ability of a member of the orchestral committee, Mr. Milward, they were greatly indebted for the successful result of the negotiations with M. Gounod. He should like to say a word or two about the character of the great work which it would be the honour of the Committee to submit for public criticism in August next. M. Gounod was naturally in love with his own child, and he wrote upon the score when he gave it into the hands of Mr. Milward, in Paris, Opus vite mee ("the work of my life"). It was a work of high dramatic character, full of effects, some of them novel and many of them grand, and, so far as they could judge, they believed that it was destined to live, if not side by side with some of the greatest works of former ages, yet it would be one which the musical world would not willingly let die. A good deal of gossip had taken place in reference to the terms upon which the committee obtained the work. He might state, however, what the terms were. The composer desired to rid himself of all business transactions in reference to the property in the work, and he treated with the committee upon the basis of an absolute sale of the copyright and of representation and performance all the world over, and he asked for that £4,000. The committee paid him the £4,000 on the 1st of November, but of course they could not stand such a drain as that on their resources, and they entered into negotiations with Messrs. Novello, who, for the copyright and right of performance all the world over, paid them £3,250. So that it would only cost the Festival authorities £750, and those who knew the difference between a half-filled Town Hall on a Wednesday morning and a crammed hall on that morning, could easily understand they would make a considerable amount of money, besides éclat, by the transaction. Not only would it fill the hall in all probability on that occasion, but it would draw strangers from, he ventured to say, every part of the Continent, and certainly from every part of England, to the whole Festival; and they could not estimate the financial results which would be produced by what he considered not only a spirited, but a good honest business transaction. They had made arrangements also with M. Gounod to conduct his own oratorio. A certain monetary penalty was attached to his not conducting the oratorio himself, but they earnestly hoped that he would be able to do so. He intended to come on the Wednesday before the Festival, so as to conduct some of the private rehearsals by the choir of his great work. All who remembered that great occasion in the history of the Birmingham Festivals, when Mendelssohn conducted his own "Elijah," would never forget the charm of mind and manner of that great and immortal composer; and they hoped to have the benefit, therefore, of M. Gounod's attendance here to give perfection to the performance of the work of his life.

There is no need of addition to this statement, nor could further remarks be made without anticipating criticism, for which the time has not yet arrived. Enough that in M. Gounod's "Redemption" we have a work of high pretensions and singular interest, such as would alone confer distinction upon the greatest Festival. In presence of the French master's oratorio, there is really no need to be much exercised in mind about anything else.

Turning to the general arrangements of the Festival as far as they were determined on the 10th ult. a few words will suffice. The performances will probably begin on Tuesday, August 29, and end on Friday, September 1. Sir M. Costa is again appointed conductor, and the various sub-committees are duly nominated, with power to act in their respective departments. One point alone remains undecided, namely, whether M. Gounod's oratorio shall be performed a second time on the Friday evening for the benefit of those necessarily excluded from its début. On this question, we think, there ought not to be two opinions. Considering the immense interest attached to the work, even three public representations would find abundance of witnesses. The Committee will, indeed, be unwise if they reject an idea that commends itself alike to prudence and artistic enthusiasm. But we have entire faith in their judgment, and already feel assured that the Birmingham Festival of 1882 must prove a brilliant success.

BY JOSEPH BENNETT.

No. X.—BERLIOZ (concluded from page 562).

ALTHOUGH the fate of "Les Troyens à Carthage" profoundly disappointed Berlioz, twenty-one representations put him in a position to snap the chains which bound him to the Débats and its hated feuilletons. At this the master rejoiced with joy inexpressible. As we have seen, he always detested the journalist's work, for which, indeed, he was in some important respects unfitted, and now he threw away the critical pen with a wild shriek of liberty. Hear him:—

"At last! at last! at last! After thirty years of bondage, I am free! I have no more feuilletons to write, no more platitudes to justify, no more mediocrities to praise, no more indignation to repress, no more deceptions, no more comedies, no more cowardly complaisance. I am free! I am no longer obliged to enter opera-houses, or to speak of them, or to hear them spoken of. . . . Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax hominibus voluntatis!!"

Referring to the same subject in a letter, he says:—

"I have left the Journal des Débats. Nothing can be more comical than the disappointment and wrath of the men who, for three months, have been paying court to me. They have lost their trouble, they are robbed," &c.

Berlioz thoroughly enjoyed his freedom:—

"I have not put my foot inside a lyric theatre for two months. I have seen neither 'Moïse' nor 'La Fiancée du Roi de Garbe,' nor the marvels of the Italians, nor the new ballet, nor anything."

But with leisure came ennui, heightened by the lassitude attendant upon disease. In truth Berlioz was at this time an object of pity. His second wife had followed Henrietta Smithson to the grave, dying suddenly of heart-rupture; and perhaps there is not in all literature a more terrible description than that given by the master of the scene at Montmartre, when the remains of the Irish actress were disinterred in order to be placed in a family grave purchased for and presented to Berlioz by his friend, M. Alexandre, the manufacturer of harmoniums. We forbear to reproduce a picture that could only have been drawn at a moment of morbid excess. It would shock the most callous reader. Enough that Berlioz saw his wives laid in the same tomb, and remarked that they rested tranquilly, awaiting the hour when he should join them.

In August, 1864, the master, a chevalier of the Legion of Honour since 1839, was created an officer of that order, and soon after, being unable to bear longer the solitude of a city from which all his friends had temporarily departed, he set out for his native South. The expedition may have been vaguely entertained upon, but was soon controlled by a purpose of the most characteristic description—none other than that of seeking out a lady ("Estelle") to whom, as a boy, he had been warmly attached, and who was, indeed, his first love. Some years earlier he had endeavoured to renew the acquaintance at Meylan, but the lady, now known as Madame F., discouraged his advances, acting throughout with great judgment and feeling. Free once more, and in the neighbourhood of her new residence (Lyons), Berlioz resolved upon another effort. At Lyons, therefore, he wrote, begging an interview, and delivered the letter himself, waiting at the door for an answer. The reply being favourable, our master soon stood in the presence of his early love, who received him with a "sweet dignity," holding the letter, apparently unread, in her hand:—

"She. We are old acquaintances, M. Berlioz! . . . (Silence.) We were two children! . . . (Silence.)

"He. Will you read my letter, Madame? It will explain to you my visit.

(Madame F. reads the letter and places it on the mantel-shelf.)

"She. So you have been again to Meylan; but, no doubt, it was by accident that you were there? You have not travelled expressly?

"He. Oh! Madame, can you think that? Do I want an accident to see again . . .? No, no, I had long desired to return. (Silence.)

"She. You have had a very exciting life, M. Berlioz.

"He. How do you know that, Madame?

"She. I have read your biography.

"He. Which?

"She. A volume by Méro; I think I bought it some years ago.

"He. Oh! do not attribute to Méro, one of my friends, an artist, and a man of esprit, that collection of fables and absurdities, the true author of which I suspect. I shall have a genuine biography—that which I have written myself.

"She. Oh! no doubt. You write so well.

"He. It is not the worth of my style to which I made reference, Madame, but to the truth and sincerity of my story. As for my sentiments towards you, I have spoken without restraint in that book, but without naming you. (Silence.)

"She. I have obtained also, some particulars respecting you from one of your friends, who married a niece of my husband's.

* * * * *

"She. As for my life it has been very simple and very sad. I have lost several of my children; I have brought up others. My husband died when they were still young. I am much touched by, and very thankful for the sentiments you have preserved towards me.

"He. Give me your hand, Madame."

Profoundly agitated Berlioz kissed the hand extended to him and left the house, to walk about the streets as feverishly as he had roamed the streets of Paris when smitten with his Ophelia. Doing so, he met M. Strakosch, the brother-in-law, and then manager of Mdle. Adelina Patti, from whom he received and conditionally accepted an invitation to dine, in the evening, with the prima donna. This, however, did not abate the fever raging in his blood. He could neither read, write, nor sit still. His legs took him mechanically to the neighbourhood of Madame F.'s house, and, when there, he bethought him to invite her to share his box at the opera. But the lady was out. He went again and met her on the stairs, in company with two German friends. She had a letter of polite refusal in her hand, and was on her road to the master's hotel. Again despair for Berlioz, but he carried off the letter, accounting it an "inestimable treasure." Then he went to dine with Patti, and "the ravishing diva, according to her custom, ran and offered to my lips her virginal forehead." More, she accompanied him to the railway station, with her brother-in-law, and there flung herself upon his neck and embraced him. But what was all this to the mature lover of a mature woman?

"How much would I have given to receive these marks of affection from Madame F. and to be treated with cold politeness by Mdle. Patti. During all the prattling of that melodious Hebe, it seemed to me that a marvellous bird with diamond eyes fluttered about my head, perching on my shoulder, thrusting its beak in my hair, and, with fluttering wings, singing the most joyous of songs. I was ravished, but not moved. . . . The aged woman, sad and obscure, to whom art was unknown, possessed my soul, as she did formerly, and as she will to my dying day."

Paris, whither he now returned, could not, any more than Patti, charm away the master's agitation. His thoughts remained with Madame F., and to her he wrote (September 26, 1864) a passionate letter, from which the subjoined is an extract:—

"Oh! Madame, Madame, I have only one object in this world—to gain your affection. Let me try to win it. I will be submissive and reserved; our correspondence shall be as infrequent as you desire, and it need never become to you a fatiguing task; a few lines from your hand will suffice. My visits to you can be but rare, but I shall know that our thoughts are no longer separated, and that, after so many sad years, during which I have been nothing to you, I have at last the hope of becoming your friend. And a friend so devoted as I shall be is rare. I will surround you with tenderness so profound and so sweet, and with an affection so perfect, as that the feelings of the man may be mistaken for the naïve emotions of a child. Perhaps you will find in this a charm; perhaps at last you will say to me 'I am your friend.'"

Madame F. promptly replied with, as she expressed it, her hand upon her heart, and in terms that inspire the most profound respect. Her letter was, in fact, a touching appeal to be let alone, such as even Berlioz, with all his strange passion, could not have read unmoved. A short extract will suffice as an indication of its character:—

"I am nothing but an old, very old, woman (for, Monsieur, I am six years your senior), with a heart shattered by days passed in anguish, with physical and moral pains of all kinds, which leave to me, as regards the joys and feelings of this life, no more illusions. I lost my best friend twenty years ago, and since then I have not sought another. . . . Since the fatal hour when I became a widow, I have broken all ties, and said adieu to pleasures and distractions in order to devote myself entirely to my home and my children. This has been my life for twenty years. It is to me a habit the charm of which nothing can destroy; for in that heart-intimacy I find the only peace possible during the days I have yet to pass on earth."

This pitiful entreaty had not the desired effect. Berlioz returned to the charge, professing to be satisfied with the assurance of "affectionate sentiments," but asking for the lady's address in Geneva, whither she was about to remove:—

"But your address! Your address! As soon as you know it yourself, send it to me, for mercy's sake. If your silence indicates a pitiless refusal and a formal purpose to interdict the most distant relation between us; if you thus put me rudely on one side, as one does dangerous or unworthy creatures, you will bring to a climax unhappiness which it would have been so easy for you to assuage. Then, Madame, may God and your conscience pardon you! I shall remain in the cold night, where you will have plunged me, suffering and desolate."

The answer to this was a short note promising the address, and subsequently one or two letters passed, announcing, on Madame F.'s part, the marriage of her son, but containing, on the part of Berlioz, passionate acknowledgments of something lying behind such an act of ordinary politeness. Presently the bride and bridegroom called on the master in Paris, and received from him so much attention, that the mother's heart was touched, and the correspondence continued; calm friendship on the one side; on the other, passion not always restrained. So it remained; but almost the last words in the master's memoirs are words of hope for more intimate relations:—

"Little by little, perhaps, despite her fear of new friendships, she will find her affectionate sentiments growing slowly. Already I am able to appreciate an amelioration of my life. The past has not entirely passed. My heaven is not yet empty. With an expectant eye I contemplate my star, that, in the distance, appears to smile upon me."

From the tone of his letters, it appears that Berlioz soon lost the comfort that had come to him thus. We see again the poor nervous, disappointed, broken-down man, shutting himself up in his room in Paris, refusing solace, and railing at the world. To Madame Ernst he writes:—

"I am passing one of those days when I wish that the world were a bomb full of powder, to which I might put a light for amusement."

He had many such days, and, like Job among the ashes, refused to be comforted. From time to time, moreover, his son was a cause of renewed trouble. In 1865 Louis wished to marry without adequate means, and his father wrote:—

"Thou art thirty-two, and at that age a man ought to know the realities of life or he will never know them. Thou needest money, and it is not I who am able to give thee any. I have enough to make both ends meet, and that is all. I was like thee when I married thy mother, but with more to complain of, since I had not the salary thou hast, and my parents, with whom I had broken, would give me nothing. I will leave thee that which my father left me, and something more; but I cannot tell thee when I shall die. . . . Believe that if, at this moment, thou wert married and hadst children, thou wouldst be a hundred times more unhappy than thou art. Profit as much as thou canst by my example. It was a series of miracles (Paganini's present; my Russian tour, &c.) which took me out of the most horrible misery. But miracles are rare, or, indeed, they would be miracles no longer. To live alone, money is needed; to live with a wife requires three times more; to live with a wife and family requires eight times more. That is as certain as that two and two make four."

In August, 1865, Berlioz travelled to Geneva, in hope of seeing Madame F., and was kindly received by that lady and her family, who, however, acted with discretion. Hereupon the master wrote to a friend:—

"I have not for one instant found myself alone with her; I have only been able to speak of other things; and that gives me an agitation of the heart which kills me. What can I do? I have not the shadow of a reason; I am unjust, stupid. . . . I tremble even now in thinking of the moment when I must go away. The country is charming; the lake is very pure, beautiful, and profound, but I know something more profound still, more pure, and more beautiful."

All this while the health of Berlioz was in a wretched state, and his letters contain frequent reference to nervous sufferings. His feelings on musical subjects remained, nevertheless, as strong as ever, and he was as ready as ever to express them. À propos, a letter addressed (December 1, 1865) to M. Asger Hamerik—a young Norwegian composer, with whom he had been intimate in Paris—deserves quotation.

"Your musical passion touches me deeply, and although I no longer interest myself in art, so much is it insulted by our horrible world, I cannot see without warm sympathy a young artist having noble illusions such as yours. You remind me of what I was forty years ago, especially by your ardent love of music, your belief in the beautiful, your energetic will, and your indomitable perseverance. Live, believe, love, and work. Despise the vulgar, but act as though you despised them not, leaving them to believe that you are of their friends, of their flatterers even. They are so stupid that they will not doubt you. Then, when you have become strong, powerful, a master, and they see themselves subdued, they will applaud you, crying, 'I always said so.' I am continually tortured by my neuralgia. . . . Death is very slow, the capricious old fellow! They perform some parts of my symphony, 'Roméo et Juliette' at the next concerts of the Conservatoire. How will the insolent and idiotic public receive them?"

In September, 1866, Berlioz was engaged at the Opéra, superintending the studies of Gluck's "Alceste," and in December of the same year we find him in Vienna, whence he writes to M. Reyher:—

"'La Damnation de Faust' was performed yesterday in the vast hall of the Redoute, before an immense audience, and with astonishing success. To tell you of the recalls, encores, tears, flowers, and applause of that matinée would be ridiculous on my part. . . . To-morrow I am invited by the Conservatoire, who wish me to hear my 'Harold' Symphony, under the direction of Helmesberger. What can I say to you? It is the greatest musical joy of my life, and you must pardon me if I dwell upon it so long."

On returning to Paris, the master formed plans for other tours, ill as he was, and often obliged to keep his bed. He made arrangements with Ferdinand Hiller to conduct a concert at Cologne, observing in his letter:—

"I shall go to the Royal Hotel, where I have several times stayed. I shall thus be more free to rest in bed as long as I please, for I am one of the most bedridden men alive. It is true that I live very little. Despite the musical delights of my stay in Vienna, the journey thither and the numerous rehearsals which I found necessary almost killed me."

In a subsequent letter to Hiller we read:—

"You speak like the doctors. 'Tis neuralgia! In like manner, when Madame Sand spoke to her gardener about a wall that had given way, she was answered. 'Oh! that's nothing, Madame, the frost has caused it.' 'Yes, but we must rebuild it.' 'Oh! it's nothing; it's the frost.' 'I don't deny that, but the wall is down.' 'Don't torment yourself, Madame, 'tis the frost.'"

In September, 1867, Berlioz went to Nérès for bathing. He took five baths, and at the fifth the doctor hearing him speak, felt his pulse, saying, "Go away at once, the waters are not good for you. You are about to have laryngitis, and you must go to a place where care can be taken of your throat. It is no light thing." The master started the same evening for Vienne, and put himself in charge of some relatives there, remaining nearly always in bed. Thence he wrote:—

"At last my natural voice has, in part, come back; the throat affection has gone; but my neuralgia has returned more ferocious than ever."

On his return to Paris, the Grand Duchess Helena of Russia, always an admirer of Berlioz' music, invited him to St. Petersburg to conduct six concerts, promising to pay all expenses, lodge him at the Michael Palace, and pay him 15,000 francs. So good an offer was not to be lost, even by a man with one foot in the grave; and on November 15 the master started for the northern capital, previously declining the proposition of an American, who wished to engage him for the United States the next year, at a charge of 100,000 francs. Of his fortune in Russia we gather something from a letter addressed (December 15, 1867) to M. Edouard Alexandre:—

"I am overwhelmed with attentions, from the Grand Duchess to the least member of the orchestra. . . . The public and the press show extreme ardour. At the second concert I was recalled six times after the Symphonie Fantastique, which was executed in an astonishing manner, the fourth movement being encored. What an orchestra! What precision! What an ensemble! I do not know if Beethoven ever heard his music performed in such a way. I am bound to tell you that, despite my sufferings, when I reached my desk and saw myself surrounded by so sympathetic a throng, I felt reanimated, and conducted, perhaps, as never before."

Writing later to Madame Massart, he said:—

"They have come from Moscow to seek me, and I shall go there after the fifth concert here, the Grand Duchess having given permission. Those people of the mezzo-Asiatic capital have irresistible arguments."

Berlioz was in Moscow on the last day of the year, and thence wrote to his friend Damcke:—

"I have accepted an engagement to conduct two concerts. Not finding a hall large enough for the first, they resolved to give it in the Riding School, a place as large as the central hall of the Palais d'Industrie in the Champs Elysées. The idea, which seemed to me foolish, has resulted in the most incredible success. There were five hundred executants and, according to the police, twelve thousand five hundred auditors. I will not attempt to describe to you the applause for the Fête in 'Roméo et Juliette' and the Offertory of the 'Requiem.' I experienced mortal anguish when this last piece—which they would have on account of its effect at St. Petersburg—began. In hearing that choir of three hundred voices always repeating its two notes, I pictured to myself the crowd becoming bored, and I feared that they would not allow me to finish. But the audience understood my idea; attention was redoubled; the expression of resigned humility had seized them. At the last bar, immense acclamation burst from all parts, and I was four times recalled. This was the grandest impression that I had produced in my life."

On returning to St. Petersburg, Berlioz appears to have suffered much from the climate, and felt a longing for the day when he should set out for Paris. In a letter to Madame Massart we read:—

"After having seen you in Paris, I will go to St. Symphorien and thence to Monaco, to bathe myself in the violets and sleep in the sun. I suffer so much, dear Madame, and my troubles are so constant that I know not what will happen. I would not die, however; I have wherewith to live."

Nevertheless, sentence of death was passed upon Berlioz soon after his return to Paris. The reaction from his Russian excitement was terrible, while grief for the loss of his son (Louis had died abroad some time before) became intensified as his weakness increased. At last he was persuaded to consult Dr. Nélaton, who, after examining him, said, "Are you a philosopher?" "Yes." "Well, call to your aid the courage of philosophy, for you will never be cured." Accepting this as the decree of fate, Berlioz turned again towards his beloved South—towards the flowers and the sun. Even there, dying as he was, a harsh fate pursued him. For a little while something of youthful animation filled his soul. The glorious scenery, the blue waters of the tideless sea, recollections of former days spent amid the same surroundings, made the mind of the master young again, and he essayed to wander once more amongst the rocks and terraces, regardless of a feeble body. Let the consequences be told in his own words:—

"I went to Monaco to seek the sun, and, three days after my arrival, I walked among the rocks running down to the sea, and was cruelly punished for my temerity. I fell among the stones, head first, upon my face, and lost much blood; so much that I remained alone stretched upon the earth, and was not able to return to the hotel, all bloody, till a long time after. I had taken a place in the omnibus for Nice, and resolved, nevertheless, to go on the morrow. I set out, and, scarcely arrived, wished to behold again the terrace on the border of the sea, of which I had always cherished a lively remembrance. I went there; I could not command a good view of the water; I desired to change my seat for a better one; I rose, and in about three paces fell again on my face and my blood poured out. Two young men who passed raised me with difficulty, and conducted me to the Hôtel des Etrangers, hard by, where I lived. They undressed me, and put me to bed, and there I remained eight days without seeing either a doctor or anybody save the domestics. Ah! ma foi! I can write no more. Tomorrow—I have no more strength. Bonsoir. After eight days' retirement, I felt a little better, and, with my face all knocked about, I took the train for Paris. My mother-in-law and my servant cried out on seeing me. This time I went to a doctor, and he treated me so well that after a month and some days I could walk a little by holding on to the furniture."

A month later (May, 1868) he writes to Morel, excusing himself for not doing so earlier:—

"My two falls, one at Monaco, the other at Nice, have taken away all my strength. At present the marks are nearly effaced, but my malady has returned and I suffer more than ever. I have only cruel things to write to you."

Shortly afterwards Berlioz made his last journey—this time to Grenoble, for the purpose of assisting at an Orphéonic Festival. Thenceforward the sands of his life rapidly ran out, and on the morning of Monday, March 8, 1869, his troubled spirit passed away.

The master's obsequies were celebrated at the Church of the Trinity on the Thursday following, with much solemnity. The Institute sent a deputation; the pall-bearers were Doucet, Guillaume, Ambroise Thomas, Gounod, Saint Laurens, Perrin, and Baron Taylor; and the band of the National Guard played selections from the Symphony in honour of the victims of July. Upon the coffin were the crowns given by the Cecilian Society, the Hungarian youth, the Russian nobility, and the final laurels of Grenoble. So the body of Hector Berlioz passed to its rest in the tomb of his Ophelia; he himself supplying an epitaph—the words with which he began and ended his memoirs:—

Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage
And then is heard no more; it is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, Signifying nothing.

His friends may have mourned for themselves, but hardly for him. Surely if ever a man needed rest it was this man, tried and torn; always at the mercy of life's tempests. Time after time he had called for death, for of the world his too sensitive soul was a-weary; and, when death came, no doubt he found it—

A quiet haven, where his shattered bark
Harbours secure till the rough storm is past.
Perhaps a passage, overhung with clouds
But at its entrance; a few leagues beyond
Opening to kinder skies and milder suns,
And seas pacific as the souls that seek them.

WE are indebted to the kindness of Mr. Charles Hargitt for permission to give here a translation of the contract between Berlioz and Jullien, the original of which, in the handwriting of the composer, is now Mr. Hargitt's property:—

"Between M. Hector Berlioz, composer of music, living in Paris, 41, Rue de Provence, and Messrs. Jullien and Company, music publishers, resident in London, 210 Regent Street, has been agreed as follows:—

"M. H. Berlioz engages himself as orchestral conductor of the Theatre Royal Drury Lane, which will henceforth be called the Royal Academy of London, and of which Messrs. Jullien and Co. are the directors. This year the service of M. Berlioz will last for three months only, from the 1st December, 1847, to the 1st March, 1848. The salary allowed to M. H. Berlioz for these three months of service will be four hundred pounds sterling, which Messrs. Jullien and Co. will pay to him in the following manner: one-fourth eight days before the departure of M. Hector Berlioz for London, a fourth at the end of the first month of service, a fourth at the end of the second month, and the last fourth at the end of the third month.

"M. H. Berlioz will not be at liberty to conduct any orchestra in London or in the provinces of England without the consent of M. Jullien, during the whole duration of the present agreement, which is made for six years, terminable from year to year at the option of M. Jullien only. The salary of M. Berlioz for the following years will be £133 6s. per month, whatever may be the length of his service; if it be six months, for example, instead of three, the salary of M. Berlioz for those six months will be £800 sterling, and so on.

"A connected agreement is made between M. Berlioz and Messrs. Jullien and Co. for concerts under the following conditions:—

"M. Hector Berlioz engages to put his music at the service of M. Jullien, to give, during one month, concerts in London or in the English provinces; these concerts will be conducted by M. Berlioz. Of these concerts there cannot be given less than four or more than eight.

"The concert month shall be determined thus, at the option of M. Jullien: a fortnight before the entry upon his duties of M. Berlioz as orchestral conductor and a fortnight after the close of Drury Lane Theatre; or the whole of the month preceding the entry of M. Berlioz upon his duties as orchestral conductor, or yet again, the month of May, 1848."

"The salary of M. Berlioz is £400, one quarter of which will be paid to him each week. The travelling expenses from Paris to London and from London to Paris, and the expenses of board and lodging of M. Berlioz in London, will be at the charge of M. Jullien. The present agreement is made for six years, and is terminable only at the will of M. Jullien and Co. During the whole time that this agreement holds good, M. Berlioz will not be at liberty to give any concert in London or in the provinces of England, whether for himself or for others, without the consent of M. Jullien.

"Finally, a third treaty is made between M. H. Berlioz and Messrs. Jullien and Co. for the composition of an opera in three acts under the following conditions:—

"M. H. Berlioz engages to write a score in three acts on a poem written in French by MM. A. Royer and Vaës. This work will be performed at Drury Lane Theatre in the season of 1849. The libretto of MM. Royer and Vaës should be sent in entirety to M. Berlioz between this and the month of March, 1848, at the latest; and M. Berlioz engages to send the complete score to M. Jullien by, at latest, October 1, 1848. M. H. Berlioz engages to prepare his opera for public representation, that is to say, to direct the rehearsals and superintend the studies during the fortnight preceding the first performance. M. Jullien will have the sole right in England and her colonies of performing and publishing the music of the said opera, and for this right engages to pay to M. Berlioz the following sums:—

"2. One hundred pounds at the first performance.

"3. One hundred pounds at the tenth performance.

"4. One hundred pounds at the fifteenth performance.

"5. One hundred pounds at the twenty-fifth performance.

"6. One hundred pounds at the thirty-fifth performance.

"7. One hundred pounds at the fiftieth performance.

"8. One hundred pounds at the seventieth performance.

"In all the sum of £800. M. Jullien will not have to pay any other fees to M. Berlioz for the performance of this opera in London or in the English provinces, but if he should give up his theatre, his successor will be bound to pay to M. Berlioz five pounds sterling for every performance, by way of author's rights. The same obligation will be imposed on the directors of the theatres in the provinces of England. Whichever of the parties shall contravene the clauses of the three agreements as above, shall be liable to the other for damages—to be fixed by competent judges, in London, should it be M. Jullien who does not fulfil his engagements; in Paris, should it be M. Berlioz.

"Drawn up in duplicate in Paris, the 19th of August, 1847.

"Signed, HECTOR BERLIOZ."

We are under obligation also to M. Prosper Sainton, who has, in the kindest manner, placed at our disposal three hitherto unpublished letters of Berlioz. The first, it will be observed, contains an interesting reference to "La Damnation de Faust," and proves that the favour now shown to that work was not withheld at the outset:—

"London, July 8, 1853.

"My dear Sainton,—I leave on Saturday next, and have so many things to do to-morrow, that it will be impossible to accept your kind invitation. Excuse me, therefore. I have written to Mr. Costa, begging him to convey my thanks to Messieurs the artists of the orchestra at Covent Garden for their gracious offer to assist in the performance at the concert which cannot now take place. I write also to Beale to thank the members of the Committee, of whom you are one, for their generous and charming idea to publish an English edition of my "Faust." It is impossible to be more delicately good and at the same time more artistic.—Your very devoted,

"HECTOR BERLIOZ."

In 1856 Miss Dolby desired to give an orchestral concert in Paris, and M. Sainton sought the counsel and co-operation of Berlioz to that end. In reply he received the following letters:—

"19, Rue de Bourtault, January 16, 1856.

"My dear Sainton,—At the end of this month I go to Germany, and do not exactly know how long I shall remain there. Moreover, several propositions have been made to me for Belgium in the month of March, and if the terms I have demanded for the Belgian concerts be met I shall accept the offers. It is therefore very probable that I shall not be in Paris during the month of March. Save for that, you cannot doubt the pleasure I should have had in putting myself entirely at Miss Dolby's disposal, and in organising and directing her concert. I have received much politeness and many marks of good fellowship from English artists, wherefore I should rejoice at the opportunity of being useful (but without any terms whatever) to a person so distinguished in all respects as Miss Dolby. I shall in any case secure the Salle Herz for the Thursday following March 9. Here is, almost exactly, the cost of a concert such as that Miss Dolby desires to give: the hall with lights, 300 francs; orchestra of 54 musicians, 800 francs; bills and tickets, 250 francs; droit des pauvres, 100 francs; care of instruments, 32 francs; M. Goffier or M. Belloni, organiser of the concert, 100 francs; Tilmant, conductor (the only one that I can advise you to take)—I know not his terms. I doubt whether Prudent will play, and whether the Director of the Opéra will allow Roger to sing. But when Miss Dolby is here to take measures herself she will obtain what she desires more easily. As for you, my dear Sainton, no doubt a great success awaits you, and your name will give much attraction to Miss Dolby's programme. Lefort is well enough liked by the public.

"I have given you the figure which the orchestra of my concerts cost me; among others, that which I give on the 25th of this month (for a repetition). I do not know if Tilmant can obtain at that price his Opéra-Comique orchestra. That will be perhaps a little dearer. . . . These, my dear Sainton, are all the details that I can give you upon the sad subject of concerts in Paris. I do not go to London this year. Beale has written to say that we have no chance of success, owing to the Lind fever, which makes all other musical enterprises impossible. I have heard nothing about the Philharmonic in Hanover Square. Whom have they engaged as conductor? Tout à vous. "HECTOR BERLIOZ."

"19, Rue de Bourtault.

"My dear Sainton,—Tilmant passes half his time in the country; it is better to write to him at the Opéra-Comique. (M. Tilmant, chef d'orchestre au Théâtre de l'Opéra-Comique.) The rehearsal is included in the 800 francs for cost of orchestra. For the rest I dare say you could diminish a little the number of stringed instruments for the Salle Herz—8 first violins, 8 seconds, 4 violas, 4 basses, and 4 double-basses, appear to me sufficient, unless you play some grand symphony (which I do not suppose). Belloni is not in Paris. He is managing Vieuxtemps' Concerts in the provinces, and will return at the end of the month. His address is 1, Rue Ribouté. He will tell you what you ought to do as regards the press. There must be a visit to Fiorentino, to M. de St. Victor, to Brandus, to Escudier, and that is all (and to Bowes, editor of Galvani's Messenger): this last is above all important, on account of the English in Paris. If I could be sure of finding myself in Paris, I would invite, at my rehearsal the day after to-morrow, all my orchestra on the part of Miss Dolby, and, without doubt, they would heartily promise their assistance. But, being uncertain, it is necessary to be sure of Tilmant, and leave him free to engage an orchestra as he thinks best. Let him know the composition of the programme as soon as possible, and procure (if there be a piece of Handel's) the orchestral parts, for you will not easily find them in Paris. Tout à vous. "H. BERLIOZ."

CRITICAL EXCURSIONS

By FR. NIECKS.

It must of course be admitted that Schumann's technique of composition was peculiar. This peculiarity, to some extent perhaps owing to the late commencement of his more serious musical studies, was indeed for the most part the product and reflex of the character of his mental constitution. But the differing of his technique from that of others does not prove it to be bad: and if it is really inferior to that of some, it may still have excellencies of its own which redeem its faults and justify its existence. One style does not suffice to exhaust the whole range of human thought and feeling. Shakespeare not only leaves room for Milton, but also for Wordsworth, Shelley, Byron, Burns, Tennyson, and R. Browning; and not only for them and poets like them, but even for men and women of less depth, height, and breadth. Although the fact of Schumann's intense subjectivity and consequent free indulgence in mannerisms weakens his claim to a place beside Palestrina, Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven, it does not disqualify him for one in the next rank below them. In passing I may remark that the reproach of untruthfulness and lack of naiveness brought against Schumann seems to me wholly unjust. On the contrary, I consider him one of the most sincere and earnest composers. Frequent and persistent syncopations and other singularities—melodic, harmonic and formal, as well as rhythmical—are not necessarily affectations or artificial trickeries; they may be also the natural and habitual expression of a peculiarly constituted individuality that loves to dwell on and recur to its favourite thoughts and feelings.

An artistic style is so complicated, so minute, and in part so impalpable an organism that a characterisation which should be at once adequate and unambiguous is an impossibility. I propose to point out the most striking and characteristic peculiarities of Schumann's style, and illustrate them by examples from his works. The reader will kindly endeavour to follow my imperfectly expressed observations; his familiarity with the music of our master will enable him to fill up the gaps in my description and light up its obscurities.

Schumann oftenest takes up a few short motives or phrases, not unfrequently only a single one, and out of this slight material he constructs a whole movement. He does this in his smaller pieces and also, though not in the same measure and manner, in the larger ones. Melodies de longue haleine and of a finely flowing sweep of outline, such as have the appearance of each of them being cast entirely from one mould, are comparatively rare in his instrumental works. He makes use with predilection of the rondo form, more especially of the simple kind wherein the constituent parts follow each other rather than lead into each other—are consecutive and even consequential rather than interpenetrative. But although his rondo forms are simpler in this respect they are sometimes complicated in another, namely, when the composer combines a series of rondos into a rondo of rondos, if I may say so. This tendency or habit of thought shows itself quite unreservedly in the pianoforte—i.e., his early—works, but is also traceable in his symphonies and other later compositions.

In order to apprehend the nature of Schumann's style still better let us compare it with that of another master. Beethoven, too, bases many of his grandest movements on a few at first sight insignificant motives. But whilst he proceeds as it were argumentatively, Schumann proceeds rhetorically. The former attains his end by evolving out of the germs of thought with which he starts the most closely knit and convincing reasoning; the latter endeavours to produce the intended impression by exhibiting his first statements under different lights and amidst various surroundings, and by restating them repeatedly and in emphasised forms. The style of Beethoven is also more contrapuntal than that of Schumann, who confines himself more to the rich resources offered by harmonic combinations and juxtapositions of keys. Somebody, no disparager, in speaking of Schumann's symphonies described the composer's style as kaleidoscopic. The expression is suggestive, but on the whole inapplicable. There may be some similitude between the chromatic changes of a kaleidoscope and the transposed and otherwise varied recurrences of Schumann's themes, but similitude is not identity. This case presents indeed all the difference that exists between a mechanical contrivance and a life-breathing organism—between matter and spirit. And who would think of stigmatising the outcome of Schumann's genius with the reproach of being a mere playing with sounds? If there are any they must be few who, being acquainted with the master's works and free from prejudice, do not acknowledge that he is a true tone-poet, and knows how to impress imagination and heart. To escape the vagueness of generalities and the danger incident to it of being misled I shall now proceed to the examination of some of Schumann's compositions, beginning with the most simple ones.

No. 1 of the "Kinderscenen" (Scenes of Childhood), Op. 15, grows out of a motive contained in two bars and consisting of five notes. This motive is once literally repeated, once with a slight modification in the succession of intervals, and once in an abbreviated as well as modified form. Therewith ends the first part. The second part brings the same motive, partly inverted, in the bass, and at the seventh bar begins the repetition of the first eight bars. J. C. Lobe, the esteemed virtuoso and composer, and one of the most noteworthy teachers, theorists, and critics of this century, cites in one of his instructive books—among which the "Lehrbuch der Musikalischen Composition" stands foremost—this miniature piece as a pretty example of how an effective composition may be produced out of very limited material by means of a happy manner of treatment. All the other pieces of the series teach the same lesson. They are lovely flowers or flowerets springing from small germs. How charming is No. 4, "Bittendes Kind," with its pianissimo repetition of every two bars! No. 5, "Glückes Genug" may be pointed out as exemplifying the fine effectiveness of a simple transposition (see bar 17: the subject, originally in D major, appears there in F major). In No. 7, "Träumerei," variety is obtained solely by the interesting utilisation of the material, which, as usual, is very slight. The second part preserves the rhythmic scheme and direction of the melodic outline of the subject proposed in the first part, but changes of key and harmonic as well as melodic modifications intensify the expression of the latter and exhibit it in various aspects. No. 11 is richer as regards material; there are in it no less than five distinct phrases instead of the one of the other numbers. But loosely—mosaic-like—as they are placed together, the piece forms a whole, being held together by unity of feeling. To advance a step towards pieces of greater length and importance, let us take up the "Fantasiestücke." That ex nihilo nihil fit is undoubtedly true, but that on the other hand out of little much can be made is strikingly exemplified by No. 1 of these pieces, "Des Abends" (In the Evening). On a vapoury accompaniment in duple time, uniform throughout the piece, floats an undulating melody in triple time, the generative motive of which undergoes but few changes, and recurs again and again in the same and in different positions. The means employed are simple; yet they sufficed the composer to create a most wonderful, delightfully mysterious tone-picture. What evening scenes, what thoughts, feelings and dreams, born of the dusky hours, does it not conjure up? Among the main causes of the bewitching effect which the piece produces may be mentioned, besides the simultaneous combination of duple and triple time, the delicious modulation from D flat to E major in the second part, which E major passage—to confess the awful truth—is a plain transposition of the D flat major passage; in short, a rosalia. But what's in a name? It cannot diminish the sweetness of the thing to which it is attached.

It is a curious fact that, unless all kinds of repetitions and transpositions—of which indeed Schumann is more lavish than most composers—come under the common designation of rosalia, there is after all not so much in his music that deserves the name. A free imitation, for instance, like the second four bars of the "Arabeske," which preserves only the direction of the melodic outline and the form of the accompaniment, but varies the intervals of the melodic progression and the positions and successions of the harmonies, is not a simple transposition a tone higher and, consequently, cannot be called a rosalia. Again the second part of the Minore I. begins in the same way in B minor as the first in E minor. But although the composer here and in the sequel often starts from the same point, he almost every time strikes out in a different direction, or at least makes a sudden turn at the last. What prevents the motive and counter-motive from becoming monotonous is the change from mode to mode and from key to key. The scheme of the Minore II. is as follows: Part I. consists of eight bars in A minor; Part II. brings new matter, beginning in F major and concluding in E minor; Part III. is a transposition of Part I. to E minor. After this the first division of the piece, which intervenes also between the Minore I. and II., recurs once more; and a coda in the spirit of a transitional passage, leading up to the first return of the first division, brings the "Arabeske" to a close. The peculiar manner of Schumann is seen still more clearly in one of the best known of his pieces, namely, in No. 1 of the "Novelletten." Here we have two phrases of four bars each which alternate with each other, but on every recurrence appear in a different key—the first, three times; the second, twice. The trio is likewise full of repetitions, remouldings, and modulations. After it the opening portion of the piece is heard again. Although the part in D flat major which follows consists of twenty-one bars it is formed entirely by the interweaving of five notes. And then reappear the earlier parts of the piece in different keys: what was in D minor is now in B flat minor, what was in F major is now in A major, &c.

One more example, one of the worst rosalias to be found in Schumann's works, and I have done with his pianoforte pieces. In the second part of No. 5 of the "Kreisleriana" a phrase of four bars, which itself contains an iteration of one of its motives, is transposed, after appearing in E flat, to B flat major, E flat minor, and D flat major, not to mention partial and otherwise modified repetitions. If you coldly examine the structure of the passage you are sure to condemn it. The judgment will be different if you enter into the spirit of the thing, and play the piece with all the passion and fire it demands. The significance and expressiveness as well as inoffensiveness of iteration and transposition may be studied in the Intermezzo II. of No. 2 of the "Kreisleriana," and No. 2 of the "Fantasiestücke." Works of art are created to be enjoyed, not to be analysed and theorised upon. The beauty of a flower is not seen best after it has been pulled to pieces; nor that of a Venus after she has been under the scalpel of the anatomist.

And now let us look for a moment at the quotations which Joseph Rubinstein brings forward to prove that Schumann wrote almost nothing else but series of rosalias in his symphonies. They are all taken from the first, the B flat major symphony. In quoting the first subject of the first Allegro Rubinstein complains that the eight opening bars are at once transposed from B flat to E flat major. Here I would again say: "Do not theorise, but go and hear the symphony well performed." Unless I am much mistaken the hearer will find that the repetition, so far from being productive of monotony, contributes to the liveliness of the movement. It is indeed one of the legitimate means by which the composer attained the end he had in view. Let us not judge the means by some a priori method.

The second subject, too, calls forth a sneer from Joseph Rubinstein on account of the symmetry between the first and second four bars, which, however, is purely rhythmical and sufficiently counterbalanced by the differences in the melodic progression, the harmonic sub-structure, and the cadences:—

There is in this strain something like the clink of Pope's rhymed couplets, which indeed we often hear in Schumann's themes. [The reader will remember the examples already quoted from Beethoven's and Schumann's works in which the first and the second half of the musical sentence differ from each other only in their cadences, showing a mode of procedure which might not inaptly be called antithetical.] But if we have here a kind of rosalia, and a rosalia is a vicious device practised by tyros and such as are no better than they, then thousands of musical thoughts which now are considered beautiful will have to be flung into the limbo of forgetfulness.

How ignorantly, carelessly, or maliciously, Joseph Rubinstein uses the term rosalia may be seen from the following quotations:—

But in his eagerness to ruin Schumann's reputation the critic misses his aim, and, instead of proving the reprehensibility and weakness of what he calls rosalias, he proves their commendableness and force. Indeed, what means more impressive than these repetitions, &c., could be imagined for the interpretation of the press and stress, the breathless precipitation pictured by the composer! It is a pity Joseph Rubinstein did not quote the two bars which in Schumann's score follow those given in illustration B; they strengthen the evidence in favour of the composer, and testify conclusively against the critic.

Why the following passage should be held up for the derision of the world is not quite apparent:—

The cumulation of the lively motive at the end of the first part, where the prevailing excitement boisterously culminates, does not seem to me to stand in need of justification.

In short, Joseph Rubinstein ignores so persistently the spirit and tout ensemble of the compositions, and, whilst loudly protesting that he proves everything, makes such unfounded and exaggerated charges that he deserves not only no confidence, but not even attention; indeed, if as a critic he deserves anything, it is either pity or contempt.

He exercises that destructive criticism which Goethe tells us is so easy, as you have only to set up in your mind some standard, some model, be it ever so narrow, assert boldly that the work of art in question does not tally with it, hence is worthless, and the matter is settled, and you are quit of all gratitude to the artist. Productive criticism, which tries to discover not only the faults but also the virtues in a work of art—tries to understand, first of all, the individuality and the aims of the artist—is of course more honourable to the critic and more profitable to the public; but then the task is one of the greatest difficulty, and implies qualities of no less rarity than patience, self-negation, active sympathy, and an impartiality that eschews foregone conclusions, and judges irrespective of the teachings of any school and the promptings of personal inclination. However, there is some comfort in the thought that Schumann will suffer as little from the rude attacks he has latterly sustained as Schiller did, of whom more than half a century ago critics à la Rubinstein said that he was a poet of phrases—nay, worse still, that he was no poet at all. And supposing Schumann's works have before them a period of neglect and disparagement such as Pope's and Byron's had to pass through, they are sure to regain, like them, their proper place in the esteem and love of the world.

Since the publication of the first instalment of my "Critical Excursions" I have been told by a friend that in describing Schumann's fame as having during the last ten years lost nothing of its solidity and brilliance I misrepresented the actual state of matters, overlooking the fact that, owing to Wagner and his rising popularity, Schumann's works had considerably sunk in the estimation of the public. I admit I ought perhaps to have worded my statement thus: If Schumann's fame has lost anything of its brilliance, it has lost nothing of its solidity. However, I cannot help thinking that any brilliance which Schumann's fame may have lost was a sort of tinsel, and hardly worth having. As there are now people who devote themselves exclusively to the worship of Wagner, and glory in their monotheism; so there were formerly people who practised the same kind of idolatry with regard to Schumann. I have no high opinion of the class of professors, critics, and connoisseurs who are followers in a sheep-like fashion, i.e., without thought and consideration. What genuine lustre can these fanatics, these poor in mind, add to the well-merited fame of either Schumann or Wagner?

I have made no attempt to deny the modicum of truth contained in Joseph Rubinstein's allegations, or to hide Schumann's weaknesses, and willingly concede that the many short phrases and clinking antithetical themes, and the frequent repetitions and transpositions, detract undoubtedly from the dignity, richness, and breadth of the composer's style. But the critic could never have arrived at the conclusions with which he astonished his readers if he had not, instead of looking at the things pictured on the tapestry, confined himself to examining and counting the loops of the web. The historian Ambros, in speaking of Schumann, says: "The Symphonies in B flat and C major [I wish he had added the one in E flat], the pianoforte quartet and quintet, the string quartets (especially the one in A minor), the pianoforte concerto in the same key, and 'Paradise and the Peri,' are, in the best sense of the word, classical—i.e., valuable—works of art for all time." Of the two Allegri of the B flat major Symphony he remarks that they "rush along in the plenitude of youthful life"; and "the precise, short, hurrying rhythms in the first Allegro of the Second Symphony" remind him of "something similar in Beethoven (the first Allegro of the Fifth and Eighth Symphonies)." Whilst Ambros alludes so eulogistically to the first movement of the B flat major Symphony, and Mr. Prout, in his by no means indiscriminately laudatory analysis of Schumann's symphonies, calls it a "glorious movement," Joseph Rubinstein declares it to be a ridiculously childish concoction, and pretends to prove his assertion by showing us some odds and ends torn from the whole. To judge the work aright, we must take into account the light-winged spirit which pervades it, and, if that is done, the embodiment will not be found altogether inadequate. But Joseph Rubinstein probably considers the spirit of the work objectionable; at any rate, he speaks disparagingly of the sprightly tripping first subject of the last movement as ballet music. Now, I think the symphony form is equally well adapted for the light as for the grave; it holds not only Beethoven's most thoughtful contents, but also Haydn's most playful. It is a pity Joseph Rubinstein stopped short in his examination with the B flat major Symphony; if he had proceeded a light might have dawned even upon him, and shown him that Schumann had not spoken his last word in the first of his larger works. I advise the reader to undertake an examination at least of the symphonies, and I rather think he will do better without such a guide. Here are a few points which struck me in going over the ground. The peculiarities which we studied in the pianoforte pieces are, as I have already stated, to be met with in the symphonies, but not in the same measure and manner. According to Joseph Rubinstein, rosalias abound most in Schumann's larger works; in reality, just the reverse is the case. In the B flat major Symphony repetitions at the same and at a different pitch occur still pretty frequently; indeed, many transpositions and sequences besides those quoted by the critic may be pointed out. For instance, in the lovely Larghetto the transposition of the forte passage in C major to A major, and further on a series of sequences; in the Menuetto, a transposition of the first eight bars a fifth higher; and in the last movement a considerable number of all kinds of repetitions. Transpositions, although not absent from the following symphonies (the introduction of the C major Symphony, to go no further, contains rosalias), present themselves with less and less frequency and plainness.* These maturer works, which are of a more serious cast than their predecessors, show also a different workmanship. Surveying the four symphonies from the first movement of the first to the last movement of the last we perceive a continuous progress, evidenced by the quality of the subject-matter and the handling of the form: longer cantilenas occur more frequently; the shorter motives are distinguished by greater significance; and closeness of connection takes the place of looseness, interpenetration of parts of mere sequence. A comparison of the slow movements illustrates perhaps the composer's development in the most striking manner. It has often and truly been observed that Schumann could not write Adagios such as Beethoven wrote, but these slow movements testify to the former's striving to attain, and his success in coming nearer, the wonderful and never-equalled breadth of the greater master. There is, however, one circumstance which it is important to keep in mind. The Symphony in D minor, No. 4, notwithstanding its great and many beauties the least perfect of the four, was composed before Nos. 2 and 3 (those in C and E flat major), being abandoned, and after many years taken up again.

And now I shall take leave of Joseph Rubinstein, and bring our Excursions to a close by referring to an article containing a discussion of that gentleman's estimate of the composer, which appeared in the Deutsche Musiker Zeitung on November 1, 1879. Dr. Langhans, the writer of this article, reproves, although too leniently, the critic's insensibility to Schumann's "exalted genius and pure ideality";

* A decreasing frequency of repetitions &c., is also noticeable in Beethoven's later works; indeed, the style of progressive masters tends always from the analytic to the synthetic.

and approves, but too absolutely, his denunciations of the composer's rosalia tendencies. One of Joseph Rubinstein's positions, however, Dr. Langhans attacks most valiantly. The former had declared that only a small portion of Schumann's songs might possibly induce him to modify and mitigate his judgment of the composer, as those of them which departed more and more from the character of the folk-song, so happily adhered to by Schubert, came under the baneful influence of a morbid Weltschmerzlichkeit and false sentimentality. Dr. Langhans comments on this as follows: "Though the 'ennobling power of beauty' which manifests itself in so many of Schumann's songs, and also here and there in his larger vocal works, remained unfelt by the incarnate Wagnerite, we should have expected that, as such, he would more fully have appreciated Schumann's high merit with regard to the re-establishment of a just relation between tone and word in vocal music; and that he would have shown how Schumann, by carefulness of declamation and subtlety of characterisation, made a great stride in advance even of his nearest predecessor, Mendelssohn, and thus immediately prepared the way for the principles of Wagner." This testimony is so much the more weighty as it comes from one who, in his "History of Music" and in his other writings, has proved himself an enthusiastic admirer of Wagner's works and a staunch upholder of his doctrines. What Dr. Langhans says about the contrast of principles existing between Schumann and Wagner is likewise so interesting and so well formulated that I cannot resist the temptation of quoting it in full and verbally: "As regards this contrast, we have to keep in sight two points of view: on the one hand, the contest of the 'Kunstwerk der Zukunft' (Art-Work of the Future) with the romanticism of the period previous to the March Revolution of 1848; on the other hand, that of vocal music with instrumental music. On both domains we see the two masters oppose each other rudely; for that Schumann carried to the highest point the Weltschmerz, the subjective burrowing in the personal spheres of thought—in short, all the peculiarities of the romantic epoch—even his warmest admirers will not deny. And as Wagner here opposes the lyric with the objective power of the dramatist, so he opposes there the instrumental composer as apostle of a vocal music which, although founded on ancient traditions, yet is new for our time, i.e., of the monody, naturally developed from expressive speech."

DR. LANGHANS IN BRITAIN.

WHEN Robert Burns said—

Oh! wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us—his prayer for accurate, or at any rate impartial, introspection may have arisen to some extent from our national curiosity as to the light in which we are regarded by outsiders. It is a fact beyond question that the inhabitants of this island are supremely addicted to self-criticism. No man abuses England more heartily than an Englishman, or is more ready to proclaim her shortcomings on the housetops. Yet we can hardly suppose that this indicates lack of patriotism, or want of pride in the citizenship of so great a country; and it may be that the phenomenon is explained by reference to a kind of instinctive anticipation of outside opinion—to the Englishman's projection of himself into the place of the foreigner, whose actual judgment he disarms by foreshadowing it. Be this as it may, we are all intensely interested in what our visitors say of us. If any man of note wishes to sell a book in England let him write one about England, and the thing is done. It does not signify much whether the tone be one of praise or abuse. Too much praise, however, defeats its own purpose; the peculiarly English quality of common sense suspects and rejects it. As for abuse, our people take it with a quietness of spirit which the observer may attribute, as he pleases, either to the calm indifference of an imperial race or the callousness of an insensitive national temperament.

Among our latest visitors and censors has been Dr. W. Langhans, the distinguished German critic and littérateur, who came, as may be supposed, to spy out our artistic rather than our commercial, social, or any other condition, and to report his discoveries in the Musikalisches Centralblatt. Dr. Langhans made his way by sea to Edinburgh, and was fortunate enough, or the reverse, to reach the northern capital on the eve of the great volunteer review. Luckily for the tired traveller in a strange land, a brother in art, Mr. Mackenzie, was ready to do the honours of hospitality, but no good fate could avert from Dr. Langhans's ears the music of what he somewhat contemptuously calls our "holiday warriors." The interminable procession of brass bands past his window was no doubt a sore infliction, and we can hardly be surprised that Dr. Langhans, wincing under the torture—perhaps barely recovered from sea-sickness—thought some hard thoughts. He told his countrymen at home that the military music of the volunteers was as different from that of Germany as the bearing of the holiday warriors was from that of Kaiser Wilhelm's legions. Now, this was hardly right, because there are no points of just comparison. A volunteer band, in a thinly populated country like Scotland, is a "scratch" organisation made up of imperfectly taught amateurs, and under the circumstances it cannot possibly be anything else. To regard it as representative of English military music is, therefore, as unfair as to estimate German bands by the Teutonic immigrants who make our streets hideous with their discordant noises. However, the Scottish performers must have been very bad, since Dr. Langhans actually welcomed the bagpipes as a relief. He had read the story of Delhi, and knew all about "The Campbells are comin'." His poetic feeling, therefore, invested the bagpipes with a halo of romance, and he described to his German readers the nature and effect of the instrument with much curious interest. Let us fervently hope that he will take no steps to naturalise it in the Fatherland, since the result must be to augment tenfold the ever-swelling volume of emigrants therefrom.

From Edinburgh our traveller proceeded to Glasgow, and had, among other experiences, that of a garden concert, which he appears not to have liked at all. He compared the arrangements with those made under similar circumstances at home, and his soul was dissatisfied. Constant moving about on damp grass, with a damp sky overhead, the absence of seats, of refreshment places, and of illuminations, made the whole affair so uncomfortable that the programme was hurried through, and the audience dismissed with a few bars of "God save the Queen," the mutilation of which Dr. Langhans regarded as simply barbarous. All this is, no doubt, very true and very sad, but had Dr. Langhans any experience of the Glasgow climate he would, even now, be lost in admiration at the bold idea of attempting an out-of-door entertainment at all. The fact that that idea was carried out shows the elasticity of human nature, and its power of rising superior to circumstances, in a manner that might fitly engage the attention of a philosopher. At Oban Dr. Langhans met with a copy of Chambers's Journal, wherein a writer discussed, and answered affirmatively, the question "Are we a musical nation?" Our visitor at once traversed both the argument and the conclusion, but we do not propose to follow his example pro or con. The subject is stale, and the real fact "is as it may be." We note, however, that Dr. Langhans points to the high artistic position of England under Elizabeth, and deduces therefrom that the muses were not originally harsh stepmothers to the island realm. Thence he goes on to find the cause of our musical decadence in an unhealthy striving after material good. Unquestionably he is to a large extent right. We have had scope for our energies, while the people of the Continent, held in leading-strings by their rulers, have been kept out of the larger fields of activity and driven to pursuits destitute of political and national significance. It was inevitable that the temptation of wealth and power should overcome artistic instinct. Only we ourselves could build up an empire and make the world our tributary, but we could import artists, as the Romans did before us; and, standing on our money-bags, we learned to look down on "fiddlers." Generations must pass ere the mischief be remedied, if ever; meanwhile it will be seen whether German art decays as liberty and power increase. Even now there are not wanting signs that history is about to repeat itself.

Dr. Langhans made his way from Scotland to Worcester, at the time the Festival was held there, and was struck by the interest it excited in the locality. He speaks of the crowded city, the many visitors and so on; but, looking with his German eyes, he noted the absence of German sociableness. Not that sociableness was entirely wanting. The Dean showed cordial hospitality, and there were moments when, beneath the roof of the "Crown" or "Star," Dr. Langhans could exchange greetings with London critics and musicians, among whom he specially mentions Mr. Davison, Mr. Bennett, and Mr. Prout. Still the genial hob-a-nob over a tall glass of amber liquid with a white "head"—the feast of reason and the flow of beer—was not of Teutonic frequency, and naturally called forth our visitor's regret. The doings in the Cathedral variously impressed Dr. Langhans. He saw, in the presence and co-operation of the clergy, a suggestion of the union between religion and art which the Greeks made so intimate. But while this pleased and interested him, he was shocked and offended by the choral responses to the prayers at the close of the oratorio. Dr. Langhans seemed to have an idea that these responses were given by the "dissonant voices" of the cathedral choir, whereas the entire chorus joined in them. We do not at all understand our critic's objection. Surely there can be nothing in the grand dominant and tonic of an "Amen" unworthy of the finest precedent music, nor can the use of those harmonies be reasonably advanced as proof that we are not a musical nation. Dr. Langhans is more just when he censures the audience for attending to their garments, &c., during the final chorus, instead of listening patiently to the end. No doubt the claims of luncheon are strong when the rule is "first come, first served," and when the appetites are healthy provincial ones, but the practice on which our visitor animadverts has no defence. It is of the Philistines most Philistine. We go with Dr. Langhans, furthermore, as he shows the absurdity of listening to certain "numbers" standing, in imitation of an observance once limited to the "Hallelujah" Chorus. Yet there is some excuse in a cathedral, where the oratorio nominally forms part of a religious service. Once more, Dr. Langhans does well to point out that the enormous mass of music given at an English festival has disadvantages. While admitting this, however, it is difficult to see how, under present conditions, a change could be made.

The manner in which, when the Festival was over, artists and critics rushed away to other work reminded Dr. Langhans that he was in the native land of the proverb, "Time is money." He himself departed—more leisurely perhaps—towards Cornwall, bent upon seeing Tintagel and the scenes consecrated by Arthurian romance. Space does not allow us to follow him there, and it must suffice to say that he severely criticises Richard Wagner's topographical knowledge as exemplified in "Tristan und Isolde." From Cornwall Dr. Langhans proceeded to London, where he found no other music than operetta available. With a word of generous appreciation for "Patience," and some notice of the article that recently appeared in our columns upon Vincent Novello, the Doctor brings his interesting remarks to a close. We trust he will visit England again, and give us more of such kindly and instructive criticism.

THE publication of J. S. Bach's Suite in C minor, for the pianoforte, by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, again calls our attention to the danger of allowing a musical work to circulate in various arrangements without definitely announcing what instrument it was originally written for. It appears that several copies of this Suite exist in manuscript at Berlin and Leipzig; all, with one exception, describe the composition as "for the piano," but the copy in the Stadtbibliothek at Leipzig bears on its title "for the lute." Dr. Franz, who edits the work, says that only the discovery of an autograph can decide for which instrument the work was composed. This is assuredly true; but if all copies from the original had been made by persons who respected the composer's intention, no doubt on the subject could ever have arisen. We happen to know that many musical compositions are spread throughout this country which, although merely "arrangements," not only do not have this fact stated upon the title-page, but bear no indication at all that they are not in every respect precisely as the composer wrote them. Pieces composed for one instrument are adapted for another; solos are transformed into duets, and duets into solos; and, in some cases even imitations of the style of a composer are put forth as by the composer himself. A "Song by Beethoven," too, has often, on examination, proved to be an adaptation from a movement of one of his Symphonies, and vocal pieces by other great composers have frequently the same origin. Were all these alterations duly acknowledged, we should not have the same reason for complaint; but, apart from the fact that musicians themselves are sometimes deceived, we cannot too strongly protest against a system which fosters such false notions in the minds of young people; for if they are taught to believe that an adaptation is the original, they will most certainly conclude that the original is an adaptation.

WHEN a pupil asks her professor of singing to bring her a "sacred song," he perfectly well knows what to do, for the character of a vocal piece is determined by the words; and however secular therefore may be the music, if the text be of a religious nature, he can very easily select what will pass for a "sacred song." But when a pianoforte master is asked for a "sacred piece," the task is somewhat more difficult, for he can only choose an arrangement of a song or other vocal composition, unless he fix on the "Dead March" in "Saul," or some other piece with an equally distinctive title. By the following advertisement, which recently appeared in an Irish newspaper, however, we find that some persons can not only define the two styles of music, but that a term is used for non-religious compositions which we may hope is peculiar to the locality from which it emanates: "Wanted immediately, a competent Bandmaster to teach sacred and profane music on a large brass band; army or navy pensioner. Catholic and teetotaler preferred. Address," &c. Now, without stopping to dwell upon the excessive difficulty of teaching "on a large brass band," we should much like the advertiser to inform us what he really means by "profane music." If the word is merely used to signify compositions that are not sacred, we should imagine that the term "secular" would have answered the purpose; and we can only therefore believe that the "profanity" must relate to the words with which the music is indissolubly united. It seems strange, however, that the duty of teaching these—probably some arrangements of rollicking Irish drinking songs—should devolve upon a "Catholic and teetotaler." The advertisement is indeed a puzzle; and we can only hope that, when properly trained, the "large brass band" will confine its performances of "profane music" to sympathetic audiences.

THERE can be no greater sign of the progress of music than the fact of journals circulating chiefly amongst the ladies of a family devoting articles to the elucidation of every branch of the art, and especially advocating the practice and study of high-class compositions. It may be said that this was also the custom in times gone by. "Eliza Cook's Journal," for example, had what was termed "Our Musical Corner"—music was always put in a corner in those days—but the tea-table kind of talk about pieces and songs which we should now scarcely bestow a thought upon was only suited for those who regarded music as an agreeable accompaniment to conversation and cards; and it was too evident that the praise bestowed upon these works was written by one who could not appreciate anything beyond them. In illustration of the change which has now taken place, we refer with pleasure to the volume recently forwarded to us, called "The Girls' Own Annual." In this we have not only several articles upon music, but the names of their authors are given, and these include some of our most accomplished artists. "What is a Correct Musical Taste?" by Professor Macfarren; "On Part-Singing," by Henry Leslie; "How to Play Mendelssohn's 'Songs Without Words,'" by Lady Benedict; "On Method in Teaching the Pianoforte," by Edwin M. Lott, may be cited as specimens of lectures delivered throughout the length and breadth of the land by competent authorities through our family journals; and that such preaching makes numerous converts to the true faith there can be no doubt, for it can scarcely be believed that the proprietors of "The Girls' Own Annual" would employ such eminent missionaries if the "Girls," upon whom they rely for support, were not ready to listen to them.

WE are glad to find that the desire so often expressed by music-lovers of disseminating a knowledge of the art amongst the poorer classes of the metropolis is now assuming a practical form. Of course "Cheap Concerts for the People" are all important in aiding this movement; but there are many around us who earnestly long for the opportunity of taking part in the rendering of musical works, and it is good, therefore, to provide facilities for the gratification of so laudable a wish. The idea of instituting "Choral Classes for the Poor," which emanates from the Kyrle Society, is an excellent one, and deserves every encouragement. It is proposed that these classes shall be open to all comers, men and women (after inquiring as to their respectability) on the payment of a purely nominal fee. In every district there will be three classes—Elementary, Remove, and Advanced—the members of the last-named class becoming eligible, after fit preparation, for election to the public performing Kyrle Choir, the entrance to which, as members, will be free of charge. There are several details connected with the undertaking which can be known by application to the Honorary Treasurer of the Society, Miss Octavia Hill, 14, Nottingham Place, W.; but we may mention that many clergymen and others have already placed a number of schoolrooms and halls at the disposal of the Committee without any charge. There can be little doubt that, considering the low price at which the standard works in musical art are now published, the members of these classes need never be at a loss for copies of the compositions to be performed; and we sincerely hope that all who have the wish and power to do so will aid the good cause by forwarding liberal subscriptions and donations.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL CHORAL SOCIETY.

THE eleventh season of this Society has commenced in a manner very favourable to its pretensions to rank as one of the leading musical institutions of the metropolis. The first Concert, on the 2nd ult., consisted of a performance of "Judas Maccabæus," in which, as on former occasions, the usual orchestra was supplemented by a military band. Whatever opinions may be held as to the taste or expediency of this addition to Handel's score, the increased effect in the more martial numbers of the oratorio cannot be gainsaid. The general performance of "Judas" was as near perfection as possible, the choruses being magnificently sung throughout, and the solos uniformly well rendered by Miss Anna Williams, Miss Orridge, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley.

"Elijah" was selected for the second Concert, on the 23rd ult., and the unabated popularity of Mendelssohn's second Oratorio was amply proved on this occasion, even the Albert Hall being for once too small to accommodate all those who sought admission. It is not at all likely that any among the enormous audience went away disappointed, for a finer performance of "Elijah" has rarely, if ever, been heard in London. Mr. Barnby may be congratulated upon the admirable state of efficiency to which he has now brought his choir. The voices generally, but especially of the sopranos and tenors, are of splendid quality, and the careful training to which they are subjected was shown in this instance by the firmness and precision in attack, the clear enunciation of the words, and, where needed, the delicacy and expression which characterised the delivery of the choral numbers. The soloists gave almost unmixed satisfaction. Mr. Santley, as the Prophet, sang with all his accustomed intelligence and impressiveness, and with much of his old power and beauty of voice. Madame Marie Roze did not perhaps succeed in giving the fullest effect to the soprano music, but she was at least artistic and careful in all she did. The transition from the oratorio to the oratorio style is one that cannot be made in a day. The efforts of Madame Patey and of Mr. Edward Lloyd in "Elijah" are too familiar to need description. A good word must be said for Miss Damian, who gained hearty applause for her artistic delivery of the air "Woe unto them"; and efficient service was rendered in the concerted music by Miss Marianne Fenna, Mr. George Cox, and Mr. Stanley Smith. Dr. Stainer continues to preside at the organ in his well-known irreproachable style.

CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE record of the Saturday Concerts at the Crystal Palace during the past month must be chiefly occupied with an event of more than ordinary importance—the performance for the first time in England of Berlioz' "Lelio." The name of the French master has by this time attained a degree of popularity almost equal to that persistently refused to him during his life, and lavished on his memory by his countrymen; and the very fact of his name being prominently represented in the programme was sufficient to fill the large concert-hall of the Palace almost to the last seat on two different occasions. The fact is of considerable significance, and should teach a lesson to those who, with more or less intentional blindness, refuse to see the enormous change which of late years has come over the taste of English amateurs, and—one is happy to add—of English composers, who seem at last determined to abandon the grooves of absolute Mendelssohn-worship, and to show that they also are moved by the powerful impulse of modern music. To return to the subject under discussion, we must briefly state the circumstances under which the first performance of "Lelio," and its repetition within the same month, took place. "Lelio," it should be understood, is a continuation of the "Symphonie Fantastique," performed last season at Mr. Ganz's Concerts, and fully commented upon by us on that occasion. In the last movement of that extraordinary work the artist, of whose life this symphony is an episode, is left in a sore plight. Betrayed by his loved one—represented musically by a melodious idée fixe—he determines on suicide, and takes a dose of opium, which, however, instead of killing him, only produces a horrible nightmare. In this condition he imagines that he has killed his mistress, and is condemned to die. The procession to the scaffold, where the last thought of his loved one is the embodiment of the idée fixe already mentioned, is cut short by the axe, and the orgies of mocking fiends at his burial are the subjects of the concluding tableau. In "Lelio" we witness the awakening of the artist from his dream. "Heavens! I still live," he exclaims, and forthwith commences a description of his sufferings in high-sounding phrases in which Shakespeare—or, as Mr. Grist, the English adapter, following the German version of the libretto, calls him, "thou Swan of Avon"—Moore, and other miscellaneous topics occur in kaleidoscopic disorder. Let us state here at once that this monologue, which interrupts rather than connects the various pieces of music, is an unqualified nuisance which at any future repetition of "Lelio" should be cut down as much as possible, or else omitted altogether. Its literary merit is below zero, and little more can be said of its dramatic purport, which is united to a description of how Lelio, after indulging in dreams of happiness, and, by way of change, joining (in imagination) a gang of ferocious brigands, assembles his "numerous pupils" and rehearses with them a choral fantasia on Shakespeare's "Tempest." The connection of the musical fragments of which the score consists with this meagre plot is established in this wise: the artist's imaginative flights above specified are echoed as soon as uttered by an ideal orchestra and chorus behind the curtain (the piece was originally designed for a theatre, and executed in that form at Weimar); when reality takes the place of fancy the curtain rises, and discloses a body of singers and instrumentalists to be conducted by Lelio in the ordinary manner. The score in its entirety consists of six numbers. The first of these is a pretty but somewhat conventional setting of Goethe's ballad, "The Fisher," for tenor, which even the admirable singing of Mr. Lloyd could not raise above the level of the ordinary drawing-room ballad. Next follows a "Spirit Chorus," in unison and octaves, which is effective and well-instrumented, although by no means equal to Berlioz' maturer work—it belonged in reality to a cantata written during his studentship at the Conservatoire. The "Brigand's Song" (bass, with chorus) which ensues is noisy rather than characteristic, and failed to make any profound impression, in spite of Mr. F. King's laudable efforts. No. 4, "A Song of Happiness," again for tenor, and again beautifully sung by Mr. Lloyd, is perhaps the most effective number of the score. Next follows a short orchestral piece entitled "Souvenirs," in which the effect of an æolian harp is cleverly imitated by the mysterious whirr of the united strings, accompanying a soft melody of the solo clarinet (Mr. Clinton); and this, after some more talking, leads to the pièce de résistance of the entertainment, the choral fantasia on Shakespeare's "Tempest," to Italian words, in which the characters of Miranda and Caliban are each indicated by the representative themes belonging to them. It will be seen that these various pieces of music have nothing in common with each other; neither is their intrinsic merit such as to atone for this want of unity. In brief, Berlioz' "Lelio" is nothing more than a piece of daring eccentricity more likely to raise a laugh than to excite the feelings of terror and pity intended by the composer. As such it was recognised by musicians and critics at the first performance, and the impression was no doubt shared by the greater portion of the audience, who nevertheless acted wisely in voting for the repetition of the work, Mr. Manns having submitted the question to the decision of a plebiscite. Berlioz, even when he chooses to "desipere in loco"—in plain English, to play the fool—should not be condemned without mature consideration. This repetition accordingly took place on the 19th ult., this time in connection with the "Symphonie Fantastique," which on that occasion received a rendering as admirable and finished as the first had been perfunctory.

The remaining events of the month worth mentioning may be summed up in few words. They were, in the order of performance: Raff's beautiful Symphony, "Lenore," admirably played (the 5th ult.); a conscientious rendering by Mr. Walter Bache of Chopin's Concerto in F minor, with Klindworth's additional orchestration (the 12th ult.); and Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto (Mdlle. Janotha) and Wagner's "Faust" Overture (the 26th ult.).

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

WITH the commencement of the present season (1881-2) these sterling Concerts have reached the twenty-fourth anniversary of their existence, and the Directors may look back with just gratification upon the work hitherto accomplished by an institution which has long since become one of the leading features of London musical life. Nor can there be any doubt that the appreciation of abstract music of the highest type as here offered is still on the increase, as was proved by the more than usually crowded appearance of St. James's Hall during the four evenings of the proceedings of which we here give a brief record.

Two interesting novelties (in this country) were included in the programme of the opening Concert (October 31), both proceeding from the pen of the recognised chief representative of the modern German classical school, Johannes Brahms, and consisting of his String Quartet in A minor (the second of two, comprising his Op. 51) and a Rhapsodie in B minor for pianoforte. Although cast throughout in the orthodox mould, the quartet in question reflects in a marked manner the individuality of its author; and, while being less diffuse than the majority of Brahms's later compositions, there is a freedom and ease in the treatment of the various movements which at once betray the master hand. We shall have occasion to refer to this work again after a second hearing, which will doubtless soon be afforded, judging by the warm applause with which its admirable rendering on the part of MM. Straus, Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti was greeted. The Rhapsodie—an interesting work enough, but scarcely rhapsodical either in style or structure—derived additional attractiveness and charm by having been interpreted by Mdlle. Janotha; who also played in her best manner, although with a somewhat undue acceleration of tempo, Mendelssohn's ever-popular Andante and Rondo Capriccioso, in which the lady was excelled. Rubinstein's Three Pieces for Pianoforte and Violoncello, played by Mdlle. Janotha and Signor Piatti, and Haydn's String Quartet in D minor (Op. 42), by the quartet party already mentioned, completed the programme. Mr. E. Lloyd was the vocalist.

The second Concert under notice (the 7th ult.) introduced a violinist of considerable Continental reputation, Herr Rappoldi, whose brilliant technique and grand quality of tone became at once apparent—and consequently duly appreciated by an audience accustomed to listen to instrumental artists of the highest order—in his taking the lead in Beethoven's Quartet in C minor (Op. 18), and in his interpretation of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor, for violin solo, which was enthusiastically applauded. Mdlle. Janotha's reading on this occasion of Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, known as the "Appassionata," will not soon be forgotten by those who had the privilege to hear it. It seems scarcely credible that after so grand and so ex-haunting an effort a demand for an "encore" should be heard amongst the audience. Yet such was the case, and although persisted in for some time the gifted pianist very properly declined to accede to so unreasonable a request. The Concert closed with Haydn's Quartet in D major (Op. 64), the interpreters being MM. Rappoldi, L. Ries, Zerbini, and Piatti. Vocal solos were contributed during the evening by Miss Marian McKenzie.

At the third Concert of the season (the 14th ult.) Mdle. Janotha was again the pianist, and Herr Rappoldi the violinist, the two artists joining in the rendering of Schubert's Rondo Brillant in B minor (Op. 70) for pianoforte and violin. Their respective solo performances were Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor (Op. 28) for pianoforte, and Bach's Prelude and Fugue from that master's third Violin Sonata, both of which have been previously—the fantasia indeed frequently—heard at these concerts. A novelty here was, however, the performance on the part of the lady just named and Signor Piatti of Schumann's "Märchenbilder" (Op. 113) for pianoforte and violoncello. The four pieces, or "pictures," of which the work consists are simple in structure, but suggestive of the mysterious character to which their title lays claim. It is unnecessary to add that the interpretation at the hands of two such artists left nothing to be desired. Mozart's Quartet in B flat, No. 9, opened the Concert, the executants being MM. Rappoldi, L. Ries, Hollander, and Piatti. Miss Santley was the vocalist, and gave with much refinement songs by Gounod, Chopin, and Schubert.

The fourth Concert (21st ult.) opened with Beethoven's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 74), known as the "Harfen" Quartet, owing to the pizzicato passages in the first movement, which was most admirably rendered by MM. Straus, L. Ries, Hollander, and Piatti. Owing to indisposition, Mdle. Janotha was compelled at the last moment to resign her place at the pianoforte to Miss Agnes Zimmermann, who played with her usual artistic grace and refinement Mendelssohn's Caprice in A minor (Op. 33), being also associated with MM. Straus and Piatti in a capital interpretation of Schumann's Pianoforte Trio in D minor (Op. 63). Mendelssohn's Andante and Scherzo for strings concluded a programme which was decidedly interesting, though presenting no novel feature. Miss Carlotta Elliot contributed vocal pieces by Handel, Eckert, and Schumann. Mr. Zerbini officiated as Conductor on each occasion.

Of the last Concert of the month (the 28th ult.) we must speak in our next number.

MR. WALTER BACHE'S RECITAL.

As in many previous years, the first Pianoforte Recital of the season was given by Mr. Walter Bache, the event taking place on Tuesday afternoon, the 1st ult., at St. James's Hall, in presence of a fairly numerous audience. Hostile criticism, openly expressed, or veiled in the guise of satire, has not induced Mr. Bache to relinquish his efforts to popularise the music of Liszt, and although the goal seems as far off as ever, he labours unfalteringly in the cause. On this occasion he introduced three of Liszt's compositions, not one of which, however, could be considered an actual novelty. The "Mephisto Walzer," played at the Richter Concerts last season, is not very interesting as music, even in its original form, and such effectiveness as it possesses is of course lessened in the pianoforte transcription. The Légende, "St. Francis Preaching to the Birds," is a trivial composition, not without a certain prettiness, but of no real art value. The Rapsodie Hongroise in A minor, No. 13, was the most commendable of the Liszt selections, because it aims at being nothing better than a brilliant show piece, and fairly hits its mark. To musicians the most interesting feature of the Recital was the performance of Beethoven's grand Sonata in B flat, Op. 106, a work that affords a crucial test of the abilities of a pianist. It would be incorrect to assert that Mr. Bache fully mastered the executive difficulties of this colossal Sonata, but his reading was marked by earnestness and intelligence; and in the two middle movements artistic intention and mechanical exactitude were equally noteworthy in the interpretation. It has now become such a general practice with pianists to dispense with book that it is almost unnecessary to mention that Mr. Bache played the whole of his programme from memory.

BOROUGH OF HACKNEY CHORAL ASSOCIATION.

THE first Concert of the season was given at the Town Hall, Shoreditch, on the 14th ult., before a crowded audience. Sullivan's sacred Cantata, "The Martyr of Antioch," and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" were the compositions selected for performance. The difficult soprano part in the first-named work was to have been sung by Miss Henrietta Beebe; but as she was unfortunately too unwell to appear, Madame Clara West undertook the whole of the music, literally at only a few hours' notice, and acquitted herself so well of her exacting task as to elicit warm and well-deserved applause. The other solo parts were well given by Miss Hope Glenn, Messrs. Frank Boyle, Arthur Oswald, and W. G. Forington. The choral parts were so carefully sung as to give the usual evidence of sound training; but it struck us that the sopranos were somewhat weaker than we have been accustomed to. In the "Walpurgis Night" the tone of the choir was much better; and the fine dramatic choruses were given with excellent effect. The principal vocalists in this work were Miss Hope Glenn, Messrs. Frank Boyle, Arthur Oswald, and W. G. Forington, all of whom were thoroughly satisfactory. The orchestra was well balanced and in every respect efficient, the Overture to Mendelssohn's work, especially, being rendered with much precision and dramatic feeling. Mr. E. Prout was, as usual, an able and conscientious Conductor.

LONDON CHURCH CHOIR ASSOCIATION.

THE above Association held its ninth Annual Festival in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday evening, the 3rd ult., when several works composed expressly for the occasion were heard for the first time. Besides an Evening Service in B flat by Dr. Stainer, composed for the fifth festival of the Association in 1877, an Anthem by Mr. C. Villiers Stanford and several new hymn-tunes of no great interest, by various composers, were performed.

The Magnificat is particularly fine, being built upon a broad and firm phrase, which is steadily and skilfully worked out through the composition, and is used with finest effect to accompany the strong simple harmonies of the Amen. The opening of the Nunc dimittis is noticeable too for the quiet, peaceful effect produced by the absence of the trebles, which do not enter for some time after the other parts.

Mr. Stanford's Anthem, or, to call it by its proper title, Hymn, "Awake, my heart," is written to words cleverly translated from the German of Klopstock by Mr. H. F. Wilson. The opening words are set for full choir, the treble chorus leading off alone; this is soon joined by the other voices, when the first subject, a broad and flowing phrase, instinct with life and vigour, is assigned to the tenor part, the trebles combining with the other parts in free counterpoint. This movement soon gives place to a short baritone recitative to the words, "Yea, truly hast thou spoken, on me the day hath broken," leading into a movement in 6-8 time, Andante con moto, consisting of a choral to the old melody, "Wach' auf mein Herz und singe," sung by a small choir in three parts—two trebles and alto—while the baritone has a very beautiful solo written in free counterpoint, and interludes between the lines of the melody. The form of this movement is one which occurs frequently in the Church cantatas of Bach. A well-known and very beautiful example of it is also to be found in the bass solo with chorus near the end of the "Passion according to St. John," to the words, "Beloved Saviour, wilt Thou answer?" (p. 117 of Novello's edition). There are very few instances of the use of this form after Bach, and the present case is therefore the more interesting, especially as the method of treating it is not the least strained or antiquated in its effect. At the close of this section a short interlude on the organ leads to a choral movement, in which the subject of the first section appears again, transformed, however, into 6-8 time, which is retained from the second movement. A lead corresponding to that of the sopranos in the opening of the work is now given to the tenors, whose part is indeed prominent throughout the movement, while the subject is skilfully worked out in all four parts. This chorus culminates in an unison setting (Maestoso) of the choral introduced before, between the lines of which the organ plays interludes derived from the subject of the 6-8 part of the movement. A short coda after the close of the choral brings the work to an end. In this "hymn" a line has been struck out which is to all intents and purposes new in sacred music, as far as England is concerned at least; for though there exist innumerable cantatas by Bach in the same form, yet they now seldom or never come to a hearing; and, besides this, the style of writing in Mr. Stanford's work is essentially modern, although the form be old, and thus it is quite free from the charge of servile imitation or antiquated pedantry, nor indeed is any comparison suggested with the works of Bach. The solo was sung efficiently, but perhaps with a little too much striving for effect, by Mr. Kempton.

The Service, which comprised also a performance of "The heavens are telling," was conducted by Mr. J. R. Murray, and—with the exception of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, played by the composer himself—was accompanied throughout by Mr. H. R. Bird, Organist of St. Mary Abbots, Kensington, who also played Mendelssohn's First Organ Sonata, an Andante from a Sonata by Dr. Gladstone, an Andante by Henry Smart, an Allegretto by Guilmant, and the "St. Ann" Fugue, by Bach, in a manner deserving of much praise.

BRIGHTON AQUARIUM CONCERTS.

THESE high-class Concerts continue to attract fair but, we fear, scarcely adequate audiences. The third of the series took place on October 29, Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony being the principal feature. The performance was a finished and careful one; indeed, as a rule, works which depend most on the wind instruments are best done at these Concerts, the solo "wind" being exceptionally good, while the strings are weak and few. Raff's brilliant Tarantelle and the Wedding Music from "Lohengrin" were the remaining items for the orchestra; Mr. Kuhe playing the Gavotte and Musette from Raff's Suite, and Madame Sterling contributing ballads.—The Fourth Concert, on the 5th ult., was chiefly distinguished by Mr. Carodous's splendid performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto (first movement). He created quite a sensation in this, and also by his subsequent playing of Berthold Tours's Romance and Tarantelle. Miss Marian McKenzie sang, and the orchestral works were the Overture to "William Tell," Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, and Delibes' charming ballet, "Sylvia," which pleased exceedingly, the pretty "Pizzicati" having to be repeated.—The fifth Concert, on the 12th ult., having a popular programme, should have been the best, as regards performance, but somewhat disappointed expectation. The Overture to "Euryanthe" and the Entr'acte from Gounod's "Colombe" came first in order, and were rendered sufficiently well: Mr. Charles Hallé afterwards playing Weber's Concert-stuck in artistic style. The Scene for orchestra, "The Passing of Arthur"—Mr. Corder's arrangement of the finale of his own opera—was not nearly so well given as at its first performance last season, and consequently did not make the same impression. It is very elaborately scored, and demands a much larger and finer orchestra for the production of its full effect. Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, which ended the programme, was not by any means perfectly played. On one important point the Conductor adopted a reading—unusual in this country and certainly not authorised by the composer; that is to say he took the opening phrase of the first movement, wherever it occurred, Andante maestoso instead of Allegro. It is perhaps of little avail to protest against such unwarranted and unwarrantable liberties; but surely reasonable men must see that, even where a gain results, the precedent is one that puts great works at the mercy of every Conductor who thinks himself wiser than the composer.—As a contrast to that of the preceding Saturday, the sixth Concert, on the 12th ult., was in an executive sense the best of the series. Signor Papini played Bach's Violin Concerto admirably, and was accompanied with taste and judgment; and Miss Clara Samuell's charming voice pleased greatly. We can hardly praise the performance of the "Pastoral" Symphony too highly: the excellence of the wind instruments (clarinet and first horn especially) being most marked. Mendelssohn's Overture to "Ruy Blas" and the ballet music in Gounod's "Polyeucte," equally well played, completed a programme which should have attracted a far larger audience. But the numerous Ballad Concerts at the Dome, supported by a number of great singers, are a potent attraction and receive the preference of the public, for reasons needless to specify, and just now vain to regret.—The programme of the 26th ult. included Beethoven's Symphony in A, and Rubinstein's Pianoforte Concerto in G, played by Miss Zimmermann.

We understand that the Choral Symphony, which will constitute the leading feature of the ninth and last Concert has already been in rehearsal for several weeks. This is the way—the only way—to secure a creditable performance.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

A CLASSICAL Chamber Concert was given in the Albert Memorial Hall on October 26, Messrs. Risegari, Speelman, Bernhardt, and Vieuxtemps being the executants. The programme consisted of quartets by Gernsheim in C minor, Beethoven in E flat (Op. 127, No. 12), and Haydn in D (Op. 76, No. 5). The performance was good, though in some respects inferior to previous ones by the same artists.

—On the 23rd ult. the programme consisted of Mendelssohn's Andante in E and Scherzo in A minor, from an unfinished Quartet; Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, No. 15, Op. 132; and a Quartet by Mozart in D. The performance was admirable.

At the Gentlemen's Concert, on October 31, F. H. Cowen's Sinfonietta in A was given here for the first time. Like most of its composer's works, it has considerable melodic beauty and is cleverly scored, but despite its miniature proportions it is fragmentary. In the lento movement the bars are alternately in triple and common time, and the result is an irregular and uncomfortable rhythm. Berlioz had recourse to this device in "L'Enfance du Christ" to express a specific idea, but in the Sinfonietta we are somewhat at a loss for a raison d'être. The other instrumental numbers were Monsigny's "Chaconne and Rigaudon" from his now forgotten Opera, "Aline"; Flotow's Overture to "Stradella," the "Valse Lenti" and "Pizzicati" from Delibes' Suite "Sylvia," and Beethoven's "Gratulations" minuet. Miss Agnes Zimmermann gave an admirable reading of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, and played with equal success pieces by Jadassohn, Rubinstein, and Heller. Madame Schuch-Proska sang "Dir will ich treu sein," from Donizetti's "Don Pasquale," and two Lieder, with considerable effect, but in "Let the bright seraphim" evinced either an ignorance or a disregard of the traditional Handelian style.

The Athenæum Choral Society introduced A. J. Caldicott's Cantata "The Widow of Nain" with considerable success on October 31.

Mr. Hallé commenced his twenty-fourth series of Concerts here on October 27. The eighty-seven performers who form his orchestra are the same as those of last year, with a few exceptions, the chief of which are Mr. Thomas Batley, who returns to his post at the kettle-drums, and the substitution of M. C. Dubrucq, an oboist of excellent tone, for M. Lavigne. Mozart's Symphony, No. 1, in D; Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Brahms's brilliant, well-scored "Academical Festival" Overture; and Svendsen's clever Rapsodie Norvégienne, No. 3, were the chief instrumental numbers, and were all admirably rendered. Mr. Hallé played with all his usual accuracy, and more than his usual vigour, Beethoven's Concerto in C and four excerpts from Schumann's Phantasiesstücke. Madame Schuch-Proska was the vocalist.—On the 3rd ult. Cherubini's Mass, No. 4, in C, and Rossini's "Stabat Mater," were very finely rendered, the soloists being Mesdames Schuch-Proska and Patey and Messrs. Lloyd and Santley. Cherubini's Mass, given for the first time here, displays the great contrapuntist in his best light; the "Et incarnatus," "O salutaris," and "Dona nobis," are equally remarkable for the beauty and appropriateness of their settings; and two noble fugues on the word "Amen" conclude the "Gloria" and the "Credo." The choir, which consisted of upwards of 200 voices, reflected the greatest credit on Mr. Edward Hecht, the chorus-master, to whose indefatigable labours its excellence is chiefly due, the choruses being given with great precision and a most commendable observance of the nuances.—At the Concert on the 10th ult., the programme included Schubert's magnificent Symphony (No. 9) in C, Overtures to "Genoveva" and "The Flying Dutchman" by Schumann and Wagner respectively, Gounod's Pageant March from "La Reine de Saba," and for the first time a "Ballad" and "Air Slave" with variations, from Leo Délibes' ballet, "Coppelia." The "Ballad" is a quaint air for solo violin, played on this occasion by Herr Straus. In the "Air Slave" an interrupted rhythm redeems to a certain extent an otherwise commonplace subject; the earlier variations are ingeniously devised and happily scored, but the latter are not entirely devoid of a taint of vulgarity. Mr. Hallé gave a most graceful reading of Brahms's transcription of a Gavotte by Gluck, and also played Thalberg's Study in A minor, on reiterated notes. Mdlle. Louisa Pyk sang Beethoven's "Ah perfido," "D'amor sull' ali rosee" (from "Trovatore"), and some Swedish songs.—A very fine performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given on the 17th ult., with Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Signor Foli as principal singers.

At Mr. De Jong's Concert on the 5th ult., Miss Isabella Stone, who made her first appearance in England, displayed a good soprano voice and considerable powers of vocalisation; and Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Henry Guy, Mr. Harper Kearton, and Mr. Maybrick gave several songs with their usual success. M. Buziau played Wieniawski's fantasia on "Faust" for the violin, and Mr. De Jong on the flute gave Paggi's fantasia on Neapolitan airs admirably. The orchestral numbers included the Overture to "Mirella," by Gounod, and "The Last Day of Missolonghi," by Hérold; also a selection from "Fra Diavolo."—At the concert on the 10th ult., Mdlle. Valleria, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Maas, and Mr. Levetus were the singers. Mdlle. Valleria and Mr. Maas were highly successful in sundry operatic and national songs, and Miss McKenzie displayed a mezzo-soprano voice of excellent quality and remarkable evenness, and a very artistic method. The instrumental pieces were well given, especially the Overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," a selection from "Ernani," and a transcription of Rossini's "La Carità."

The Manchester Vocal Society gave a Concert on the 9th ult. The programme consisted entirely of glees, part-songs, &c., and songs given by members of the choir. Contrary to the custom of the Society, no work of magnitude was given.

MUSIC IN LEIPZIG.

Leipzig, November 21.

THE Euterpe Concerts began on October 25, and the three performances already given show that the present season will not be allowed to fall below the standard of previous ones. So much is admitted; for myself, I am inclined to go very far beyond this qualified judgment and to augur well for the future of the society. For its new Capellmeister, Dr. Paul Klengel, has resolutely stamped a classical character upon his programmes, and—to the distraction of the "advanced" Neue Zeitschrift für Musik—lays his foundations upon the Symphonies of masters like Beethoven and Schumann, which, says the intelligent critic, "we have heard quite too often, and certainly more than once before in the Euterpe itself." The Leipzig public is disappointed; but, to judge from the large attendance, appears to be well satisfied with a disappointment of this sort. The fact is that Dr. Klengel belongs to a family the traditions of which lie with Mendelssohn and his circle, and it would be impossible for such a man to abandon altogether the spirit in which he was brought up. A petulant correspondent of the Neue Zeitschrift talks of most Englishmen "beginning and ending with Mendelssohn." Any one who knows anything beyond the music of English country towns must be aware how false the description is. On first acquaintance it might seem much truer of Leipzig, where the bust of the great musician holds the place of honour in concert-room and conservatorium, and where his name glitters in letters of gold, between those of Bach and Schumann, over the orchestra of the Gewandhaus. But in truth Mendelssohn is not the idol of an exaggerated worship here. His compositions take the high rank which the most censorious criticism must allow them; but the master lives, above all, in the influence of lofty and earnest musical work, which he impressed upon the town and upon the conservatorium which he founded. In the family of his friend—the tutor of his children—it could not but be that this influence should remain especially strong; and Dr. Paul Klengel, who comes forward for the first time as a conductor, enters into his duties in a thoroughly musician-like spirit. He has already drilled his orchestra, which contains a considerable infusion from the splendid band of the Gewandhaus, into a cohesion which was deficient in the first concert; and he also, like Herr Reinecke, takes upon himself, and ably performs the duty of, accompanying songs on the piano.

His younger brother, Julius—he himself is under thirty—appeared on the 15th as solo violoncellist. As he is certain to become personally known to the English musical public before long, I may mention that he made his début at the Gewandhaus last year, when hardly out of his teens, and is now one of the two leading violoncellists in that orchestra. Already he is recognised as a performer and composer of signal promise. A new violoncello Concerto produced at the Euterpe contains in each movement a well-defined motive which is always artistically treated; in the Andante, particularly, the answering of the different sections of the orchestra, strings, wood, and brass, is extremely happy. The finale—allegro molto—has a scherzando motion, full of life, which is twice interrupted and relieved by a sort of Trio in broad, grave sentences. The whole work is conceived with verve; the interest, if it is never absorbing, never flags; but, what is noteworthy in the composition of a young executant, the opportunities for display on the part of the solo instrument, dexterously used as they are, are held in due proportion to the general structure of the work. Herr Klengel's performance of his work was excellent. He plays with a full tone, in excellent taste, and with a nearly perfect command of all the technical possibilities of his instrument. It was inevitable indeed that he should suffer, though in small degree, by comparison with the mature performance of the famous violoncellist, Ferdinand Popper, who visited the Gewandhaus on the 10th. He also brought with him a new Concerto—a "suite" he calls it—"Im Walde," and magnificently he performed his part. The suite is essentially one for display, and it has some very clever situations, as where, at the end of the fourth movement, the violoncello plays the melody lightly at the highest ranges, while the violins and the rest of the orchestra have a different and very harmonious subject far below. But Herr Popper has not added appreciably to the mass of "programme-music" which Germany is continually sending forth. Another "novelty" which was also given in the Gewandhaus concert already spoken of deserves particular reference. This is a set of variations for orchestra by Richard Heuberger on one of the most exquisite of Schubert's melodies; but it is not only the charm of the thema but the resource and delicacy with which it is developed which strike one immediately. I am glad to say that the composition is printed, and hope that English conductors will look favourably upon it as a singularly attractive though unpretentious accession to their stores.

On the 28th of October the Gewandhaus management surprised most people by commemorating the seventieth birthday of Liszt, together with that of Hiller—they were born on the 22nd and 24th of October, 1811—by a performance of the "symphonic poem," "Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo," by the former, and the overture to "Demetrius" by the latter. Hiller's work, however, was unsatisfactorily performed, and Liszt's made a very faint impression upon an audience which always accepts his music with reserve on the rare occasions when it is produced. An excellent pianoforte Concerto, the composition of Julius Röntgen, the son of the first violinist of the Gewandhaus, and a justly appreciated pianist at Amsterdam, was most effectively rendered by the composer, who also showed to remarkable advantage in a fine performance of Bach's F major Toccata.

The second Euterpe concert on the 1st ult. was, in its way, a festival for Miss Marie Krebs, who is too well known in London to need any praise beyond that implied in her name. It was eighteen years since her début here, and she adopted the happy idea of performing the same works she selected on that occasion—a Concerto by Ferdinand Ries, and solo pieces by Bach, Weber, and Schumann. Her graceful and finished performance met with a very cordial welcome.

I am afraid there is not much to be said of the various lady singers who have visited Leipzig during the past month. In fact, the tendency of German singing is to devote all pains to what passes as "expression"—Innigkeit is the favourite virtue—to the exclusion of accuracy of intonation or purity of the organ itself. That "Wagner has spoiled the voices" has become almost a proverb, and, however much exaggerated, there is this truth in it—that the declamatory style, noisy without being musically sonorous, is encroaching upon the whole domain of singing; and so demoralised have the public become in this respect that they applaud a showy vibrato as though it were a test of pure art. Certain it is that the effect of some recent great performances here has been seriously marred by the vicious taste of the soloists—I refer to the two concerts given by the celebrated choir of the Riedel'sche Verein, which produced Liszt's "Christus" on the 30th of October and Bach's Mass in B minor on the 18th ult. Nor can it be said that the choir was satisfactory. The balance of the voices was unequal, the second sopranos, altos, and basses being notably weak. We may be proud to know that at least one choir in London can master the "Hohe Messe" with infinitely greater success than when it is performed in the church which holds a direct tradition from the composer himself; and one could not but wish for Mr. Otto Goldschmidt to take the bâton from a conductor who transformed the "Dona nobis pacem," which with its long-drawn chords fitly closes the work, into a mechanical chorus, taken at a comparatively fast pace whereby the voices became confused.

A word, in conclusion, may be given to the recent production of an opera, "Harald der Wiking," by a new composer, a Norwegian, Andreas Hallén, which has attained a certain popular success. Criticism, however, decides that what virtues it has of its own do not go beyond mediocrity; the qualities which pleased the populace were mere imitations—clever imitations certainly—of Wagner, whose model was followed even in the elaborate alliteration of the libretto. Herr Hallén has undoubted ability to do better things; he has an intelligent mastery of orchestral combinations; and it would be unjust to apply too severe a standard to a first work.

FRIEDRICH KIEL'S NEW REQUIEM.

By W. LANGHANS.

MODERN strivings in the domain of Church music may be divided into two main factions: one, at whose head is Franz Liszt, takes its departure from the very ancient traditions of the Gregorian chant, the musical significance of which it is sought to raise on a level with the religious aspirations of our days by the aid of the vastly developed resources of modern musical composition; the other proceeds from the two masters Bach and Handel, whose venerable personality, gaining fresh youth as it were through Mendelssohn, has ever inspired their disciples to do battle with the conflicting tendencies of the day. It is a curious fact that the principal representatives of the latter party, whose offspring also the above new work must be considered, are to be found in a town which, owing to the half-critical, half-sceptical disposition of its inhabitants, seems least qualified to serve as a fostering asylum of a species of art appealing above all to our emotions and not our understanding. It was at Berlin where some twelve months ago the hitherto absolutely unknown composer Albert Becker ventured to introduce to public notice his

Mass in B flat minor, which speedily made his name known throughout Germany; and it is Berlin also which has nursed the development and originated the fame of that master who now for several decades has stood at the head of the Protestant Church music of our fatherland, Friedrich Kiel.

There is a special reason why I should associate the name of Albert Becker with that of Kiel in the present instance, and that is the fact of the great similarity which the outward circumstances of the lives of the two composers present. It is well known how the former, after many years of unregarded toil, not unfrequently embittered still more by material want, has at last, when considerably advanced in his manhood, found the brilliant reward for his labour in the publication of the one highly important work. But Kiel has had to contend with similar obstacles in his artistic career; and if we look back over the last twenty years of his fame we then find him in the precarious situation of an unimportant pianoforte teacher, endeavouring repeatedly but unsuccessfully to attract the attention of both public and critics by the performance of his compositions. And in this position Kiel remained until in the year 1862 the Stern'sche Gesang-Verein produced his Requiem, the unanimously enthusiastic reception of which richly compensated the composer, now forty-one years old, for his previous disappointments. The success of this Requiem was so unmistakable that the work was at once acquired under most favourable conditions by the publishing firm of Peters, in Leipzig, while choral societies all over Germany desired to perform the composition with the least delay possible, thereby giving universal confirmation to the artistic verdict pronounced by Berlin. There could be no doubt, indeed, that Kiel had here produced a work of lasting worth sufficiently important to secure its author a place in the world of composers, even if he had laid the pen aside afterwards to rest on his laurels. Such, however, was by no means his intention. His artistic activity, on the contrary, began now to assume unusual dimensions. In the first place he completed the composition of a number of chamber works of solid workmanship, among which his pianoforte quartet (Op. 43) has especially attracted the attention of musicians far and wide. Then followed his "Missa Solemnis" to which a similar attention was accorded as to his Requiem, if it did not gain the same enthusiastic reception. The sympathies of all music-loving circles were again turned towards Kiel upon the appearance of his oratorio "Christus" (1874), and in this work he attained a position of superiority second to none of the contemporary composers of sacred music. In order to complete the picture of this remarkable artist, it must be added that, besides the restless activity he has exhibited in the creation of new works, he has been equally active in conveying instruction to others—first at the Stern'sche Conservatorium, then at the newly founded Berlin Hochschule; he having been previously elected as a member only, and a few years later as a senatorial member, of the Royal Academy of Arts of Berlin.

From the foregoing remarks, and from the close connection of this artist with the musical life of Berlin, it may be gathered that the appearance of his latest great work would be looked forward to with anxious interest and sympathy. Nor has the hope of his admirers, that they might recognise in the new Requiem a masterpiece worthy of its predecessor, been in the least disappointed. The two works have in common the great earnestness, the noblesse, which characterise Kiel's manner in general, and his Church music in particular; both also reveal the absolute mastery of the contrapuntist who solves the most difficult problems of musical science, as it were, with playful ease, without, however, forgetting for a moment that counterpoint should not be employed for its own sake, but as serving to illustrate or develop an idea. On the other hand, the two works are essentially dissimilar as regards the general spirit pervading them. While in the older Requiem an austere, almost a sombre, character predominates, the author has in the present instance shown a more gentle and conciliatory disposition, which sheds an idealised light over the whole. And although, in its proper place, full expression is given to the tragical element in nerve-stirring dissonant chords, as, for instance, in the introductory bars to the Dies iræ—or in the Kyrie where the passionately plaintive cry of the chorus, with its accompanying sigh-like figure in the string instruments, seizes upon the imagination of the hearer to an almost agonising degree. Still, the moments of classical repose and solemn religious feeling preponderate throughout, as instanced in the richly melodious strain which flows on in the Recordare, in the tearfully smiling Lacrymosa, in the Benedictus, with its soprano solo breathing as it were a blessing over the voices of the chorus, and in many others of the thirteen numbers constituting the work. Another point of deviation from the older Requiem is the contrapuntal treatment, which, though no less masterly and fascinating in the new work, appears, in accordance with the general character of the composition, rather to aid and mediate the effect than to call forth the admiration of the listener by daring combinations. That nevertheless the composer has sustained to its fullest extent his old reputation as a master of fugal writing is abundantly proved by the great choral fugues, "Quam olim Abrahamæ promissisti," "Osanna," and more especially the final fugue, "Dona eis requiem," with its wondrous combination of the soprano theme and of the same theme enlarged in the bass:—

The interpretation which this grand work received on the part of the Singakademie was, on the whole, worthy of the reputation of this our most important choral society, and bore witness to the zeal and technical ability of its director, Martin Blummer. Unstinted praise should be accorded to the choir, which, with real love—nay, enthusiasm—for the work, successfully surmounted even the most difficult portions of its task; all the more confidently, it is true, since the composer has not—like Beethoven in some of his choral works, and Bach, too, here and there—demanding the impossible of the singers, but has throughout treated the human voice with a just appreciation of its capabilities and prescribed limits. The orchestra (the Berlin Symphonie-Capelle), the performances of which at our great choral representations are generally far below those of the singers in artistic excellence, was on this occasion remarkably good, a result in which again the composer may claim a large share for himself, as he is no less an expert in instrumentation than in vocal scoring. He not only knows how to use every single instrument according to its individuality, but has also the gift of imparting unusual fulness and beauty of sound to the compact orchestral body, both separate from and in combination with the chorus. The interpreters of the solo parts left most to be desired. Mesdames Ruediger and Müller, and Herren Hauptstein and Stange, although acquitting themselves of their task with musical precision and artistic intelligence, appeared scarcely to have attained—with the exception perhaps of the first-named lady—that degree of artistic vocalisation which is indispensable for the full appreciation of the beauties of the work. The total impression, however, created by the performance was a powerful one, and fully justified the generally expressed desire for a speedy repetition. Should it, in that event, be possible to combine with the new work the performance likewise of the old Requiem, I am of opinion that the artistic enjoyment would thereby be vastly increased. Friedrich Kiel may undoubtedly be ranked with those composers to whose productions we willingly lend our ear for an entire evening, and his two Requiems, especially, offer so many inner contrasts that their co-appearance in the same Concert would certainly enhance their interest. Particularly at a time like the present, when we have become heartily tired of motley Concert programmes, far greater satisfaction would be felt in listening to the works of one composer only than we can possibly obtain from the superficial tasting of a dozen masters, even though they should be all of them of the first order.

MR. FRANZ RUMMEL, who has often been spoken of as an American pianist, but erroneously so, seeing that he was born of German parents in London, has, since his marriage with a daughter of the late Professor Morse, taken up his abode in Berlin. During the latter half of October last he made known his arrival there by giving three orchestral Concerts, at each of which he was heard in two concertos and other important works. At the first he came forward with Beethoven's Concerto in E flat and that by Grieg in A minor, besides playing Chopin's Nocturne in D flat and Polonaise in A flat, &c. His second Concert, given in honour of Liszt's seventieth birthday, was devoted to works by that master, including the Concerto in E flat, the Hungarian Fantasia, the arrangement for pianoforte and orchestra of Schubert's Fantasia in C, originally written for pianoforte alone, and some minor items. Tschaiakowsky's Concerto in B flat minor, and that by Saint-Saëns in G minor, together with Bach's Fantasia Chromatica and Transcriptions from Wagner's "Die Walküre," by L. Brassin, under whom he formerly studied, formed the staple of the third Concert. By the Berlin critics he has been warmly welcomed as an extraordinary phenomenon, his style of playing and technical proficiency reminding them, it is said, more of Carl Tausig than of any other pianist who has visited the city since Tausig's death. Besides having performed at Halle and other places in Germany, Mr. Rummel is engaged to play at one of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig on the 8th inst.

THE recent musical doings at Boston, U.S., have been of the highest order. The programmes of the Philharmonic Society and the Symphony Concerts have included the Overtures to "Don Giovanni," "Flying Dutchman," and "Camacho's Wedding," Schubert's Ent'acte "Rosamunde," the Introduction to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (Wagner), a Symphony of Haydn, the G minor of Mozart, and the C major of Beethoven, it being the intention of Mr. Henschel to play all the Beethoven symphonies in order. There are to be twenty Concerts in all, the Conductors being Dr. Louis Maas and Mr. Henschel. The Harvard Symphony Concerts (seventeenth season) will be five in number, beginning on the 8th inst. There are to be four String Quartet Concerts by the Euterpe Society. The first performance of the "Akademisches Fest Ouverture" of Brahms was under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas, and the "Tragic Overture" under that of Mr. Henschel. The first performance of Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" was given under the direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas.

The members of the St. Mark's Choral Society gave their first Concert on Monday evening, the 7th ult., in the St. Mark's Schoolrooms, Grove Road. There was a good programme of vocal and instrumental music, including selections from Haydn's "Creation," Mr. Oswald G. Young giving an excellent rendering of the tenor part. Mr. T. M. Cammack, R.A.M., who throughout the evening accompanied on the pianoforte, played Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique," and the first part of the programme was brought to a conclusion by Mendelssohn's "Forty-second Psalm," the recitatives being well sung by Miss H. Oliver. Miss E. Cox and Mr. Edward Hall were very successful in their songs, and Mr. M. Osmaston contributed violoncello solos, which were highly appreciated. A couple of part-songs, entitled "Summer and Winter" and "Silent Night," the latter bringing the Concert to a close, were also included in the programme. The choir numbered over thirty performers, and evinced very careful training. Mr. C. D. Lampen conducted.

DR. BRIDGE'S Cantata "Boadicea" was performed in the Town Hall, Birmingham, by the Amateur Harmonic Association, under the direction of Mr. Stockley, on Thursday, the 17th ult. The Birmingham Daily Post thus speaks of the performance:—

Dr. Bridge's Cantata "Boadicea, Queen of the Iceni," was composed for the Highbury Philharmonic Society, London, and produced May 31, 1880. It has had several hearings since, and its merits are more apparent with each succeeding rendition. Soloists, chorus, and band did their best, and the applause was most enthusiastic, but all encores were declined. Mr. Stockley conducted throughout with spirit and judgment. The composer was present, and at the close was called forward to the platform, when he received an ovation from the audience and performers. The work is a valuable addition to our stores of choral music, being well written for the voices, and admirably scored for the orchestra.

The Cantata is to be given at Rochester on the 5th inst., under the composer's direction, with Miss Annie Marriott, Messrs. Maas and King as soloists; and at Gloucester on the 16th inst., Mr. C. Harford Lloyd conducting.

At a complimentary dinner to Mr. W. M. Wait (the late Organist of St. Margaret Pattens, Rood Lane, City) recently given at the "Bell Tavern," Gracechurch Street, a presentation took place, in recognition of the talented services rendered by this gentleman during the last two and a half years at the above church. The testimonial consisted of a very handsome timepiece, the gift of the united choirs of St. Margaret Pattens and St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street, and some members of the congregation of the former church, together with an illuminated address. In proposing the health of Mr. Wait, the chairman alluded in flattering terms to the manner in which he had carried out his duties; and in responding to the toast, Mr. Wait expressed his deep regret at leaving the City. In the evening there was some excellent music, under the direction of Mr. C. E. Tutill, the rendering of the glees by the choir of St. Edmund the King being much admired.

THE prospectus of the Rochester, Strood, and Chatham Choral Society for the coming season announces three Concerts, with three Rehearsals at popular prices of admission. At the first Concert, on the 5th inst., Dr. Bridge's Cantata "Boadicea" (conducted by the composer) will be given, followed by a miscellaneous selection. On February 20, 1882, an Orchestral and Ballad Concert will be given; and on April 24 Mozart's "Requiem" and selections from Handel's "Samson" will be performed. The vocalists engaged are Misses Mary Davies, Marian Fenna, Eleanor Farnol, Annie Marriott, Grace Damian, and Madame Patey; Messrs. W. Shakespeare, Piercy, Joseph Maas, Gawthrop, Blower, R. Hilton, Albert M'Guckin, and Frederick King; solo violinist, Mr. Rosenthal. The orchestra will be complete in every department, under the leadership of Mr. Rosenthal: Conductor, the Rev. W. H. Nutter.

THE success of last season seems to have inspired the committee of the Gloucester Choral Society with a laudable desire to maintain and, if possible, increase the credit of the Association. The first concert for this season is fixed for the 16th inst., and the programme will embrace the first part of Haydn's Seasons ("Spring") and Dr. Bridge's Cantata, "Boadicea," the accompaniments to the latter work to be played by the composer. For the solos the following vocalists have been engaged: Miss Annie Marriott, Miss Tunnicliff, Mr. E. Dalzell, and Mr. T. Brandon. Mr. C. Harford Lloyd will conduct, as usual. It is also intimated that J. F. Barnett's work, "The Building of the Ship," and Mendelssohn's "Elijah" are in contemplation for succeeding concerts, and it is hoped that liberal support will be accorded to the Society to enable the committee successfully to carry out their designs.

THE prospectus of the Aberdeen Choral Union promises two performances of Oratorio—the first (Handel's "Samson") announced for the 24th ult.—and one miscellaneous concert. The second Oratorio performance (Handel's "Messiah") will be given on January 4, 1882, and the miscellaneous concert on February 17. The principal vocalists engaged are Misses Anna Williams, Annie Marriott, Clara Samuelli; Madame Trebelli, Miss Hope Glenn and Miss Bessie Palmer; Mr. Joseph Maas, Mr. Barton M'Guckin, Signor Vizzani, Signor Foli, Mr. J. H. Burgon, Signor Ghiberti, and Mr. J. Addison Kidd: Solo violin, M. Musin; solo piano and accompanist, Signor Bisaccia; organist, Mr. W. Morrison; leader of the band, Mr. A. F. Rae; chorus, the Aberdeen Choral Union; and Conductor, Mr. John Kirby.

MISS MARIE NEWSON gave her first Concert on the 2nd ult., at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, when she was assisted by Mr. Lazarus (clarinet), Mrs. Bucknall-Eyre (pianoforte), Miss Clara West, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and other distinguished artists. A feature in the programme was the performance by Mr. Lazarus of a Scena and Aria from the opera "Louise de Montfort," and of an "Air Varié" by Mohn. The beneficiaire sang Mozart's Aria "Non più di fiori" (with clarinet obbligato), and was greatly applauded. Mrs. Bucknall-Eyre gave Chopin's Valse in A flat for the pianoforte with much effect. The programme also included Beethoven's Romance in F (violin). Mr. F. H. Cozens conducted with his customary ability.

THE practice meetings of the Leeds Orchestral Society have now commenced. The Symphonies of Beethoven, Haydn's "Military," and Mozart's "Jupiter" are down for rehearsal, with a view to the public performance of some of these works. For the Society's Concerts, which take place in December, February, and April, the band will be considerably augmented, and arrangements are pending with several celebrated concert-parties to assist the Society upon these occasions. Mr. J. Sydney Jones is the Conductor, and Mr. E. Watson the Hon. Secretary. The place of practice meetings is the Yorkshire Training College of Music, Victoria Square.

THE report of the Worthing Sacred Harmonic Society refers with pride to the two-days' Festival given last season, and noticed in these columns. In entering upon its tenth season, an appeal is made to all interested in the progress of music in Worthing and its neighbourhood to support the committee in making the future of the Society as musically successful as it has been in the past. That good music well performed will meet with due encouragement has been fully proved; and we sincerely hope that the small deficit which appears on the balance-sheet of the Society will next year be replaced by the welcome announcement of a large surplus.

THE winter concerts at the Great Eastern Railway Mechanics' Institute, Stratford New Town, were resumed on Tuesday evening, the 1st ult., with a miscellaneous concert, given by the Institution Singing Classes. The performances provided by the Entertainment Committee are certainly worthy of a greater share of patronage than they have received of late. In the one under notice there was some capital glee-singing by a choir of 40 voices, and the solos were performed in a highly creditable manner.

METZLER AND CO.,

35, 36, 37, AND 38, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET, LONDON, W.

HOFMANN'S dramatic Cantata "The Legend of the Fair Melusina" was given by the Grosvenor Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. G. R. Egerton, at the Grosvenor Hall, on the 18th ult. The soloists were Miss H. Greiffenhagen, Miss Lizzie Turner, Messrs. Thurley Beale, A. Baxter, and A. Roach; and the accompanists, Miss Florence Hartley (pianoforte) and Mr. D. Woodhouse (harmonium). The beauties of the work received ample justice at the hands of both the soloists and chorus. In the second part Mr. Thurley Beale sang "The Pirate," a new song by Duvivier, which, together with "Una voce" ("Il Barbiere"), by Miss Greiffenhagen, was encored. Miss Annie Daymond, R.A.M., gave a pianoforte solo by Walter Macfarren.

A GRAND Evening Concert was given at Woolwich in the Royal Artillery Recreation Rooms, on Tuesday, the 15th ult., by kind permission and under the patronage of the General commanding. The proceeds were given to the Parochial Funds of St. Michael's Church. The artists were Miss Catherine Penna, Miss Damian, Mr. Kenningham, and Mr. Thurley Beale; solo violin, Miss Lucy Riley, all of whom were warmly applauded. The Royal Artillery band performed three selections with their wonted precision and ability. The concert was under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, assisted by Mr. C. Warwick Jordan.

A HIGHLY successful performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was given by the Advanced Choir of the South London Choral Association on Tuesday evening, the 22nd ult., at the Surrey Masonic Hall, Camberwell, under the conductorship of Mr. Leonard C. Venables. The soloists were Madame Worrell (whose delivery of the air "From mighty kings" merits especial mention), Miss Marian Burton, Miss Rose Moss, Mr. Dudley Thomas, and Mr. Alfred Moore. The accompaniments were fairly played by the recently organised orchestral band of the Institute, under the leadership of Mr. T. E. Gatehouse. The audience was very numerous.

THE Annual Harvest Thanksgiving Festival was celebrated in Christ Church, Woburn Square, at evensong, on Thursday, October 27, when the ordinary choir was augmented by the members of St. George's, Bloomsbury. The service was fully choral, and comprised Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F—composed specially for the occasion by the organist, Mr. W. G. Wood—and Barnby's anthem "I will give thanks." Before the benediction, Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus was sung. Mr. E. H. Turpin ably conducted and Mr. W. G. Wood presided at the organ.

At the Brixton Choral Society's Concert on the 21st ult., Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" were performed to a crowded audience. The solos received efficient rendering from Madame Worrell, Miss Marian Burton, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. J. T. Hutchinson. The accompaniments were played by Mr. John Harrison (pianoforte) and, in the first work, also by Mr. Charles Wilkes (organ), and the concert was conducted by Mr. W. Lemare with his accustomed care. Cowen's Cantata "The Corsair" and Macfarren's Cantata "Christmas" are announced for the next concert on the 19th inst.

At the annual meeting of the Metropolitan Liedertafel, at Melbourne, held on the 26th September last, the managing committee congratulated the members upon the continued prosperity and increasing popularity of the Society. It appears that during the past year the subscription list reached the maximum number allowed (777), and that the applicants for membership are now unprecedentedly large, the names of no less than 170 candidates for admission being registered. The number of performing members has also considerably increased, so that the permanent success of the Association seems now perfectly assured.

ON the occasion of his benefit at the Gaiety Theatre, Herr Meyer Lutz was presented with a valuable gold mounted ivory bâton, subscribed for by the members of the company and friends as a token of their esteem and appreciation of the musical talent of the Conductor. The bâton was manufactured by Messrs. Köhler and Son, of Victoria Street, Westminster.

A CONCERT in aid of the Organ Fund of St. John's Church, Great Marlborough Street, was given in Neumeyer Hall on Thursday, the 17th ult. The solo pianist was Madame D. Annetta, who gave an effective rendering of Chopin's "Valse Brillante" and the Fantasia "Old English Air" (Tito Mattei). Signor Meo played with great brilliancy and power the violin solo, "Scène de Ballet" (De Beriot), and an excerpt from "Faust" (Gounod). Songs were also given by a number of amateurs, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. G. F. Bruce.

A VERY good Concert was given on the 21st ult. by the choir and friends of Christ Church, Bermondsey, in the adjoining Schoolroom. Mr. Stretton Swann presided at the piano, and played two solos with his usual ability. Several songs were given during the evening, the vocalists being Miss Thompson, who gave a good rendering of "The angel at the window" (Tours), and Mr. Whitaker, whose singing of "Big Ben" and "The chief mate's story" (Pontet) was much admired. The room was filled by a thoroughly appreciative audience.

A CONCERT was given at the Lecture Hall, Salisbury Street, Rotherhithe, on the 8th ult., by the members of the Rotherhithe Sacred Harmonic Society. The first part consisted of Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum." The choruses were sung by the choir, and the solo parts were ably sustained by Miss Sugden and Messrs. Olney, Holman, and Trotman, Mr. Blyth conducting in a very efficient manner. The second part was miscellaneous, including several vocal solos, admirably rendered. The Concert was most successful.

MISS FLORENCE WYDFORD gave her Annual Concert to a crowded audience at "The Horns," Kennington Park, on Thursday evening, October 27. The bénéficiaire, who sang "Some day" (Milton Wellings) and "Life's uphill" (Scott Gatty), was assisted by Miss Agnes Larkcom, Miss Jessie Royd, Miss Josephine Pulham, and Miss Bessie Waugh (pianoforte)—the last of whom was rapturously encored—Messrs. Percy Blandford, Henry Suter, Henry Behling, and Thurley Beale; Messrs. Geo. F. Smith and Alfred J. Eyre (Conductors).

A CHORAL Festival was held at St. Mary's, Brookfield, Dartmouth Park, N., on Thursday evening, the 24th ult. The choir, augmented for the occasion to sixty voices, sang as the anthem a selection of eight numbers from "St. Paul," and at the conclusion of the service Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus, the canticles being sung to Tours in F. The accompaniments were played by a string band, led by Mr. E. Halfpenny, and the organ, which was most ably played by Mr. A. Wilkinson Jones, F.C.O. Mr. Henry J. B. Dart, Choirmaster, conducted.

MR. SYDNEY H. BECKLEY at his first Concert, on the 24th ult., at the Athenæum, Shepherd's Bush, introduced an excellent programme, which was much appreciated by a large audience. Miss C. Penna, Mdle. Hélène Arnim, Madame Mudie-Bolingbroke, and the concert-giver supplied the vocal portion, and, together with Miss E. Lawrence and Miss Mabel Bourne (pianoforte), Mr. C. Fletcher (violin), and Mr. J. Adolphe Brouil (violoncello), won much applause for their efforts. Mr. Albert Lowe and Mr. F. Penna officiated as Conductors.

MR. WALTER WESCHÉ gave a very successful Organ Recital at the Angell Town Institution, Brixton, on the 5th ult. The programme included an Overture by Himmel, the D major Fugue of Bach, and a new Fantasia for Organ and small Orchestra by Mr. Wesché, the accompaniments being played on the pianoforte. Mr. Wesché was recalled at the end of his Fantasia. Miss Newson and Mr. D. Trevor-Roper were the vocalists, and Mr. W. Lemare presided at the pianoforte.

ON All Saints' Day a Festal Evensong was celebrated in the church of All Saints, Blackheath, when the choir was assisted by some of the members of the choir of St. Paul's Cathedral. Mr. C. E. Tinney's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were well sung, and the Anthems were "The Wilderness," by Sir J. Goss, and the "Hallelujah" Chorus. Unfortunately the final chorus in "The Wilderness" was taken much too quickly, and this rather spoiled what would otherwise have been a successful rendering.

THE Choir of St. Alban's, Holborn, gave a selection of sacred music on Monday evening, the 21st ult., St. Cecilia's Eve. Mr. Farquharson Walenn, Organist, presided at the organ and there was in addition a small orchestra. The selection consisted of well-known anthems, solos, and organ pieces, the solos being efficiently rendered by Messrs. Alfred Moore, Knott, and Powell. A Grand Solemn March, composed specially by the Organist for the occasion, was performed during the collection.

We understand that Mr. Harry Wall has recently again demanded the penalty for the singing at a concert without permission the popular ballad, "She wore a wreath of roses." This song was included in a list of works under Mr. Wall's control which we gave in our June number, but we take this opportunity of again cautioning promoters of concerts against including it in their programmes without first obtaining permission.

THE usual monthly Concert of the St. George's Glee Union was given at the Pimlico Rooms on the 4th ult., the programme consisting of a miscellaneous selection. The vocal soloists were Miss Forester, Miss Alice Roselli, Mr. C. W. Small, Mr. R. F. Roberts, and Mr. Chaplin Henry; and Miss Edith Mahon and Miss Luenda Smeaton contributed pianoforte selections. Mr. Joseph Monday conducted, and Mr. F. R. Kinke accompanied.

THE Ayr Choral Union announces two Concerts during the coming season, at the first of which, on the 15th inst., Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be given; and at the second, on January 27, 1882, Gade's Cantata, "The Erl-King's Daughter." The vocalists are Miss Anna Williams, Herr Ludwig, and Mr. Frederick King—the London Orchestra, engaged for the season's concerts in Glasgow and Edinburgh, performing at both Concerts.

AN Organ Recital was given on the 8th ult., in St. Saviour's Church, Northumberland Street, Poplar, after shortened evensong, by Mr. Humphrey J. Stark, Mus. Bac., Oxon., F.C.O. The programme was selected from the works of Mendelssohn, Smart, Salomé, Bach, and Liszt; and also included a melody composed by Mr. Stark. The Recital was attended by a very appreciative congregation.

THE third series of Saturday Popular Entertainments in connection with the Emanuel Church, Northwick Terrace, Maida Vale, commenced on the 5th ult., at the Infants' Schoolroom, Richmond Street. Under the direction of Mr. W. C. Waller Goodworth, a selection of part-songs, operatic choruses, &c., will be given by the recently formed Maida Hill Choral Association during the present season.

AN Organ Recital was given on Saturday, the 19th ult., at the Angell Town Institution, Brixton, by Mr. C. J. Frost, Mus. Bac. The programme was well selected, and the excellent performance of Mr. Frost was thoroughly appreciated by the large audience. The vocal illustrations were rendered with much effect by Miss Alice Sprague and Mr. A. Greenwood. Mr. Lemare accompanied.

MENDELSSOHN'S music to "Œdipus at Colonus" was performed on the 8th ult. at the Walworth Literary and Scientific Institution, under the direction of Mr. Gadsby. The music was excellently given, and the characters in the drama were most effectively sustained. The accompaniments were well played by Mr. W. R. Kirby (pianoforte) and Mr. G. J. Smith (harmonium).

MESSRS. GILBERT AND CLAY'S operetta "Ages Ago" was revived with much success on the 21st ult., at St. George's Hall, the characters being sustained by Misses Edith Brandon and Fanny Holland, and Messrs. North Home, Alfred Reed, and Corney Grain. Mr. Clay has rewritten portions of the music, and added a new duet for soprano and tenor.

HERREN LAISTNER, MAHR, AND LEU announce the second series of their Trio Concerts, the first of which will take place on the 8th inst. at the Marlborough Rooms. The programme will include Trio by Saint-Saëns and Trio, in D minor, by Schumann.

THE Erith Choral Society, which has commenced its ninth season, will give a performance of "Elijah" at Christmas under the direction of Mr. Richard Lemaire, its Conductor, with orchestral accompaniment.

MENDELSSOHN'S "Elijah" will be performed at Tenby, South Wales, on the 2nd inst., the principal vocalists being Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, Madame Enriquez, Mr. Hollins, and Mr. Bridson. The chorus will consist of 100 voices. Conductor, Mr. W. Terence Jenkins, Organist of the Parish Church.

THE fourth annual Advent performance of Handel's "Messiah," at St. John's Church, Ealing, will take place on Wednesday the 21st inst. The soloists will be Mrs. Fawcett, Madame Marie Belval, Mr. Arthur J. Thompson and Mr. H. Scott. Mr. E. H. Turpin will, as usual, be the Organist.

THE season of Italian Opera at the Lyceum Theatre, under the direction of Mr. Samuel Hayes, was brought to a sudden termination on Monday evening, the 14th ult., the Director announcing, by advertisement the next morning, that the money would be refunded at the box-office to all persons who had taken seats in advance.

THE new organ, built by Hunter and Co. for St. James's, Stepney, was opened on Sunday, the 20th ult., by Dr. Sloman. Short recitals were given after the morning and evening services to large congregations. Amongst the pieces played were a Concerto in B flat (Handel) and St. Ann's Fugue (Bach).

IN consequence of the Christmas holidays it will be necessary for us to print the January number some days earlier than usual. All matter and advertisements intended for insertion in this number should, therefore, reach the office on or before the 20th inst.

MR. GEORGE ROBERTSON SINCLAIR has been appointed by the Chapter, Organist to Truro Cathedral. Mr. Sinclair has been for nearly three years past Deputy-Organist at Gloucester Cathedral.

SPECIAL Services will be held at St. Mark's, Camberwell (Coburg Road, Old Kent Road), every Friday evening during Advent, commencing at 8 o'clock, at which Organ Recitals will be given by Mr. Alfred Physick, the Organist.

REVIEWS.

Geschichte der Musik. Von August Wilhelm Ambros. Second Edition. 4 Vols. [Leipzig: F. E. C. Leuckart (Constantin Sander), 1879-81].

NO better proof of the standard worth of the above History of Music could be cited than the fact that after the lapse of but a few years the issue of a second edition of so elaborate a work should have become necessary. Ever since the first appearance, however, of these volumes, during a period extending over sixteen years—the final volume having been published in 1878—their importance has been practically acknowledged by copious extracts from and frequent references to them which have appeared in the more recent publications on the same subject both in Germany and elsewhere. Ambros' work is, in fact, unique as far as its general artistic aims are concerned, and especially in reference to the historical ground covered by it. Regarding the former, the author has himself explained his standpoint in these words (we are quoting from his "Sketches and Studies for Friends of Music"): "It will not have escaped the reader of my History of Music that I could form a clear conception of the artistic spirit of this or that period only by viewing it in its totality; that to my mind music, painting, sculpture, and architecture appeared to be the manifestations of one and the same intellectual movement of a particular epoch." Such broad views as here expressed—views akin, in fact, to those entertained in another sphere of modern artistic strivings, by the believers in the so-called "Art-work of the Future"—if applied to the study of the artistic life of a more or less remote Past, could not fail, at any rate, to open some fresh and novel aspects upon the history of a subject where so much remains as yet to be cleared up. But the author's artistic convictions are evidently the result of an exceptional general culture, to which have been added an elasticity of mind and a capacity for minute historical research which are truly surprising. Furnished with such rare qualifications for the performance of his task, the author has been enabled to produce a series of sympathetic and comprehensive pictures of the position occupied by the art of music at different periods, and he has endeavoured to show how far this art has penetrated the national and social life of the people with whom he was dealing. His is not, indeed, a history of an isolated art; it is an analysis of the origin and growth of music in its intimate relationship to the general progress of culture and the development of the sister arts. It must remain a matter of great regret, therefore, to the student of art-history that a longer span of life was not allotted to so able an exponent of the subject as to have enabled him to carry on his work to a more recent epoch of musical development. The fourth volume, in itself but a fragment, was published after the death of its author, which occurred in the year 1876, and thus the historical exposition concludes somewhat abruptly with the termination of the Middle Ages.

Ambros divides the first volume of his history into three parts. In the opening part the conjectural origin of musical art is ingeniously dealt with, and is followed by a description of the practice of music among earlier civilised nations, viz., Chinese, Hindoos and Arabs. The second part introduces the reader to the state of musical cultivation among the Egyptians and the Semitic races, separate chapters being devoted to the musical instruments used by them. The music of ancient Greece, with its elaborate tonal systems, occupies the greater portion of the third part, which concludes with the decay of the antique music at the hands of the Romans, and the dawn of the Christian era. The second volume deals, in two parts, with the early Christian art, Gregorian song, the time of the Carolings, Hucbald of St. Amand and the organum, Guido d'Arezzo and solmisation, troubadours and minstrels, minnesingers, volkslied, mensurale music and counterpoint, Wilhelm Dufay, and Antonius Busnois. In the third volume, which is again divided into three parts, an exhaustive account is rendered of music in the Netherlands, from Johannes Okegham and Josquin de Près to Orlando Lasso, which is followed by a description of the state of the art during the same period in Germany and England, and the volume concludes with the Italian renaissance during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries up to the time of Palestrina. The fourth and final volume treats of Palestrina and his influence upon contemporary art, and leads up eventually to the dramma per musica, i.e., the birth of modern opera in the early part of the seventeenth century. We must be satisfied with having drawn attention to the exhaustive contents of these volumes by indicating the headings of the principal chapters, and can only reiterate our previous remark that no one interested in the subject of which it treats can, after perusal, lay the book aside without regretting that after having been conducted through the magnificent dome of the music of the Middle Ages the author should not also have led him on to the smiling fields and pastoral surroundings of the period which followed. There can be no doubt, however, that the task accomplished by Ambros with such conspicuous success covers the most obscure periods of art-history, involving a mass of original and most painstaking research, from which it would seem scarcely possible to emerge with a clear and objective conception of the period to be described. Thus, the author justly remarks in his preface to the first volume, "The history of music . . . has necessarily to deal with the frequently dark and abstruse musical theories of past centuries, even though it should sometimes fatigue the reader in its progress. . . . To demonstrate, moreover, the spiritual or æsthetic significance of a musical composition, without either actually reproducing it or transcribing it in notation, is an almost impossible task. . . . So long as 'historical' concerts, such as are given occasionally at Paris, Leipzig, &c., have not become permanent institutions which for the musical amateur will be what picture-galleries are to the lover of painting, so long will the work of the historiographer of music be but halfway satisfactory." And this leads us to observe, in conclusion, that the frequent practical illustration desired by Ambros, as indicated in the passage just quoted, has led to the introduction into the text of these volumes of numerous musical pieces and specimens illustrative of different periods and nationalities, which considerably enhance the practical value of the work. In addition to these examples embodied in the book itself, another volume is now in the course of publication, consisting of a number of compositions of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, collected by Ambros in the course of his researches, and which have never before been published. We earnestly recommend those among our readers who are sufficiently acquainted with the German language to study this excellent historical work, and those who are not may at least derive much interesting information from its Musical Appendix, of which three parts have so far appeared.

Les Mélodies Grégoriennes, d'après la Tradition. By the Rev. Father Dom. Joseph Pothier.

[Tournay: Desclée Lefebvre et Cie.]

ANY lengthened notice of this work would scarcely be suited to the pages of THE MUSICAL TIMES. The traditions of the Roman Liturgy cannot be wholly restored apart from the Latin language in which it was written and sung. M. Pothier, the author of the new work on Gregorian music, is a learned Benedictine who has consecrated more than twenty years to the study of the subject. He follows in the footsteps of Dom. Guéranger, whose labours in the service of liturgical reform or, more properly, restoration, were solemnly acknowledged by the late Pope Pius IX. It was the ambition of M. Guéranger to search everywhere for all that was thought, done, or most loved in the Church in the Ages of Faith. The study of the past, to which his and other similar researches on behalf of liturgical traditions have given rise, has also, in the opinion of M. Pothier, led to much progress in our knowledge of early Christian art, literature, and philosophy. Music, so intimately connected with the ancient Liturgy, has been specially benefited. Notwithstanding the glories of the modern art, men have turned towards the earliest times to find if there be not some secrets still that are worth rediscovering. With such objects were reprinted in fac-simile the antiphonaries of St. Gall and Montpellier in the Remo-Cambrai editions of the Gradual. But, according to M. Pothier, the imperfection of that edition, which otherwise has so faithfully reproduced the mere music notation of St. Gregory, was that the groupings of the notes and the various modes of expression indicated by the several characters, signs, or neumes were either lost sight of or not thoroughly and traditionally presented. It was, however, remarked at the Musical Congress at Paris in 1860 by Canon Gontier, of Mans, a friend of the Abbé Guéranger, that the latter in his monastery had succeeded in giving to the Gregorian melodies an accent and rhythmic expression no one would have thought them capable of receiving. It was a revelation, and suggested the possibility of this style of intonation being some precious relic of the past—an echo, feeble indeed, but genuine, of Gregorian traditions. Subsequently the idea occurred to Dom. Guéranger to carefully collate and reprint the monastic graduals and antiphonaries. The fact in the end became confirmed that all the melodies of the Gregorian repertory have been preserved integrally, note for note, and group for group, in manuscripts anterior to the sixteenth century, and that all that was wanting was to restore the traditional method of singing or intoning the notes. As we understand M. Pothier's design, this restoration is the special object of his work; and in his preface he expresses the hope that his labours may be appreciated by musicians in general—or, as he calls them in his own idiom, musiciens profanes—and especially by those amongst them who consider that modern music has need of regeneration, and of being again steeped in the living sources of old inspiration; and that the music of the past, when better known and when enriched by such legitimate resources as the present day can offer, may yet be hailed as the veritable music of the future. The incomparable melodies of the ancient liturgy, that our forefathers did not scruple to call inspired, are assuredly, says M. Pothier, more appropriate to the sacred text, and more intimately united with the sacred ritual, than the most vaunted compositions of modern art; and their appropriateness is, even on account of their hieratic forms, at first strange-sounding, but to the initiated a source of beauty and a proof of superiority. It is needless to add that a work so piously conceived is thoughtfully executed in regard to technical details, from the familiar gamut, or system of scales, to the more abstruse signs of accent, rhythms, and expressions comprehended in the general term neumes; and in this latter regard the work of M. Pothier will be found of great value to those specially interested in the subject. The typography of the work, including valuable tables of neumes, clefs, &c., is simply excellent, and worthy of its origin, the "Imprimerie Liturgique de St. Jean l'Evangeliste" at Tournay.

Fourth Mass (in C). Composed by L. Cherubini. Edited, and the pianoforte accompaniment arranged, by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

In the "Memorials of the Life of Cherubini," by E. Bellasis, the author states that the numbering of the composer's masses is incorrect, and that the one now before us should be No. 6, instead of No. 4. As the work, however, in full score, was published for the author in Paris bearing on the title-page "Quatrième Messe Solennelle," we think that Mr. Berthold Tours, who has with his accustomed care edited the Mass, is perfectly justified in retaining the composer's own numbering. The great interest excited by the performance of the Mass in D minor at the recent Worcester Festival has once more drawn attention to Cherubini's works; and the appearance of the Mass in C (whatever may be its number) in the familiar octavo edition which has popularised so many of the standard sacred works, will most certainly be greeted with pleasure by the numerous choral Societies now arranging their programmes for the coming season. The work contains an Offertorium and "O Salutaris" in place of a Benedictus. All the movements are extremely melodious; and for a well-trained choir the music throughout presents no remarkable difficulties. The indications of the score are, as usual, an important feature in this edition; and the pianoforte accompaniment reflects much credit upon the editor. We may add that the Mass was performed at Manchester, by Mr. C. Hallé, on the 3rd ult.

Notes of a Pianist. By Louis Moreau Gottschalk. Edited by his sister, Clara Gottschalk. Translated from the French by Robert E. Peterson, M.D.

[Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott and Co.]

THERE can be no doubt that it is as difficult a matter to make a popular book artistic as to make an artistic book popular; and if we say therefore that "Notes of a Pianist" confirms this assertion, it by no means proves that, apart from any such intention, we do not believe that the author has been successful. As a pleasant work of travelling gossip we may conscientiously recommend it; and all who take interest in the career of a pianist and composer whose individuality was strikingly apparent both in his playing and writing, will assuredly accompany him on his many long journeys with much pleasure. Born in New Orleans, Gottschalk was on his mother's side a Creole, his father being an Englishman; and it is truly stated in the biographical sketch which precedes these "Notes" that what rendered this artist so attractive "was due to the two natures which he thus inherited, for he possessed the warmth of heart which characterises the Creole and the dignity of manner so peculiar to the English." It would be impossible to give any idea of the varied contents of the bulky volume before us—the substance of a diary kept by Gottschalk for very many years—but we may say that, in addition to a faithful—perhaps even too minute—record of his own artistic life, we have many highly interesting anecdotes of the numerous artists with whom he was professionally associated; and we can assure our readers that, however they may desire that music should have been made more prominent, the book is never dull.

Bostanai. A Sacred Cantata. Composed and dedicated to the memory of several late lamented illustrious members of his community. By the Rev. M. Hast, First Minister of the Great Synagogue, London.

No publisher's name appears on the title-page of this work, and we may presume, therefore, that it is not intended for circulation beyond the members of the author's community. But then why send it for review? Sacred Cantatas, written by composers whose names are sufficient guarantee for at least skilful workmanship in all they attempt, are quite plentiful enough to engage the critic's attention; and amateurs, therefore, who merely write a few smooth vocal pieces and term the collection a "Cantata," should be frankly told that there is no room for them in the busy world of real art. Having taken up Mr. Hast's composition, however, as a specimen of its class, we may say that, although simple in construction, the writing throughout is careful and generally grammatically correct—the setting indeed of the text in many parts showing much sympathetic feeling—but the dead level of commonplace harmonies becomes often tiresome; and we can scarcely admit the good motive which called the Cantata into existence as an excuse for its publication. The "Chœur des Dames à deux voix," which concludes the first part, and the Andante in A minor, beginning with the words "If man's life but for one year endures," may be cited as amongst the best numbers in the work; but at page 57 what can be the meaning of writing the part for a Bass voice in the Treble clef?

Stars of the Summer Night. Serenade. Chorus for S.A.T.B. Words by Longfellow. Music by J. Marshall. [Huddersfield and Bradford: Wood and Marshall.]

IN spite of some rather abrupt changes of key, this composition is extremely effective—in parts indeed giving indication that the composer is capable of better things. The melodiousness of the principal subject and the careful manner in which the voices are written for throughout will doubtless make it a favourite with choral Societies; and that it will be warmly received by a mixed audience was proved by the applause bestowed upon it at the recent Huddersfield Musical Festival, for which we believe it was expressly written.

The Starlings. Song. Words by Charles Kingsley. Composed by John More Smetton. [Howard and Co.]

THERE is some feeling for melody in this song; but the wearisome effect of the tonic and dominant harmonies of G minor is but partially compensated for by the repetition of the same harmonies in the tonic major. Change of key—especially that from major to minor—is too often mistaken by inexperienced writers for change of thought; and Mr. Smetton has yet to learn that simple songs need not be monotonous. Let him study even the small vocal works of the great writers, and he will find in each a genuine idea, treated with a master's touch.

Out of the Deep. Anthem for solo and chorus. By Francis Edward Gladstone, Mus. Doc. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS anthem, as the title-page informs us, was composed expressly for the Choir Benevolent Fund, and is especially suited for the Church's penitential seasons, Lent and Advent. It opens with an expressive subject in F minor, to the words "Out of the deep have I cried unto Thee O Lord, Lord, hear my voice." This is treated contrapuntally, as is also the next phrase to the words "O let Thine ears consider well the voice of my complaint." Then follow a short bass solo and a "verse" of the choral type; the latter, though also short, being an important feature in the composition. The concluding movement, in F major, possesses little individuality, and therefore calls for no special comment; but on the whole, the anthem is a good specimen of vocal composition.

Hosanna! A short, easy, full Anthem for Parish Choirs. By Albert Lowe. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

No doubt this anthem will become widely known, for the composer is fortunate in having adopted what may be termed the popular and picturesque style of anthem writing, which, by the way, has much in it to be commended. The plan of this composition is by no means original, neither does the author display much musicianly skill in the manner of writing down what in many instances are very attractive ideas. Notwithstanding this, however, the anthem, upon the whole, is a bright and pleasant composition, and suited, as the title sets forth, for parish choirs, while its joyous character fits it well for the forthcoming Christmas season.

The Organist's Quarterly Journal of Original Compositions. Edited by William Spark, Mus. Doc.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS publication has now reached the very respectable age of thirteen years, and no doubt it has in that time exercised a considerable influence both upon composers for the organ, and performers upon that instrument. In looking back over the long vista of compositions embraced in this period, we find a very fairly representative collection of pieces, the study of which will give, upon the whole, a very good idea of the condition of organ music in at least three of the musical countries of Europe: Germany, France and England. No doubt the difficulty of sustaining a tolerably level standard of excellence in each number is great, but even allowing a generous margin for difference of opinion, there are many pieces to which the words launched at an unfriendly critic in the editor's preface to the current number may be applied with justice. "Cold mechanical music, of great correctness but little beauty, without genuine melody or that tenderness of heart which inspires happy touching thoughts," can not unfrequently be found in the pages of this journal; and, on the other hand, music quite as regrettable, of the light and flippant school, is not entirely a stranger. At the same time it would be very ungrateful not to remember the many excellent and varied examples of organ music which, it is not perhaps too much to say, might not have seen the light had not this periodical been in existence. Of the two numbers now before us we can safely say that they sustain the reputation of this publication. In them is to be found music for musicians of very different shades of thought, and also pieces suited not only to the adept, but to the less skilful player. In the number for July we must single out for favourable mention "Two short and easy preludes," by Charles Joseph Frost, both graceful and interesting, and, as the title suggests, easy; also a Minuet by James J. Pye, Mus. Bac. The Fuga at the commencement of the number, which is of a severer kind of excellence, would make an effective voluntary if played upon a large organ. In the current number the B.A.C.H. fugue, by W. Conradi, is perhaps the most important item.

Elementary Principles of Music and Elements of Harmony, adapted for those Studying the Pianoforte. By W. Adlington. [Wood and Co.]

MR. ADLINGTON tells us that he has written this little work especially for those who do not intend to study the whole theory and science of music; and viewed in this light we think he has successfully accomplished his task. The conventional method of writing the minor scale—with the sixth and seventh raised in ascending, and restored to the signature in descending—is given; and the chromatic scale ascending in sharps and descending in flats—without a word as to how it is to be noted when a number of sharps or flats are placed at the signature—also appears, as it has so long appeared in the instruction-books of the past. We will not here stop to discuss these questions, but are certain that the author will thank us for saying that the word appoggiatura comes from appoggiare (with two "g's"); and that what he calls a "short appoggiatura" is an acciaccatura. Appoggiare signifies to lean upon, and acciaccare to crush; and the two musical words derived from these verbs precisely express their meaning. We also wish to call Mr. Adlington's attention to the second exercise at page 44, the key of which would assuredly puzzle any student. These little defects could be easily remedied in a new edition; and as we see by the title-page that the copy of the work forwarded to us belongs to the "fifth thousand," they evidently must for some time have escaped detection. We are glad to find handbooks of this kind increasing; for it is unquestionably good to secure a solid foundation to build upon—even if you should never build.

O ye that love the Lord. Anthem. Composed by F. A. W. Docker. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is an anthem of a very manageable length in three movements. The first opens with a soprano solo in F, 3-4 time, the melody of which is distinctly vocal and pleasing, and also easy of performance. It is then repeated in harmony by the chorus. We may be allowed to mention that the time-word adagio is rather misleading; the metronome mark being 104 to the crotchet. The second movement, which is in the dominant, opens with a vigorous and effective lead for the basses, followed by a second subject for trebles. The first subject is then taken up by the full choir, when this short movement is brought to a close. The following movement, in the tonic, to the words "Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous," is, like its predecessor, bright, spirited, and easy, and brings this unpretentious but effective composition to a satisfactory termination.

There were shepherds abiding in the field. Easy Anthem for Christmas. By E. A. Sydenham.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS is another competitor for favour this Christmas-tide, and in many ways it is well deserving of it. Though it does not exhibit great powers of invention on the part of the composer, yet, on account of its generally melodious character, it may be said to be a gain to music of this class; and choirs of not very great resources ought to be acquainted with this tolerably short anthem before making their selection for Christmas-Day.

Reverie, in D flat. For the Pianoforte. By Claudius H. Couldery. [Lamborn Cock.]

IT is not often that in passing through the mass of pianoforte music forwarded to us for review our attention is arrested by a composition upon which we can conscientiously bestow more than qualified praise; but Mr. Couldery's Reverie, although simple and unpretending, is so full of melodic grace, and the theme is so tenderly and artistically treated throughout, that we unreservedly commend it to those amateurs who, whilst wanting something both new and "pretty," are not disappointed when they find that a piece is a little out of the groove into which our "drawing-room music," as it is termed, seems rapidly settling down. Apart from the tunefulness of the principal subject, we are especially pleased with the ornamental passages which grow around it. At the pause towards the conclusion, the two short cadences are most effective, and the coda is in thorough sympathy with the character of the piece. We are glad to welcome a composer who can by such legitimate means invest a mere trifle with so much interest.

Holy Worship. A Sacred Song. Words by L. C. C. C. Composed by A. E. Tozer. [Novello, Ewer, and Co.]

THERE is good feeling for sacred music evidenced throughout this song, but the prayer of the choirboy—"Open Thou our lips, O Lord, and our mouth shall shew forth Thy praise"—requires something more than smooth and faultless writing to arrest the attention. The truth is that texts like these are sufficiently sanctified without the aid of musical setting, and it is genius alone which can intensify their effect upon the mind by such means. The quaver accompaniment in the portion which leads up to this prayer wants relief. The best part of the song is where the modulation into B major occurs, on the words "For he knew that Christ was there."

Call the ewes to the knowes. Duet. The words adapted from Robert Burns. Composed by John Bulmer, M.A. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE only defect in this Duet is its monotony. The melody is attractive, with just enough Scottish character to adapt it to the words, and the harmonies are well written throughout; but the effect of the voices singing separately and then together almost the same notes becomes tiresome, even with the slightly varied accompaniment. Certain indications in this unpretending vocal piece seem to suggest that the composer might do better things.

The King and the Miller of the Dee. Poetry by Charles Mackay. Music by Alfred Blume. [B. Williams.]

AS baritone singers are by no means plentifully supplied with effective songs, they will be glad to hear of this really excellent addition to their stock. The bold modulations in the music give much force to the conversations of the happy Miller with "King Hal"; and in every case the accompaniments are in perfect keeping with the words, which we need scarcely say are good enough to lighten materially the task of any composer. We are pleased to find that Signor Foli has already sung this composition in public, and trust that other equally competent vocalists will follow his example.

March. For the Pianoforte. By Fred. A. Dunster.

[A. Cox.]

A MARCH original enough to make its way through the crowd of such pieces published in this prolific musical age is indeed a rarity; but Mr. Dunster has at least given us a bold theme in C minor, with a second part in the relative major, and a trio in A flat major, which contrasts well with the principal subject. In the last page, where the accompaniment in octaves occurs, we could wish that the interrupted close on the sixth of the scale, which is taken twice over, had been written without the consecutive fifths, a defect easily remedied by doubling the third of the second chord.

FOREIGN NOTES.

THE recent stage representation of Liszt's oratorio "St. Elizabeth," given in honour of the composer's seventieth birthday at the Hoftheater at Weimar, has proved but a moderately successful experiment. The performance was conducted by Herr Lassen before a very numerous audience.

Herr Angelo Neumann's projected "Lohengrin" performances at the French capital have met with opposition on the part of M. Lamoureux, the late chef d'orchestre of the Grand-Opéra, who claims the right of first production of the work in Paris. An action-at-law has, it is said, been instituted by Herr Neumann to decide the question, but, whatever the result, it appears certain that Wagner's masterpiece will be introduced to Parisian audiences during the coming year.

A correspondent writes to us from Dresden: "On the 12th ult. the Dresden Hoftheater presented for the one hundredth time Weber's 'Euryanthe,' an opera which was produced in London in June, 1833, but which has since been hardly heard of there. A curious feature of the present commemoration was the printing of the original programme of the opera—of March 31, 1824—by the side of the new one. What was then styled the 'Königliches Deutsches Schauspiel' has since been converted into the 'Königliches Hoftheater,' and the highest prices have risen from 16 groschen (1.60 marks) to 5.50 marks. But the programme says nothing of the enormous changes which have taken place in Dresden during these fifty-seven years, among which not least ranks the design and completion of the splendid opera-house itself."

A new Requiem by Friedrich Kiel was produced for the first time by the Berlin Singakademie on the 20th ult. We render an account of the event in another part of our present issue.

The Berlin Musik Welt contains in two of its recent numbers some interesting analytical observations on the music of the first and part of the second act of Richard Wagner's latest music-drama, "Parsifal." The analysis (from the pen of Herr Paul Schumacher) is based upon the pianoforte score of the work, so far as it has been completed by Joseph Rubinstein, and which is now in course of publication by Messrs. Schott, of Mayence.

The executors of the late Johann Maria Farina have, the Signale says, handed the sum of 18,000 marks to the treasurer of the Cologne Conservatorium, for the purpose of founding two free scholarships at that institution, which will bear the name of the testator.

Among the numerous tokens of esteem received by Ferdinand Hiller on the occasion of his recently celebrated seventieth birthday was a laurel wreath presented to him by his Viennese friends, inscribed with the names of Brahms, Brüll, Goldmark, Bauernfeld, Laube, Hanslick, and many others well known in the artistic world.

Marie Wieck, the excellent pianist, and sister of Clara Schumann, is just now engaged upon a most successful concert-tournée in Sweden and Norway.

Eduard Lassen, the composer of incidental music to Goethe's "Faust," has just completed the composition of similarly illustrative music to Calderon's "Circe," which is to be performed (with Otto Devrient's version), during the present month at the Hoftheater of Weimar.

We extract the following from the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Zeitung: "The Imperial opera of Vienna has just celebrated an interesting anniversary. On November 3, 1821, i.e., sixty years ago, Carl Maria von Weber's opera 'Der Freischütz' was produced for the first time here at the Hoftheater, near the Kärnthnerthor. The opera met with great success, and was given on February 2, 1829, for the one hundredth time. An especially brilliant performance of the work took place on May 17, 1846, at the Theater an der Wien, when Jenny Lind sang the Agatha, Tichatschek was the Max, and Staudigl the Caspar. At the new Imperial Opera House the opera has received, from January 1, 1870, to September 23 of the present year, ninety-one representations. At Berlin five hundred performances of 'Der Freischütz' have so far taken place. In Italy also, in spite of its purely German melodies, the opera has made many friends. In 1872 'Der Freischütz' was brought out at the Teatro della Scala of Milan, under the title of 'Il Franco Cacciatore.' The Teatro Apollo, of Rome, was the second Italian stage where Weber's masterpiece was produced, viz., on November 25, 1874; but, according to Italian custom, a ballet in nine tableaux had to be introduced between the second and third acts."

The first numbers of a weekly illustrated music-journal, entitled La Musique Populaire, have just been issued at Paris. The new periodical is edited by M. Arthur Pougin, the well-known critic.

"Christophe Gluck et Richard Wagner" is the title of a pamphlet from the pen of M. de Brigueville, which has just been published by Jules Gervais, of Paris.

M. Ed. Gregoir, of Paris, who has been engaged for some years past in the collection of material concerning the life and works of Grétry, will, it is announced, shortly publish the result of his elaborate researches in a volume entitled "Documents relatifs à la Vie et aux Œuvres d'André Ernest Modeste Grétry," which is looked forward to with much interest in musical circles.

A number of hitherto unpublished letters from the pen of Hector Berlioz will, it is said, shortly be issued from the Paris press, with an introduction written by M. Gounod.

We read in the Daily News of the 1st. ult.: "A statue to Bellini, and another to Verdi, have been inaugurated in Milan. The committee entrusted with the arrangement of the proceedings telegraphed to Verdi, who is at Busseto, his native place, near Parma, informing him of the applause with which the honour to the 'illustrious dead and illustrious living' was received. A telegram of thanks from the veteran composer was despatched in reply, and also one from the town council of Busseto, who expressed themselves as grateful for the patriotic demonstration of the city of Milan with regard to their illustrious fellow-citizen."

Wagner's "Rienzi" and "Lohengrin" will be produced during the present season at the Teatro Fenice, of Venice.

A new comic opera, "Le Nozze Prigione," by Usgilio, has been extremely well received on the occasion of its recent performance at the Teatro Vittorio Emanuele, of Turin. A new operatic work by Cortesi, entitled "L'Amico di Casa" will shortly be brought out at the Teatro Niccolini, of Florence.

Anton Rubinstein has undertaken the direction this winter of the first three concerts of the imperial Music Society at Moscow. Later in the season the eminent pianist-composer will, it is announced, conduct a number of compositions by Russian musicians at one of M. Pasdeloup's Concerts Populaires in Paris.

We subjoin, as usual, the programmes of concerts* recently given at some of the leading institutions abroad:—

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Doubtless there are in this country many valuable unpublished letters of Hector Berlioz. Will their owners be good enough to send me copies? Nothing written by such a man should be lost to the public; and as the articles which have appeared in your journal concerning him are about to be printed, with additions, in book form, I am led to make an appeal which I hope is reasonable, and I know is timely.

Truly yours,

106, Haverstock Hill, N.W. JOSEPH BENNETT.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Your allusion, in the article last month on Dr. Stainer's address, to Professor Macfarren's speech has revived my abandoned intention of uttering a protest against the main topic of that speech. As an old and attached former pupil of Professor Macfarren's I cannot but wonder that the experienced and wise guide of my early steps, who used so to commend the great diversity and extent of my musical reading, should be so untrue to his principles as to urge students not to study the modern composers, "for fear of imbibing inartistic or revolutionary ideas." I have made a point of becoming acquainted with as many as possible of our young musicians and music-students, and I find the same fault in them all—their studies have been too narrow and limited. In these days of cheap editions and music libraries there is no excuse for this. Let them devour huge quantities of music, no matter of what kind. Let them make a point of reading through at the piano every new opera, symphony, or quartet that comes out. Let them study Brahms and Barnett, Schumann and Sullivan, Bach and Offenbach—in fine, everything and everybody. Thus, and thus only, will they open their minds and, when they arrive at years of discretion, find themselves on a level with contemporary thought, instead of miles behind it, as too many are at present. I suppose the growth of my musical mind was much the same as most people's: let me sketch it. Happily I was not put in leading-strings at too early an age, and was allowed to study what I liked. My first passion was for Weber, and I saturated myself with his operas, masses, songs, and pianoforte works. Mendelssohn I had a dose of through my brothers and sisters, and, some kind friend presenting me with a fine edition of his complete pianoforte works, I soon wearied of him. Then I adored Spohr, and, through Augener's library, obtained numerous forgotten works of this worthy. So on to Chopin and Schumann, as my pianistic capabilities developed (in every case nothing but the complete works would satisfy me); and at this period I went to the Academy and horrified my teacher by being unable to quote a single theme from a single symphony of Beethoven's. In fact, up to the age of seventeen, I considered the old masters dull and dry, for the simple reason that, never having learned musical construction, I could not appreciate their beauties. Now a new world was opened to me, and Bach, Mozart, and finally Beethoven, were digested with delight. But at the same time that I was learning to appreciate the First Symphony of Beethoven, I was studying the full scores of "Tristan and Isolde" and the "Ring des Nibelungen." Before I had even got through the "Messiah," I knew Liszt's "St. Elizabeth" and "Graner Messe." Was I any the worse for this? My early compositions—as Professor Macfarren will remember—were extravagant and wild, but better be this than dull and dreary. A few more years of study enabled me to distinguish between corn and husks—enabled me to sift the good from the bad in my plentiful brain-library. I have yet my reputation to make as a composer, but I have at least the pleasure of knowing that what I write is not behind the age, and consequently that it has a chance of vitality. Soyons de notre siècle. In these days, when you go to write an oratorio, for instance, it is not enough to be acquainted with the "Messiah," "Creation," and "Elijah"; you want to know Bach's "Passion," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," Brahms's "Requiem," Kiel's "Christus," Liszt's "Christus"—in fact, contemporary as well as past specimens. What do our English song-writers know, again? They have heard Sullivan's and Cowen's ballads and a few songs of Schubert; but which of them is acquainted with the numerous and varied productions of Franz, Jensen, Raff, Liszt, and Brahms? I repeat—study every composer and style indiscriminately, and to the greatest possible extent; then, and then only, will you have a chance of writing well and originally.

One more point. Who are the individual composers forming that much-abused but indefinite body, "the Wagnerites," "the apostles of ugliness," "the revolutionary school" as they are variously called? They seem to me to have about as much real existence as the Æsthetes. Critics are for ever abusing them en masse, but when they leave generalities and speak of individual works and writers we hear no more of these epithets. In fact, Brahms, Raff, Goldmark, Dvorák, Bargiel, Rubinstein, who are the only living symphonists of sufficient position to be worth abusing, are all so different from one another that it would be absurd to class any of them together as forming a school; while, as to revolutionary ideas, I confess I fail to see in any of their works aught but the natural development of Mendelssohn-Schumann lines of thought, with about half as much dash of Beethoven as there should be. The revolutionist—the second Beethoven—has yet to come, and, thank heaven, there are no signs of him yet: we have time left to study the present and past forms of art before we are hurried into a new world.

Believe me, yours very truly,
F. CORDER.

BERLIOZ' "SUMMER NIGHTS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I can recall no instance of a set of six songs exciting such wide attention, or meeting with so favourable a reception on their first hearing, as Berlioz' "Summer Nights" ("Les Nuits d'Été"), brought forward at a recent Richter Concert. The success which attended them makes me the more anxious to elicit some further information as to their history than as yet I have been able to obtain. An expression of this desire in your widely circulated columns will, I feel sure, bring forth the wished-for result. But first, however, I should perhaps detail what has come to my knowledge respecting them. With the view to a note in the programme-book of the Richter Concert at which they were sung, I made strenuous efforts to learn something about them. On finding that Berlioz has made no mention of them in his "Mémoires" or elsewhere in his literary works, that I am aware of, I cast about in various directions and in the likeliest quarters; but all the information I have been able to gain from several of his biographers has been either of a negative or contradictory character.

In Dr. Ferdinand von Hiller's very interesting personal Reminiscences of Berlioz, contained in a volume entitled "Künstlerleben" (published last year), there is a salient passage about several of Berlioz' works which, he says, were created (so to speak) under his very eyes, at a time when he was in daily intercourse with him. In proof of the extreme care which he bestowed upon his songs, Hiller relates that one morning Berlioz brought him a song (one of Moore's "Irish Melodies") which he had just completed, and, on handing it to him, laughingly said: "I have worked at this for a fortnight, every morning writing a few bars, just as if it were an exercise in counterpoint." Recalling this anecdote on a visit to Hiller in August last, I asked him if he could tell me anything about the "Summer Nights," but he could tell me nothing beyond the fact that they belong to a later period than the "Irish Melodies," Op. 2.

From M. Gustave Chouquet, Keeper of the Museum of the Paris Conservatoire de Musique, and well known as a reliable authority, I have learnt that these songs were composed about 1838. He further informed me that they have not obtained much favour in France, and stated it as his belief that they have not been published with pianoforte accompaniment. In this latter supposition he is clearly in error, but with good excuse, for it is only quite recently that they have been published in Paris. This leads to the question I am most anxious to solve—were they originally written with accompaniment for orchestra or for pianoforte?

The exquisite beauty and varied character of the orchestral accompaniment, and the fact that the eloquence lies more in this than in the vocal part, taken with M. Chouquet's remark, seems to afford strong internal evidence that the orchestral accompaniment cannot have been an afterthought, but was, in fact, their determining principle. In opposition to this view, it might be inferred, from the catalogue of Berlioz' works contained in the second edition of his "Soirées de l'Orchestre," published in 1854, that they were originally written with pianoforte accompaniment, and that at that date only one of them, "L'Absence," had been scored for orchestra. My friend, Mr. E. Dannreuther, the author of the article on Berlioz in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," tells me that they were instrumented for Weimar at a much later date; but this is difficult to believe, except upon the supposition that Berlioz, who prided himself upon his ignorance of the capabilities of the pianoforte and always thought for the orchestra, in the first instance only made a sketch of these songs in short score, which he put by and finally instrumented in full some quarter of a century later, when the opportunity arose of bringing them to a hearing at Weimar.

That the orchestral score was the first to be published (by Rieter-Biedermann) seems to bear out this view, and points to the probability that the pianoforte accompaniment as we now possess it was made from this, and therefore represents the final orchestral arrangement rather than the original sketch.—Yours, &c.,

UNISON ANTHEMS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I am much enamoured with the simplicity and beauty of many of our "services in unison," especially in our country choirs. My choir (to which I have lately been appointed) consists of rough village-boys and a few men. A short time back I ventured a double chant in four-part harmony, alas! to no avail; but as soon as I introduced an unison service (Dr. Bunnett's) the men and boys sang it heartily. With respect to anthems, too, as many of our choirs do not know music, could not some of our worthy anthem writers give us unison anthems, which could be varied with a solo, or, may be, just a few bars of four-part harmony? We have the canticles set to unison themes by Drs. S. S. Wesley, W. Spark, E. G. Monk, Sir J. Goss, and many others; but it may be urged against unison anthems that there would be no room for the development of harmony. Permit me, therefore, to refer to Berthold Tours's Morning, Communion, and Evening Service—where we have a distinct treatment of the same theme, the one unison, the other harmony, both very beautiful settings. Again, A. S. Cooper's Communion Service, which may be sung in unison or harmony, and many others.

I feel sure that if unison anthems could be provided for choirs the same as unison canticles, there would be more anthem-singing than we can possibly have now.

I ask my musical brethren to consider my suggestion, as it is my earnest desire to further the interests of our Choral Church Service among the unskilled choirs.—I am, dear sir, yours very faithfully,

J. MARSH,

Organist and Choirdirector.

St. Mary's Parish Church,
Bacton, Suffolk.

AN ORGANIST'S GRIEVANCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—May I crave a small space in your estimable paper to state a grievance which I believe has been felt by some of my fellow-organists who train their own choirs?

I was appointed, some three years since, organist and choirmaster of a church where the two posts had always been combined. Having worked up the choir to a state of efficiency, I was much surprised to hear that a choirmaster had been appointed under the pretext of relieving me of some of my work. I, of course, protested strongly against the change, which I felt to be quite unnecessary, as the music was going very well; however, it was all in vain, and now that I have a choirmaster I want to know how far he has the control of the music, &c. I need hardly say that I do not hold the opinion that an organist cannot attend to a choir and his organ properly.—I beg to subscribe myself,

A LONDON ORGANIST.

THE FIRST DULCIANA.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Dr. Burney, in his "History of Music," in a note on page 438 of Vol. III., records the introduction of "the first dulciana" in the following words:—

"It was in the Lynn organ that this builder [Schnetzler] first introduced that sweet stop called the dulciana, which he and Green have since so happily introduced as a solo stop in their chamber organs." This Lynn organ was built in 1754.

The old builders—the Smiths, the Harrises, the Schwarbrooks, &c.—rarely made a choir organ of five stops without its containing one reed stop—frequently a vox humana; and later builders, as Schnetzler, Green, England, Avery, &c., as rarely repaired those organs without substituting a dulciana for that reed, carrying its compass down as far as standing room would allow, which was usually to tenor C, or at most to gamut G.

The absence of a reed from the five-stop old choir organ at Ripon, and the presence of a dulciana, would clearly point to a stop of the former kind having been removed, and one of the latter description inserted in its place.

It would not be easy to conceive that so excellent a stop as the dulciana, after being once made, would remain for nearly sixty years without a second example being "introduced."

It may be interesting to note that the Lynn organ, which contains the first recorded specimen of the dulciana, was built under the historian's (Dr. Burney's) own direction.—I remain, very truly yours,

E. J. HOPKINS,

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I am an amateur, passionately fond of music, and, like your correspondent George W. Lennon, deeply interested in the permanent establishment of a male-voice choir in the metropolis.

I have been for eighteen months a subscribing member of the Victoria Glee Club, which consists of a male choir of fifty voices well-trained, and containing among their number merit of no ordinary description.

The proper rendering of glees, madrigals, and part-songs is the ambition of this Association; and in proof of their ability I may mention that at our ordinary chamber concerts a selection from Mendelssohn's "Antigone" has been given, also most of the published English glees, many works of the German masters, and the "Orpheus" collection—twelve or fourteen compositions being usually performed at each monthly concert.

Besides the fifty singing members there are, at present, thirty-five other subscribing members, and an honorary list not exceeding twelve professional gentlemen. The Club meets for practice from 8 to 10.30 p.m. each Saturday at its club-room, 2, Westminster Chambers, Victoria Street, S.W.; and on the first Saturday in each month a smoking Concert is given, which is always crowded—so much so, indeed, that the Committee are seeking a room capable of holding 300 or 400 persons for the monthly Concerts.

Our President is Dr. J. F. Bridge, Organist of Westminster Abbey; Vice-President, Dr. Gladstone; and our Musical Conductor, Mr. W. Sexton, lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey.

The club is but youthful compared with Messrs Chickerling's venture; but, by the time we have attained eight years of existence, we hope to have made our name throughout the musical world as a fine male-voice glee club.—I am, sir, yours truly,

JAMES STEVENS.

Brixton, London, S.W.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In continuation of my letter printed in THE MUSICAL TIMES for August, some of your readers may like to know that the Official Diary of Colombia for September 6 last prints the report of the jury appointed to adjudicate on the merits of the "Symphonies on National Airs" submitted for competition.

They are pleased to find that competent persons whom they had called in to assist them in making their awards (they not being learned in the art of music), confirm the opinion they had formed; and they award the prize to Señor Ponce de Leon, whose work (out of three sent in) was the only one which fulfilled the conditions.

It is added that he will have to score the composition for the garrison band.

Nothing is said as to what degree of success has attended the efforts of the Colombians to find or manufacture a national anthem.—Yours truly,

C. B.

ORGANISTS' PRELUDES BEFORE THE ANTHEM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I wonder to what extent the practice is carried on in churches where anthems are sung for the organist to introduce the anthem by a prelude of his own composition. I was very recently present at a service in the parish church of a town in the Midlands, when one of Sir F. G. Ouseley's anthems was sung, and it was preceded by an introductory fantasia, totally different in character to the music of the anthem, and at least as long as the anthem itself. This is not an isolated case, but I specially instance this, as the organist is not unknown to the profession, and has the reputation of being a thorough musician. I know of another parish church in a town where I lately resided, in which the music is intended to be an attraction, and where the organist takes still more licence. I have heard (will it be credited?) Farrant's "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake," with a florid prelude for the organ, introducing "the entire strength of the company" of stops, in which the character of the anthem was entirely ignored, and, without exaggeration, three times as long as the anthem; and, not content with this sacrilege, accompanying and harassing its reposeful character with startling and unexpected effects, obtained by independent motives for the organ and eccentric changes of stops.

It is perhaps too much to hope that this protest will avail where reverence and self-abnegation have no place; but a practice so meretricious and discreditable to the profession needs to be exposed.—Yours &c.,

SECULAR TUNES TO HYMNS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to make one or two inquiries in your next issue on a subject of importance to myself and others?

A short time ago I was requested by the clergyman in charge of the church of which I am organist to have the hymn 186, "Ancient and Modern" ("I could not do without Thee"), sung to the tune of "Home, sweet home." Upon my refusal to introduce secular melodies into religious worship, I was met with the argument that I was quite in error, "there being many old secular tunes in the hymn-book referred to."

Will any of your readers better acquainted with the origin of these hymn-tunes kindly specify which these are, and also state if it can be considered the correct thing to substitute a ditty of this kind for the appropriate and devotional music composed expressly for sacred words, as for instance the case in point, viz., that of Dr. Stainer.—Yours, &c.,

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this Summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.—On Wednesday evening, the 16th ult., the second Concert of the season in connection with the Ashton Gentlemen's Glee Club was held in the Town Hall. There was a large audience. The principal vocalists were Miss Pauline Featherby, Messrs. Kendal Thompson, J. D. Smith, and Barrow; solo flute, Mr. F. F. Reyner; accompanist, Mr. Irvine Dearnaley.

BANFF.—The members of the Banff Musical Association, conducted by Herr J. Hoffman, gave their first Concert for the session in the County Hall on Saturday evening, the 5th ult., under the patronage of the Earl of Fife. The Concert opened with the overture to "Tannhäuser," which was rendered with much spirit by Misses J. Ross, I. Ramsay, H. Simpson, and B. Ramsay. In Haydn's chorus "The heavens are telling" the parts were fairly balanced; the soloists, Mrs. Barclay, Messrs. Pirie and Murray, being most effective. Herr Hoffman, besides accompanying, played a Concerto for two pianos by Thalberg with Miss I. Ramsay, and several solos. Mr. George Duncan contributed a solo on the violin, and songs were sung by Miss Dickson and Mr. Williamson. The choir gave an admirable rendering of Mendelssohn's "Parting and meeting" and Barnby's "Sweet and low," Miss H. Simpson playing the accompaniments to all the choruses most effectively. At the close of the Concert the Earl of Fife proposed a vote of thanks to the members of the Banff Musical Association and their talented Conductor, Herr Hoffman.

BATH.—A Concert was given in the Assembly Rooms on October 31, in aid of the Royal United Hospital, by the Bristol Orpheus Society, under Mr. George Riseley. The whole of the pieces were given without accompaniment, and the singing of Mr. Ben Gay was much admired.—Herr Sondermann gave a Ballad Concert on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult., in the large room of the Assembly Rooms, the artists were Miss Mary Davies, Madame Antoinette Sterling, Mr. Henry Guy, and Mr. Maybrick; solo violin, Mr. Victor Buziau. Madame Sterling's singing of "The Better Land" elicited great applause.—The Bath Temperance Choral Society gave the first Concert of the season at St. Margaret's Hall on Monday, the 14th ult. The choir, numbering sixty voices, rendered a selection of glees, &c., in a manner which was highly appreciated, and gave evidence of careful rehearsal, under Mr. H. G. Webber. Mr. Raikes played a selection for the English concertina, and Mr. S. Harding accompanied.—A Concert of instrumental and vocal music was given in the Assembly Rooms on the 22nd ult., the performers being: Pianoforte, Miss Ellaby; violin, Mr. Carrington; violoncello, Mr. Woolhouse; vocalists: Madame Florence Winn, Miss Maclean.

BEDFORD.—On Tuesday, October 25, the Musical Society gave a successful performance of Mr. J. F. Barnett's Cantata The Building of the Ship, under the direction of Mr. P. H. Diemer, the principal vocalists being Miss Catherine Penna, Madame Rosa Bailey, Mr. St. John Cottingham, and Mr. Henry Cross. The second part of the Concert consisted of a miscellaneous selection.

BELFAST.—The Belfast Philharmonic Society's season opened on the 7th ult. with a grand Concert in St. Mary's Hall. Madame Marie Roze, Signor Foli, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mdlle. Eugénie Papritz were the principal vocalists, all of whom created a marked effect. The violin performance of M. Le Chevalier Niedzielski was also a decided feature in the programme, and the singing by the choir was excellent. In every respect the Concert was highly successful.—An Organ Recital was given on the 14th ult. in Newtonbrea Presbyterian Church, by Mr. W. J. Kempton. Considerable interest was excited, on account of this being the only Presbyterian Church in Ireland in which an organ has been placed. An excellent programme was provided, and Mr. Kempton most effectively displayed the beauties and power of the instrument. The Belfast Select Choir sang in an admirable and praiseworthy manner; and the solos, "O rest in the Lord," "Take no thought for your life," and "O come, let us worship," sung respectively by Mrs. Kempton, Miss L. Brown, and Miss Emma Niell, were much admired. There was a large and appreciative audience.

BIRMINGHAM.—The fifty-sixth Concert of the Saturday Popular series was given in the Town Hall on the 5th ult. with most satisfactory results, both musically and financially. Miss Berrie Stephens, R.A.M., Miss Jeanie Rosse, Mr. Henry Parkin, and Mr. Henry Prenton, the vocalists, were all highly successful in their various songs and concerted pieces. Mr. Stimpson was the Organist, and played several selections in his well-known manner. Mr. Lovett King was the accompanist.

BRADFORD.—Mr. S. Midgley, who has done much for the cause of music in Bradford, commenced his seventh season of Classical Chamber Concerts on the 16th ult., in the Church Institute. The Concert was wholly instrumental, the artists being Herr Straus (violin), M. Vieuxtemps (violinello), Mr. Drake (viola), and Mr. Midgley (pianoforte). The first item in the programme was Raff's Sonata in D, Op. 183, for pianoforte and violoncello, which received most efficient interpretation from Mr. Midgley and M. Vieuxtemps, the andante movement being rendered with rare power and precision. Herr Straus followed with three of Brahms's famous Hungarian Dances, adapted to the violin by Herr Joachim. A Quartet in A flat (Op. 2), by H. Westrop, was the sole English composition that was presented, and it was much appreciated. Mr. Midgley's only pianoforte solo was Liszt's arrangement of Bach's Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. This remarkable composition was performed with much precision and emphasis. Mozart's Quartet in E flat, which brought the Concert to a close, received ample justice at the hands of the performers.

BRISTOL.—On Friday and Saturday, October 28 and 29, two Festival Concerts were given in the Colston Hall by the Bristol Musical Festival Society. The excellent choir, under the care of Mr. D. W. Rootham, the efficient chorus-master, mustered in good numbers, and Mr. Charles Hallé's unrivalled band having been also engaged, with Mr. Hallé himself as Conductor of the combined forces, most successful Concerts were the result. On the first evening Rossini's Stabat Mater was given in a highly efficient manner, the principal vocalists being Madame Schuch-Proska, Madame Patey, Mr. Joseph Maas, and Mr. Santley. A miscellaneous selection followed, the Festival Choir again showing most careful training in their interpretations of Schubert's Shepherds' Chorus from Rosamunde, "Forth to the meadows," and in Glinka's polonaise, with chorus, "Noble chief, thee we hail," from Life for the Czar. The second Concert was one of more than ordinary interest, Mr. Hallé having selected Berlioz's sacred trilogy, The Childhood of Christ (Parts I and II). An excellent performance of this work was given, the charming duet for Mary and Joseph, well rendered by Miss Santley and Mr. Santley, the Choruses of Magicians, and the thrilling effect of the Chorus of Invisible Angels, telling upon the audience in an unmistakable manner; the applause which followed the charming Chorus of Shepherds, "Born among us in a manger," could with difficulty be suppressed. The general impression created upon a first hearing of this remarkable work was a most favourable one, inducing a strong desire for further acquaintance. The characters in the work were sustained as follows:—Mary, the Mother, Miss Santley; Joseph, Mr. Santley; the Narrator, Mr. Joseph Maas; Herod, Mr. Henry Pope; the parts of the Centurion and Polydorus being taken by Messrs. E. T. Morgan and H. J. Dyer, members of the Choir. As at the previous Concert, a miscellaneous selection followed, which included Schumann's grand Overture, Scherzo, and Finale in E; Beethoven's March and Chorus, "Twine ye the garlands" (Ruins of Athens), and the Finale from Mendelssohn's Loreley, the soprano solo being rendered by Madame Schuch-Proska. The Concerts were most successful, the receipts having much exceeded those on a former and similar occasion in 1877.—On Monday, the 7th ult., Mr. Riseley gave his fourth Monday Popular Concert of the present season (the fifth) in the Colston Hall, which was filled with a large and appreciative audience. The programme included Schumann's Symphony (No. 1) in B flat, Op. 38, and four overtures, that to Wagner's Tannhäuser given by special desire, being finely rendered. Mr. Walter Macfarren's new Overture to Shakespeare's historical play, King Henry V., composed for the Norwich Festival, was performed for the second time, and was highly appreciated by the audience, the composer, who conducted the performance, having repeatedly to bow his acknowledgments to the hearty applause of the audience and band. Massenet's Suite d'Orchestre (No. 4), "Scènes Pittoresques," consisting of March, Air de ballet, Angelus, and Fête Bohème, was also performed. Miss Hélène Arnim and Mrs. A. J. Caldicott were the vocalists, the latter lady singing two compositions of her husband. Mr. A. W. Waite led the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.—On the 21st ult. the fifth Concert was given, and another well-selected and extremely well-rendered programme was given. The band performed in exceptionally fine style Beethoven's Symphony (No. 2) in D major, and the incidental music to Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream (Overture, Scherzo, Notturmo, Funeral March, and Wedding March), as well as the "Melusine" overture (Mendelssohn), and Rossini's William Tell overture. The vocalists were Miss Maclean and Madame Florence Winn. As before, Mr. A. W. Waite led the band, and Mr. George Riseley conducted.

BUCKHURST HILL.—The first of a series of Ballad Concerts was given at the Roebuck Assembly Rooms on the 9th ult., under the management of Messrs. Jones and Barber, of the Alexandra Palace. The artists were Miss Jessie Royd, Madame Evans-Warwick, Mr. Alfred Rudland, Mr. Henry Prenton, and Mr. Collingwood Banks. The programme was well selected, and the various items given with great taste and enthusiastically received. Mr. Collingwood Banks contributed two pianoforte solos. Mr. Walter Latter, R.A.M., conducted.

BURTON-ON-TRENT.—On Thursday evening, the 10th ult., a miscellaneous Concert (vocal and instrumental) was given by Miss Constance Norris in St. George's Hall, which was well filled. Miss Norris was assisted by Miss Ellen Bailey and Mr. Winn, vocalists; and the band of the Burton Rifle Volunteers was engaged for the instrumental part of the Concert. Professor Welsh, of Birmingham, and Mr. H. Drury, of Derby, were the accompanists. Miss Norris was very successful in "Ocean! thou mighty monster," and in reply to a redemand, bowed her acknowledgments. The band played exceedingly well, and their efforts were fully appreciated and heartily applauded.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Penny Popular Musical Entertainments given by the various Colleges have already commenced. King's College began the third series on October 29 with a very good Concert, several pieces being composed for the occasion. Corpus Christi followed on the 12th ult., and Clare on the 19th. These Concerts are still most successful, financially as well as musically, a large surplus being always realised for charitable purposes.

CLIFTON.—On Wednesday, the 9th ult., the first of Mrs. Viner-Pomero's excellent Classical Chamber Concerts for the present season was given in the Victoria Rooms. The executants were Mr. Henry Holmes (violin), Mr. A. Burnett (viola), Mr. J. Pomeroy (violinello), and Mrs. Viner-Pomero (piano). The programme comprised Beethoven's Trio in C minor, No. 3, Op. 9, for violin, viola, and violoncello; a Sonata by Rubinstein in D major, Op. 18, for piano and violoncello; Corelli's solo Sonata in C, No. 3, Op. 5, artistically played by Mr. Holmes; and concluded with Rheinberger's Quartet in E flat, Op. 38.

CORK.—The musical season in the south of Ireland commenced with the opening Concert of the Cork Orchestral Union, on Tuesday evening, the 8th ult. The programme was of especial interest, containing several works given for the first time in Ireland, together with other pieces more or less familiar. Pedrotti's overture to Tufts in Maschera, is remarkable for its charming violoncello solo, excellently played by Mr. George Brady. An orchestral selection from Gounod's Polyeucte was finely given, the solos for the various instruments being well rendered, especially the long movement for the euphonium by Mr. W. Murray. Haydn's Symphony in E flat (No. 3) was included in the scheme, and was highly appreciated, as was also Auber's overture to L'Esclapart. A Concert Fantasia for clarinet and orchestra, by E. Del Lungo, was splendidly performed, the solo instrument being in the hands of Signor Enrico Bernini, the principal clarinetist of the orchestra, whose tone and execution charmed the audience. The vocal music was contributed by Miss McKenna, Miss S. Haughton, Mr. W. W. Harvey and Mr. G. Waters; and Mr. C. Pridmore and Mr. T. Waters acted as accompanists. Mr. W. Kingrose Atkins, the Conductor, has, by his judicious training, brought his fine band, numbering about fifty performers, to a high state of perfection.—A very pleasing Concert, in connection with the Irish Fine Art Society, was given on Monday evening, the 14th ult., under the management of Mr. John Gilbert. Mrs. Longfield and Miss Haughton both of the orchestra, whose tone and execution charmed the audience. The vocal music was contributed by Miss McKenna, Miss S. Haughton, Mr. W. W. Harvey and Mr. G. Waters; and Mr. C. Pridmore and Mr. T. Waters acted as accompanists. Mr. W. Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. H. Clarke, Mr. Ward, Master F. Sharpe, and Master D. Phillips. Mr. Holt's performance of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor was so good that had it been played in any place but a church it would have met with an enthusiastic reception. DARLINGTON.—There was a large attendance in the North Road Wesleyan Chapel on the 18th ult., to hear a Recital on the new organ, by Dr. Spark, of Leeds. The instrument is an extremely powerful one, and at the same time possesses a rare sweetness of tone. Its capabilities were fully tested by Dr. Spark, who performed with his usual brilliancy and skill. During the afternoon the Rev. G. Barlow delivered a brief address, and expressed his belief that the possession of such an instrument would add to Divine worship, for all true worship was true praise. The proceeds of the Recital are to be devoted towards the organ fund.

DROITWICH.—A Festival Service was held in the Parish Church (St. Andrew's) on the 13th ult., when a selection from Mendelssohn's Elijah was performed. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to a Service in G composed specially for the occasion by Dr. Roberts, and the anthem was "Stand up and bless the Lord your God," by Sir John Goss. After the offertory, Handel's Chorus from Saul, "How excellent Thy Name," was sung. In the Martyr of Antioch the solos were well sung by Miss Marriott, Miss Josephine Cravino, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Prior, and Mr. Frederic King. In Barnett's cantata Miss Kate Hardy sang the soprano part, the other parts being sustained by Mr. Lloyd and Mr. King. Dr. Heap is to be congratulated on the success of the Society. A performance of The Messiah is announced for the next Concert, on the 28th inst.

WORSLEY, NEAR MANCHESTER.—On Sunday, the 20th ult., a large new organ, by Messrs. Alexander Young and Sons, was opened at the Parish Church by Mr. R. Froude Coules, Organist to the Earl of Mulgrave. The services were well rendered by the choir. The Rev. Canon Beechey preached both morning and evening, and spoke in high terms of the new instrument. At the evening service the choir was particularly fine, and gave evidence of careful training. The Earl of Mulgrave intoned the service both morning and evening, and the Rev. W. H. Baynes, M.A., read the lessons. At the close of the evening service Mr. Coules gave an Organ Recital, and played selections from the works of Mozart, Mendelssohn, Guilmant, &c., concluding with an elaborate improvisation on the evening hymn known as "Tallis's Canon." The collections, amounting to £46, were devoted to the Organ Fund.

YORK.—The Musical Society's Concert on the 17th ult., at which Haydn's Seasons was performed, was in every respect a marked success. Madame Marie Roze-Mapleson, in the part of Jane, achieved a perfect triumph, her song, "A wealthy lord," especially, being warmly and deservedly applauded. Mr. Hilton, too, was thoroughly satisfactory both in the songs and recitatives assigned to Simon; and Mr. Abercrombie gave the music of Lucas with praiseworthy care. Mr. R. S. Burton deserves much credit for the able manner in which he has drilled the choir. In most cases the choruses were excellently given, Mr. Burton's conducting doubtless contributing greatly to the success of the performance.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. R. Boulcott-Newth, Organist and Choirmaster, to St. John's, Angell Town, Brixton.—Mr. Edwin J. Wareham, Organist and Choirmaster, to the Parish Church, Woodbridge.—Mr. J. J. Simpson, Organist and Choirmaster to St. James's Church, Brownhill.—Mr. H. Harford Battle, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Paul's Church, Upper Norwood.—Mr. Wm. A. THE COMING YEAR

ISRAEL RESTORED

AN ORATORIO

(As performed at the Norwich Festival, September 22, 1852, and the Royal Albert Hall, London, April 15, 1880)

COMPOSED BY

W. R. BEXFIELD, Mus. Doc., CANTAB.

The Chorus and Orchestral Parts can be had on application to the publishers.

"The fact seems to us positive that 'Israel Restored' is in various respects a thing of sterling worth. . . . Not a few among both airs and choruses evince exceptional and remarkable power."—Daily Telegraph.

"We need only study the chorus, 'Thou hast mightily delivered Thy people,' to learn how great a loss English music suffered in 1853. . . . With regard to the songs much more might be said than space now permits, for they supply the most conspicuous of all the meritorious features in the work."—Musical Times.

"There is much in the oratorio to excite true admiration and delight."—Musical World.

"We pass on to No. 34, a soprano song, 'The sun shall no more go down,' with obligato accompaniment for horn, viola, cello, and double-bass. This is a lovely composition—probably the gem of the oratorio. . . . The musical interest is well sustained until the end, and there is hardly a number which does not put forth some special claim. The short chorus in D, 3-4 time, makes a bright and majestic conclusion to a work which is an honour to its author and his countrymen."—Orchestra.

A DICTIONARY OF MUSICAL TERMS

DR. STAINER AND W. A. BARRETT

(Compressed from the Imperial 8vo Edition by K. M. ROSS).

One Shilling; paper boards, 1s. 6d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A careful and judicious abridgment of the larger work, and will be found useful by those to whom the original is inaccessible."—Athenæum.

"A most serviceable abridgment of Stainer and Barrett's well-known Dictionary. Few, if any, words that the student can wish explained are absent from this little volume, which should be in every amateur's library."—Daily Telegraph.

"Of even more general utility is 'Musical Terms.' As a dictionary of reference this little volume should be on the table or shelf of every musician."—Graphic.

"Most of the special information contained in the large volume has been reproduced in this shilling pamphlet, the compression having been judiciously made by Mr. K. M. Ross."—Illustrated London News.

"In its condensed form the work contains a mass of information which is rarely to be met with in books of the class. It is particularly copious in German terms, which are now becoming of nearly as much use as the Italian."—British Mail.

"The musical learner will find much useful information on the principles of music and on many technicalities of the art only to be found in high-priced productions."—Perthshire Advertiser.

"No individual with any pretensions to a musical taste should be without this excellent book of reference."—Perth Citizen.

MELBOURNE, March, 1881.

We, the undersigned Jurors for Musical Instruments at the Melbourne International Exhibition, have no hesitation in certifying that Messrs. Challen & Son, of London, have obtained the highest number of points for Cottage Pianos, in the British Court.

The award was based on the excellence of the quality, combined with the cheapness and solidity of the instruments exhibited, which we consider to be well adapted to the requirements of the Colonies.
